This confused me somewhat erringly. "But," I cried, "what are pecuniary support? I give my work, which itself is pecuniary support to you, if good; and if bad what pecuniary support can you have?"

"The Company, M. Blechhausen, look to be insured somewhat against the chance of failure."

"There are offices for insurance," I reply: "I am not a office."

"You mistake me. Allowing we were ourselves convinced of the excellence of your work, that persuasion would not suffice to defray the cost of putting it on the stage."

"And who is to defray the cost then?"

"Well," returned the manager, "the Company would expect you, or the proprietor of your opera, to substantiate your interest by venturing a certain sum on its production."

"You mean," I asked astonished, "that I am to pay you for the liberty to use my opera and fill your theatre! So lies the hare in pepper!"

"Not exactly pay in the strict sense of the term," he answered, smiling, "but we should expect you to take up debentures to the extent of say five hundred pounds. In the event of success your money would be recoverable before payment of the shareholders' dividend."

"I know nothing of your debentures and your dividends," I cry out for "these are idiotisms of commerce, and are not art; but this I know, that you profess to be a Gompany to encourage the opera, and you are only a Gompany to encourage the pocket. Your professions are only a cloak—a mere opera-cloak. You would put on the stage the vilest trash for the sake of Debentures and Dividends. Where is your encouragement of the native talent?"

"Oh pickles!" exclaimed the Manager.

"I know not Bickles," I replied. "He may be your Chairman, or he may be your patron, but Bickles I know not and Bickles I will not!" So I left him in his office sitting, and went with rage in my heart to my over-generous publisher.

"Sir," I said to that too goodly man, "the Gompany will that we take Debentures for our opera and pay them five hundred pounds."

"My boy," said the friendly spirit, "it's not to be thought of."

"But the opera, my kind sir, the opera?"

"My boy," said again the never-too-much-to-be-overestimated business-man, "the less said about your opera the better."

"The less the better!" I repeated.

"Yes," he replied with tears in his eye-winks; "I have looked over the score, and I think so. The less we speak of that work the greater the comfort for you and for me—especially me."

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—Schumann's C major Symphony (No. 2) and two entr'actes to the tragedy "Rosamunde" (Koerner) by Schubert, together with Bach's G major Concerto for stringed instruments and soli by Fräulein Savanny, from the theatre, formed the programme of the 7th Abonnement-Concert on the 16th November. The performance of the instrumental works was, on the whole, brisk and lively. However, to enter into detail, I may remark that the clearness of tone and precision of the string instruments was not quite on a level with that of former times. Schumann's Symphony, one of the most beautiful works of this master, the result of direct penetration into the gigantic forms of Beethoven's muse, was given in an almost faultless manner.

Of the two entr'actes by Schubert, I think I am not mistaken, comparing the thematic contents with the drama itself, in asserting that the first number, of a tender, almost painful expression, is more suited as an introduction to the second act, whereas the second number, worked out in a masterly polyphonic manner, opening with a grand march (entry of the queen) and then gradually rising to the point where she (the queen) poisons herself, is more suited to Act V. This superb composition of the by far not sufficiently well-known and appreciated Vienna master, was a novelty for our audience, and did not fail to produce the deepest impression.

Fräulein Savanny gave a Recitative and Air from "Idomeneo," as also "Erster Verlust" (Goethe-Mendelssohn) and "Gretchen am Spinnrade" (Goethe-Schubert). Her voice is pleasing, and of a pathetic tone; however, in the lower notes it is occasionally husky and would seem to have lost its former freshness. Her rendering of the "Lieder" was distinct and clear, whereas in the recitative and air she was less successful.

In the very interesting concert (No. 3) of the Euterpe Verein, on the 21st inst., two orchestral works of still-living composers were produced—viz: Symphony C major (No. 1), S. Jadassohn, who is one of the most distinguished of Leipzig's musicians, and prelude to "Tristan und Isolde"—Richard Wagner. The former work, which was given some years since in the Gewandhaus with great success, distinguishes itself principally by the exquisite rounding off of the form and the expert instrumentation. One remarks, not merely in the construction of the single passages, but also in the connection of the same, the skill with which the composer has performed his task. The brisk movement in C major is followed by the playful Scherzo in F major; then a Largo in F minor, whereupon the finale in C major concludes the whole in a brilliant and well contrasted manner. Fräulein Anna Mählig, of Stuttgart, a well-known and popular pianist, brought Beethoven's E minor concerto, "Träumerei" from Schumann's "Fantasiestückchen," and Chopin's Scherzo in B minor. Her matchless performance of the concerto and her technical acquirements did not fail to earn her applause and encores. The prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" is remarkable on account of the masterly instrumentation; but one seeks in vain for a resting-place amongst these complicated masses of tones. The orchestra, more especially in the prelude, was excellent.

The eighth Abonnement-Concert was chiefly remarkable for its pianoforte-playing and the excellent representation of every instrumental member. It appeared as if the orchestra, director and soloists were vying with each other for the palm of the evening. No doubt the short interval between the last two concerts, which arose from a "Busstag" (solemn day of prayer and repentance, on the eve of which no concerts may be held) falling on the 24th November, had proved beneficial to the hard-worked members of our orchestra. The two soloists on this occasion were Fräulein Mary Krebs and Signor Salvatore Marchesi, both well known to the musical world. The former, who lately returned to Dresden after her brilliant career in London, played Beethoven's concerto for piano (E flat major) with orchestra accompaniment. Her delivery of this colossal work bordered on the marvellous, and the brilliant execution she exhibited was received with bursts of applause from the largest audience that has been witnessed this season. Signor Marchesi, "Grand-Ducal Saxe-Weimar Kammeränger," as the programme announced, sang the Bass-air from Handel's "Alexander-Fest," "Vendetta! Timotes esclama!"—and subsequently the two well-known airs of Figaro—"Aprite un po' quegli occhi"—and "Non più audrai!"—from "Les Noces de Figaro," the latter air after the encores with which the audience greeted this excellent singer, had subsided.

A Leipzig paper writes "Everything appears finished in his singing; a splendid voice, excellent school and symmetrical, pearly finish, but above all the enrapturing vivacity of his delivery, which produces an irresistible effect on his hearers. Signor Marchesi's singing reminded us of Lablache and Tamburini in their prime. However inferior the Italians may be as composers, one fact is established; they have been and will remain our masters and models in singing."

The instrumental pieces consisted of Mendelssohn's Overture, "A fair sea and happy voyage," and Beethoven's Symphony, Eroica.—Orchestra.

COLOGNE.—Music flourishes well in Cologne. The third Gesellschafts-Concert, which took place lately, in the large room of the Gürzenich, under the direction, as usual, of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, was, according to the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, one of the most successful ever known. The following pieces constituted the programme: Part I.—1. N.W. Gade, overture, "Im Hochland." 2. Aria from Fidelio, Beethoven (Mlle. Therese Tietjens from London). 3. Servais, Fantasia for Violoncello (Herr Alexander Schmidt). 4. Aria from Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Mozart (Mlle. Therese Tietjens). 5. IV. Symphony, in B flat major, Beethoven.—Part II.—5. F. Hiller, "Concert-Overture," No. II. 7. F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Finale to the opera of Lorely (Leonore, Mlle. Therese Tietjens).

The concert was a very fine one; the audience was in every respect satisfied, bestowing on every piece liberal applause, which began at once with Gade's Overture and increased with each successive number.

The star of the evening was Mlle. Therese Tietjens. The air she was announced in the bills to sing from Cherubini's Medea, we heard only at the rehearsal. At the concert itself, probably in conformity with the advice of musicians who knew the public, Leonore's grand air from Fidelio was substituted. This is certainly, for a first appearance, a far more thankful composition than Cherubini's Andante written in Gluck's style; the world of the present day has nearly lost all love for pure classical singing; it will no longer be entranced and delighted, calmly and mildly excited; it wants to be roused, shaken and jolted; it requires not merely emotion but, so to speak, commotion. The fair and celebrated singer, however, seeks and attains her peculiar greatness especially in classic style, that is in that style which is characterized by moderation, without which nothing truly artistic is possible; in that style which detests Realism as the ruin of artistic expression, because it degrades the ideal element of song to the mere screaming of nature; in that style which causes the soul to speak in tone, but which, even in the midst of the most violent inward agitation, never forgets that Art always demands the Beautiful. This classical type characterized in an extraordinary degree the execution by Mlle. Tietjens of the airs of Leonore and Constance, as well as the scene from Lorely.

The Second Part of the concert began with a composition written by Ferdinand Hiller during the last few years, namely: his second "Concert-Overture," which, without programme or inscription, as the genial production of purely musical creative power, that does not need to trouble itself about outward things, excited the enthusiasm of the audience quite as much as, if not more than, it excited it four years ago, and caused the composer to be loudly applauded and more than once recalled.

The four members of the Parisian Quartet, MM. Maurin, Sabatier, Mas and Chevillard, lately gave a numerously attended concert in the rooms of the Hotel Disch. They played two of Beethoven's Quartets, Op. 59, No. 1, in F, and Op. 130, in B flat major. Between the Quartets, Herr Ferdinand Hiller performed one of his newest pianoforte compositions: "Gavotte; Sarabande; Courante" in an especially masterly fashion, and, for his execution as well as for the above cleverly written pieces, was uproariously applauded and repeatedly called on to bow his thanks. The "Gavotte" and the "Courante" more particularly are amazingly effective, but they require a fine performer. The playing of the Parisian artists was exhibited to the greatest perfection in their execution of the B flat major Quartet.—London Mus. World.

BREMEN. At the second so-called Private Concert, the programme included, besides Gade's Symphony, IV, B flat major, together with the overtures to Coriolan and Oberon, a highly interesting "Divertimento," by Mozart, for two violins, tenor, violoncello and two horns, Herr David from Leipzig taking the first violin part. The composition consists of six movements, Allegro; Andante con Variazioni; Menuetto; Adagio; Menuetto; and Rondo Allegro. Herr David played, also, his own Fantasia on a theme from Mozart, while Signor Salvatore Marchesi sang the air "Vendetta" from Handel's Alexander's Feast, and "Aprite un po' gli occhi" from Le Nozze di Figaro.

MUNICH. From the Unterhaltungs-blatt we translate part of a report of the third subscription concert of the Musical Academy, which took place in the Odeon, Nov. 27. It opened with a new orchestral Suite (the third) by Franz Lachner, to whom credit is given for having modernized this ancient form, so that it pleases the ear of this time almost as much as the Symphony. The work is praised in the highest degree, and is said to surpass in freshness and creative energy all that the composer has done before. "These Suites," says the critic, "are altogether the most significant instrumental works which the last decades have produced. Like no other contemporary, Lachner understands the instruments and knows how to work effects with their coloring, their character, in the noblest manner." The Suite (in F minor) has six movements: Preludium, Intermezzo, Chaconne, Sarabande, Alla Gavotte, and Courante. Mendelssohn's Hebriden overture formed the closing piece. The intervening numbers were an air from Tell, by Frl. Deinet, a Terzet from Spohr's Zemire und Azor, and a contribution by a young American pianist, known to most of our readers, of whom the German critic says:

"A rare guest figured on the programme this evening—Chopin, the little known in Munich. . . Herr Petersiles, of Boston, played the Andante and Rondo from his Concerto, op. 11. Musical conception, certainty and cleanness of play, a round, free, noble tone, tasteful delivery and great fluency are the chief excellencies of this young artist. He uses the pedal but seldom, and we know how to appreciate the moderate use of it, seeing how often it is made to cover up imperfect passages. His playing is more solid than brilliant,—also a great compliment for him. Let him add to these excellences a more powerful touch and a more marrowy tone, and the young artist will be able to compete successfully with the most renowned pianists."

CRYSTAL PALACE. (From an article in the London Times):

We allude exclusively to the performances given Saturday after Saturday, with rare intervals, from October of one year, to April or May of the next, in the handsome, spacious, and now comfortably enclosed music-room facing the great Handel orchestra. The Saturday Concerts have advanced by slow degrees to their present position; but though their progress was gradual, it was not the less sure; and no step forward has ever been retraced.

A "fanatico per la musica"—"la musica classica," strictly speaking—with plenty of leisure at disposal, might do worse than take up his quarters at Sydenham during the winter and spring months. It is a long way hence to Leipzig; and it is, moreover, a question whether—inferiority in numerical force allowed for—the "fanatico" could not hear a symphony played with even greater spirit, accuracy and finish, by the Crystal Palace orchestra, under Herr Manns, than by the famous orchestra of the Gewandhaus, once directed by Mendelssohn, now by Herr Reinecke, one of the Mendelssohn shadows to be met with in almost every German city. At any rate, we are unable to recall more utterly irreproachable performances of the second and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, the symphonies in G minor and A minor of Mozart and Mendelssohn, than recently at the Crystal Palace, before audiences whose growing appreciation is satisfactory evidence of the benefit these concerts are conferring. Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), is one of those works which too rarely go from one end to the other without some point or points open to criticism; but in the instance under notice, reading and execution were equally unassailable. Could Marie von Weber have listened to this clear, precise, and masterly performance, he would hardly have risen from it with the persuasion that the composer of the symphony was "ripe for a mad-house," at all events, not without incurring the risk of being declared by calmer and more impartial judges than himself, fit for the very asylum to which he was condemning Beethoven. Other symphonies have been produced—among them, that of Haydn in B flat, (No. 8), with the "obbligato" (not "obligato," as Herr Manns spells it,) violin parts in the finale, and the seventh (in F) of Herr Niels Gade, whose "No. 1" (in C minor) elicited such an enthusiastic panegyric from Mendelssohn, but who, even in this last and perhaps his best considered work, can scarcely be said to have realized the hopes of that generous-minded patron.

In the way of overtures, Herr Manns has given Weber's "Oberon" and "Der Freischütz," Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille," Taubert's "Tempest," Gounod's "Nonne Sanglante," and Schumann's "Brant von Messina." Of the three first-named universally recognized models, it is unnecessary to say a word. Herr Wilhelm Taubert, one of the two conductors at the Royal Opera, Berlin, is about as plodding and about as dry a composer as his confederate Herr Dorn. Arcades ambo! Taubert, according to Herr Manns, "is a musical conservative," and, together with others, has helped to keep in check the "great extravagances of the seductive Wagner-Liszt doctrine." Though unable to understand the "seductive" nature of that particular doctrine, we cannot but think that half the influence it at one time seemed to be acquiring was due to the prevalence of laborious dullness, as exhibited in the writings of composers like Herren Taubert and Dorn, who, in their operas "Macbeth" and "Die Niebelungen," for example—to name only two out of many,) have afforded convincing arguments to Herr Wagner & Co., that something new was absolutely wanting if not exactly what Herr Wagner & Co. were ready and willing to prescribe. The overture to "The Tempest," we are further advised by Herr Manns, "seems intended to portray the sorrowful meditations of the banished Duke of Milan and his final triumph over his enemies," Be it so. The overture to "La Nonne Sanglante," M. Gounod's second grand opera (brought out in Paris, October, 1854), is by no means one of the most attractive works of that eminent composer, who has seldom been less happily inspired than while setting to music the dreariest libretto to which the market-name of Scribe was probably ever allied. Worthier consideration in all respects is the gloomy overture with which Robert Schumann endeavored to convey his impressions of the terrible play of Schiller. The overture to "The Bride of Messina" is as deeply imbued with the spirit of its composer as anything that came from his pen. It exhibits the same want of continuous developing power which adverse critics persist in laying to his charge, the same vagueness in the melodic outline of the themes, the same monotonous style of instrumentation. Nevertheless, it enchains attention by its intense earnestness from the first bar to the last, and not seldom rises to the height of impassioned expression. The subject was thoroughly congenial to the melancholy brooding mind of Schumann, whose intellectual aspiration, had it been sustained by richness of invention and technical skill in proportion, would have placed him in a certain sense nearer to Beethoven than perhaps any other composer—the more liberally gifted Schubert not excepted.

It is the want of plastic or creative power that chiefly stood in Schumann's way; and the profound self-consciousness of that want imparts to music one of its most striking, if not most satisfying characteristics. Yet such a work as the overture to Schiller's tragedy must always be heard with more or less absorbing interest. It exhibits an "upward-striving" that proceeds from a great soul, and an abhorrence of commonplace which enlists the sympathies of all who cannot endure that Art should be desecrated to any trivial or unworthy end. As much cannot be said for the purely mechanical and colorless music of Herr Franz Lachner, from whose second Suite, in E minor, Herr Manns has brought forward specimens.

SIGNOR ARDITI'S CONCERTS. More than once he has given as many as four different overtures by four different masters on the same evening, and this in addition to other genuine attractions. Since we last noticed the concerts another genial specimen of the French Méhul, the "Minstrel of Givet," has been brought forward in the shape of his overture to Les deux Aveugles de Toledo, which is quite Spanish in cast, and quite as characteristic as the Chasse de Jeune Henri—a favorite, it would appear, to judge by its frequent appearance in the bills. Then we have had two overtures to Der Vampyr, by Marschner and Lindpaintner, each of whom composed an opera under that name. Lindpaintner's is, perhaps, the better of the two, the influence of Weber being so potent with the late Hanoverian Kapellmeister as to lead occasionally (Euryanthe to wit) even to downright plagiarism. Both, however, were worth hearing. Another and a still better overture by Lindpaintner—to the ballet of Joko le Singe de Brésil, the overture to Spohr's early opera, Pietro von Abano; and most pleasant of all, Schubert's to Rosamunde—the last two all but unknown to London—have gratified admirers of the purely German school. Cherubini's overture L'Hotelier Portugaise—an opera composed in 1798 (for the Salle Favart), of which little but the prelude and a trio is now ever heard; and that to his Lodoiska, composed in 1791 (the year Mozart died), were equally interesting, as specimens of the illustrious Florentine, whose music, pronounced "too learned" by his countrymen, is, perhaps, though not nearly so well known as it deserves, better known anywhere than in Italy. Add to this already rich selection five overtures of Rossini, including the now rarely heard, but not the less charming, Italiana in Algeri—composed in 1813, the same year as Tancredi and Aureliano in Palmyra; several of Auber's—not the least welcome being those to Le Philre, (the libretto of which was afterwards appropriated by Donizetti for his L'Elisir d'Amore), and Le Dieu et la Bayadere; Mendelssohn's poetical dream of a Calm Sea and Happy Voyage; the overture to Fernand Cortez, the second grand opera composed by Spontini for Paris (produced in 1809, two years after La Vestale had made him famous); and the most popular dramatic preludes of Herold, Weber, &c.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 6, 1866.

A Great Musical Week.

The Christmas holidays, this time, brought a remarkable quantity and variety of great music. In the eight days ending with the last night of the old year, the great year 1865, there could be heard in Boston three Oratorios, given on a grand scale; a Symphony Concert of the highest order of programme; Beethoven's Mass in C, with orchestra, (at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, under the direction of Mr. WILLCOX); and, in several Music Hall Organ Concerts, several of the grander Fugues of Bach and Sonatas of Mendelssohn. It was a period of real musical enthusiasm.

THE ORATORIOS.

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY did well to avail themselves of the presence of Mme. PAREPA, to produce three Oratorios in better style, than they have been able to do since the Festival in May, and even better than then in point of leading solo artists. It was at an immense price that they purchased this advantage, the single services of the prima donna (cornet thrown in one night) weighing equal in the contract to all the attraction of the Oratorio itself, and all the means employed in its production, the chorus of five hundred, the orchestra, the organ, the conductor, and the other solo singers, one of whom, at least, Miss PHILLIPS, would have been a host alone. Certainly such music with such rendering even without Parepa, would have drawn large and remunerative houses. But the Society found their advantage in the arrangement nevertheless; it enabled them to double prices, and the prestige of the one great name swelled the full house to a crowded one. The Society have no reason to complain of the result, and certainly Mr. Bateman has not. Mme. Parepa of course added greatly to the value of the concerts; but it were extravagant to suppose that she or any single singer could have doubled it.

1. "Judas Maccabeus." Saturday evening Dec. 22. A large, but not a crowded house. It was a very much better performance than that given in the autumn. The chorus was both larger and more carefully drilled. We felt no weakness this time in the contraltos, on the contrary a full, rich, solid volume of tone. And, though there is still often lack of instantaneous, bold and sure beginning all together in the taking up of points, nearly all the choruses (so far as we could judge from a position too near and against one wing of the vocal mass) went both with spirit and precision. Of the character of these choruses, their heroic vein, their beauty and grandeur, each one of Handel's happy inspirations, each so individual, we have spoken before. There was no dullness from beginning to end; they kept the listeners in a buoyant mood.

It was just the music for PAREPA. Her recitative was splendid, simply eloquent, clear, large. The air "From mighty Kings" was made for such a singer, one who has so much voice, so bright and clear, so flexible, so perfectly schooled to equal, easy execution, so never failing in breath and never reminding you of labor there, so true, so musical. A hearty, honest, large, brilliant, nobly sustained style of singing is what this music demanded, and all this she has. But, demanding no more, it opened a temptation even to so great an artist to step over into the region of bravura now and then; to seize now and then an opportunity to introduce a high note because it was a good one in her voice, and in one or two other ways to modify the text of Handel. This, as placing the singer's self first, is objectionable.

In the lovely duets about "Liberty" and "Peace," her voice blended expressively with the rich and beautiful contralto of Miss ANNIE CARY, whose lower tones are of a purer and more refined quality than Parepa's (the latter's voice, though still strong, losing its characteristic beauty down there).

The quiet, even charm of Miss Cary's singing is so agreeable, so musical, that we can hardly complain of a certain lack of animation in her manner.—Mr. RUDOLPHSEN's recitative: "I feel the Deity within" was excellent, as well as the air following: "Arm, arm, ye brave." In chaste, solid, manly oratorio style the Society never improve upon him in their choice of a Basso.—Mr. CASTLE was a great improvement upon the last Tenor; in point of voice especially; for, though it seems rather of a light, elastic quality, it is strong and has a good deal of reach, while it is musical and sympathetic. He surprised us by the manly vigor with which he sang "Sound an alarm!" There was plenty of "silver trumpet" in it. But in his general style he is far from showing a true oratorio education; the habits of English opera and ballad singing, and the applause of unmusical publics, were too manifest in bad accentuation and pronunciation, unrefined cadenzas, &c. With right serious study Mr. Castle may become an excellent oratorio singer. In point of style, of well-conceived, consistent rendering of his music, Mr. SOMERS, in the small parts allotted to him, pleased us more than Mr. Castle.

"The Messiah," on Christmas Eve, drew an enormous audience; every seat in the hall had been sold several days before the concert, and extra seats were inserted wherever a few feet of room could be found.

The Messiah is known and loved by all, and with many all over New England it has become part of the religious observance of Christmas to attend the annual performance by the Handel and Haydn Society, a custom now of half a century. To the student of such music, who has heard it all his lifetime, while his conviction of its greatness never lessens, it can hardly have the fresh attraction of some only less great works more seldom heard, unless there be some remarkable inspiration or perfection in the execution. The grand choruses are what wear the best, for there the miracle lies wholly in the music. The songs are marvellously beautiful, significant and deep; but more and more they call for singers of the highest stamp, singers who combine all technical accomplishment with soul, imagination, inspiration. It was a great thing to hear Jenny Lind sing "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" scarcely has the announcement of the sublime air been tempting to us since, though we have often heard it given in a manner that exacted large credit. Mme. PAREPA, as we have before intimated and have heard many others own, with all her generous, noble attributes of song, with her easy supremacy in nearly all that constitutes the singer's art, with her infallible routine of excellence, is not particularly a sympathetic singer, and never seems to us to sing out of a very deep nature. In this song the tones, phrases, passages were not to our sense transfigured by fine inspirations (altered they were sometimes, slightly, but that was an outward change, and questionable). It was a fine display of voice and vocal art, with just conception and good taste; but not for one instant did the touch of genius and imagination transport us beyond thought of the singer and the scene. This power we have all felt in less accomplished artists than Parepa, to say nothing of greater ones, like Lind, Sontag, Bosio, Tietjens, &c. And even on the score of taste, if the listener was raised to rapture by the song, was he not dashed to earth again by the gratuitous alteration (not inspired, but literal) at the closing cadence? "Rejoice greatly," free, bright, graceful as it was, has more rejoiced us before now. The recitative: "There were shepherds" was indeed resplendent, and sent a pure and pleasing thrill through every heart; the voice and style were worthy of the theme. And on the whole, as compared with any but the very few greatest, this lady's rendering of the soprano solos in the Messiah was a memorable experience.

In the sympathetic quality, depth of feeling, warmth and fulness of expression, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS came the nearest to her audience in her artistic and true womanly singing of the contralto airs, especially in "He was despised." She seemed not, however, to have her full strength and richness of voice; it was a little hollow, and the breath difficult,—owing doubtless (as Elijah afterwards proved) to a cold. Mr. CASTLE pleased us more generally in the Messiah than in Judas; probably because he had had more study of the music. Still there were the same faults of style and vanities of self-indulgent humoring of the text. He was remarkably successful in the terribly taxing air: "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron,"—far more so than in passages like: "Thy rebuke."—Mr. M. W. WHITNEY has a noble voice and made on the whole an excellent impression. In the "Trumpet" air, Mr. LEVY's accompaniment came in for its large share of applause. The chorus singing for the most part should rank with the best memories of the old Society; some of those "kinky" choruses, so thick-set with short answering phrases, sounded unusually clear. The solemn Quartets in the last part, alternating with chorus, sung by such voices, were exceedingly impressive.

"Elijah" (Saturday, last night of the year) packed the great hall even fuller than the Messiah; besides, extra seats, there seemed to be hundreds standing.

Such conditions are not the most favorable for real sincere, musical enjoyment of any music, and herein one often finds two elements in conflict; successes which astonish the quidnuncs, which are good sensational material for newspapers, and at which managers rub their hands with glee, often offer but delusive opportunities for real intrinsic musical enjoyment; the external occasion is too overshadowing (not to speak of all the restless fidget of the crowd) and breaks the inward spell, in some sort paralyzes the mind's receptivity of fine tone influences. "Fit audience, though few" is what nothing needs so much as music. But, whether with the crowd or in spite of the crowd, it was a great performance of Elijah, the greatest yet heard in America. We could not resist the feeling that it was so, although we were again seated where we could not always feel sure whether we heard or only imagined some parts of the chorus beside the soprano. The ensemble was certainly spirited, sonorous, massive and euphonious. The vast musical pictures were all vivid, unmistakable, the back-ground and perspective admirable. The "Rain" Chorus flooded all before it, and the crowd seemed almost set upon a repetition. One only missed the noble orchestra of the May festival, but even the orchestra was larger than usual and quite effective (save that downward plunge, cascade, of violins, which we could wish the rain to have swollen to greater volume). To our sense, too, some of the choruses were a little too fast, while on the other hand the tempo of some of the solos dragged.

Mme. PAREPA was perfectly at home in the great soprano passages. They suited her voice admirably, and more than before she seemed to lose herself (the true way of being at home) in the music and dramatic situation. In the "Youth's" part of the dialogue before the rain, the voice and style were youth and purity itself; and in the sublime ascription: "Holy, holy!" the effect was all one could desire. The part of the widow, the air "Hear ye Israel," and indeed all parts were admirable, true to the text and to the feeling. Miss PHILLIPS never more commended herself than in the airs: "Woe unto thee" and "O rest in the Lord" (albeit the latter was a little slow). The glorious richness and roundness of her voice had all returned; her art is now so perfect that you perceive nothing of that thickness of utterance which clung to her so long as a physical obstacle; while in chaste expression and feeling (not, as sometimes, of the overdone, Italian opera sort) she won the finer sympathy of all her audience. Miss HOUSTON, who has fine inspirations sometimes, and always a right earnest musical enthusiasm and fine voice, won no mean recognition in the secondary soprano parts; and the Angel Trio by these three large voices was uncommonly satisfactory. Mr. CAMPBELL in voice and presence is larger, richer, more commanding than Mr. Rudolphsen, but in style much inferior, though some of his renderings made a very good impression. His musical schooling and associations have been of the same character with Mr. CASTLE's, whose rendering of the tenor pieces was what we might have expected, pains-taking and in some sense highly successful. The Quartet, and especially the Double Quartet, sounded remarkably well.

We believe the whole audience went home delighted, grateful to the Handel and Haydn Society and its indefatigable conductor, its organist, chorus, orchestra, particularly grateful to Mme. Parepa and Miss Phillips, and to all who had so successfully ministered to so high a pleasure. That week's experience certainly developed a great deal of true musical enthusiasm.—The Society will not relax its efforts, but proceed immediately to the study of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first orchestral concert under the management of a committee of the Harvard Musical Association, last Thursday afternoon, proved a signal vindication of the plan. By all witnesses, and in the best sense, it has been pronounced a success. The audience was precisely of the character which it was sought to bring together, and even more numerous than had been at first expected (though far from a crowd); so that financially the six concerts are now fully guaranteed, without any compromise of dignity or purity of programme, and it is plain that what has been done once can be done again. We never have known a more delightful audience, one so sympathetic, so refined in tone, such earnest listeners (through a long Concerto or Symphony you could almost hear the clock tick); in short, all the influences in the room were harmonious and encouraging, the sphere was musical. And we have never known a more delighted audience, or such general voice of approval, showing that it is possible to interest and charm a large audience for two hours with the best kind of music, without the least admixture of ought but the best. For this was the programme:

1. Overture to "Euryanthe,".....Weber.
2. Violin Concerto, in E minor,.....Mendelssohn.
Allegro appassionato—Andante—Allegro vivace.
Herr Carl Rosa.
3. Chaconne, for Violin,.....Bach.
(With Mendelssohn's Piano-forte Accompaniment.)
Herr Carl Rosa.
4. Symphony, in G minor,.....Mozart.
Allegro—Andante—Minuetto—Finale.
5. Violin Solos:
a) Schumann's "Abendlied," arranged by Joachim.
b) Hungarian Air,.....Ferd. David.
c) "Am Springquell,".....
6. Overture: "Leonore," No. 8,.....Beethoven.

The orchestra numbered fifty instruments, with larger proportion of strings than has been usual in Boston (viz. 8 first violins, 8 second, 8 violas, 5 violoncellos, 4 and part of the time 5 double basses), while there were the usual pairs of wind instruments, with an excellent first bassoon for a wonder, and four horns. Strong hopes, even a positive promise at one time, had emboldened the Committee to expect an addition of six or eight more strings; but the men could not be had this time; there is reason to expect, however, that this department of the orchestra will grow from concert to concert. As it was, the fifty filled the ear well and the soul better; the fine intonations were well caught and realized.

It was evident that Mr. ZERRAHN had made the work of rehearsal critical and careful as far as time allowed, and that the musicians had caught the spirit of the enterprise and felt the dignity and interest of their calling as they cannot do in miscellaneous ad captandum concerts. Drudging in theatres, in bands, in balls, or giving lessons, most of our musicians find most of their employment somewhat benumbing and demoralizing to the artistic tone and temper. But here was an opportunity of the right kind, here they stood once more grouped within a sweet spot of Art's sunshine; old ideals warmed again. It is the aim of these concerts to furnish such opportunities, such inspirations for the musicians, to give them their nobler work to do, such as they certainly will most delight in, and on the other hand to ensure them just the audience which pure programmes and a sincere artistic tone, and no other, can unite their best efforts.

At first the very temperate response to the Euryanthe overture a little damped our courage. For it is a most brilliant, genial overture, and was brilliantly and nicely played. But it is somewhat unfamiliar here. The opening and closing tutti are full of brío and enthusiasm, quickening and strong; then there are lovely bits of cello, horn, bassoon and clarinet color, absorbing little episodes; and then a delicious reverie of violins and violas pianissimo divided into four-part harmony, as breezy and mysterious as the whisper of the pines. The fugato movement which then sets in is weak and aimless; Weber is not at home in that style of music; but how gloriously he gets out of the woods at last and is himself again! Perhaps the want of an unbroken climax in the whole progress of the composition, the cutting of the overture in two, as it were, by that violin episode, allows the attention of the general audience to drop away. Yet we believe it was enjoyed more generally and deeply than appeared; and still attention is better evidence than loud applause.

The G-minor Symphony of Mozart we cannot remember to have heard so nicely rendered in this city; there was an attention to minutiae, to lights and shades, unusual for us. The Andante and the Minuet (especially the fascinating Trio) were very clear and happy in the rendering. The first movement came nearer to the idea than ever before, but it seemed a little hurried, because some of the little answering phrases of single instruments did not flow in easily and unobtrusively enough; it is very difficult; and this Symphony is a very master-piece of art and genius, to be refined upon forever in rehearsal. The finale was really too rapid; it seemed as if the violins were bent on running away from the conductor. Mind, we are trying all we can to find fault; it is our duty now, if not before.

Let us reserve Leonora till we have talked of ROSA. The young violinist covered himself with glory and held his audience through two long solos and three little pieces in unalloyed delight and wonder. In the highest artistic sense, on the poetic side as well as the technical, never have we heard such admirable violin-playing in this city. If this young man of twenty-one is not already, he surely will be a great artist. It is in the rare beauty and searching sweetness of his tone; it is in his manly, graceful bowing, his clear, perfect phrasing, his light and shade and subordination of finished details to a harmonious whole. It is in the poetic temper of his playing, in the clearly poetic nature of the man, in his quick, clear, just conception of the music; in the sincere way in which that music fills him to the forgetting of himself; it is in his modesty, his fresh, ingenuous, unspoiled, natural behavior. He had the confidence and deep interest of his audience immediately, and he went on strengthening the hold to the end, though he played more than many a prudent self-seeking soloist would dare to play to any audience at one time. The Concerto by Mendelssohn and the Chaconne by Bach are perhaps the two greatest solos ever written for the violin; only Beethoven's Concerto can stand in the same great company. In the Concerto the tone seemed perhaps a little thin and the expression timid at the outset (such a vast hull!), but tone and player warmed as it went on; the Andante held the ravished listener in breathless silence; and for the first time here was the whole of that very long Concerto devoured without a falling off of appetite.

The Chaconne was a still more extraordinary performance; for there full polyphonic harmony is carried on by the single instrument through a long development of pregnant thoughts, with episodes and variations that anticipate many of the modern effects. It was played superbly, with a masterly grasp, and interested as such things seldom can in such a place. The interest was much enhanced by Mr. DRESSEL's tasteful and masterly playing of the piano part set to it by Mendelssohn. Artist-like, he is always modestly ready and happy for such good service; not eager to figure in announcements, preferring probably (as a neighbor of ours wittily suggested) to remain sub Rosa.

The three little pieces were charmingly grouped and very choice; Schumann's "Evening Song," as arranged by Joachim, with piano accompaniment, was altogether lovely, full of finest feeling, very short, but long to be remembered. Joachim has also set a remarkable orchestral accompaniment to it, which was to have been played on this occasion; but the parts, having been procured from New York, at once mysteriously vanished! nor could they be replaced in season. Rosa played all by heart!

Then came the glorious finale, the Leonora Overture, and great was the delight of the audience to see Carl Rosa, after all his efforts, slip into the orchestra amongst the violins and play because he could not help it. It was an important reinforcement in that peculiar piece, so full of violin-ity, and coked out the great violin crescendo not a little. The overture went inspiringly, and the company dispersed reluctantly, not having known a dull instant during those two hours.

The second concert, announced for the 18th, is unavoidably postponed to the 25th, on account of other engagements of the Music Hall; but the third will probably follow at a fortnight's interval, regaining the time lost. The next programme will consist largely of Beethoven: (Coriolanus overture, E flat Concerto, played by Otto Dresel, and 4th Symphony). A chorus of some 80 male voices will sing from Mendelssohn's Antigone, and smaller things with horn accompaniments, and the Melusina overture will close the feast.

We have yet to speak of the Organ performances of Mr. PEARCE, from Philadelphia, and of the delightful private concert of Mr. PARKER's singing club.

NEXT IN ORDER (to-night) comes the fifth and last of the choice soirées of Messrs. KREISSMANN and LEONHARD. The former will sing one of the Bach arias and several Schubert and Franz songs, and the latter will play, among other nice things, Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata.

Next Wednesday the ORCHESTRAL UNION will recommence their popular and charming Afternoon Concerts. They promise even better things than heretofore, and these will be the opportunities to hear new works.

CARLYLE PETERSILEA. By our summary of Music Abroad, under the head of Munich, it will be seen that this young Boston pianist has distinguished himself by playing in one of the best concerts of that German city. After several earnest years in Leipzig, he has now placed himself under the tuition of Liszt's son-in-law, Hans von Bülow, one of the most remarkable musicians of the age.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 2, 1866.—If we regard the scarcely yet past holiday season with the eye of a musician who discourses of public musical celebrations, we find it to have been deficient in interest; but, looking at the time from a broader standpoint, we must pronounce it one of the most significant, and universally observed seasons of rejoicing that it has ever been our good fortune to participate in. The feelings of relief, of elastic hope in the future, of restored confidence in the mission of this nation as leader of the future unity and freedom of mankind, all those feelings, which have pervaded the community for some months, seem to have found a glad and welcome expression in the peaceful, social merry-makings, the generous gifts and charities of the Christmas and New Year holidays. The very faces of the crowds passing in the thoroughfares have worn a common look of expansive and sympathetic pleasure; reminding us again how closely the destiny of individuals is connected with that of the race—as when the body of Mr. Lincoln passed through our streets, a universal expression of regret and reverence was visible in the faces of the people, and to a degree that struck foreigners especially with wonder; not that they were astonished that regret and reverence should be there; but the sympathetic brotherhood in joy or sorrow of a nation free to work its own good or evil is never met with outside of a republic.

It is to be regretted that the Peace Christmas has passed away from New York without a fitting musical celebration; but perhaps, considering the relations which the members of the musical profession here bear to each other, unless belonging to the same clique, as it is called, such a demonstration would have been difficult, to say the least. Service was performed on Christmas day, in the churches of the different religious denominations, accompanied by music of more or less merit; the Harmonic Society gave its fourteenth annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" in the hall of the Cooper Institute; and the band of the Seventh Regiment, assisted by some resident artists, gave a concert at the Academy of Music in the evening. The latter was unsuccessful in point of attendance, and does not call for any special remark.

The performance of the "Messiah" was attended by nearly three thousand persons; two thousand tickets were sold, and taking into consideration, besides, the known generosity of the society in the presentation of tickets to its friends, it will be seen that the capacities of the Cooper auditorium were fairly tested. The singing of the soloists, Misses BRAINARD and HUTCHINGS, Messrs. GEARY and CAMPBELL, was satisfactorily on the whole; and the choral performances showed an advance in precision and expression, upon those of last year. To make any comparison between the performances of this and the oratorio societies of England and Germany, would be simply absurd; for where they number their members by thousands sometimes, the Harmonic, our largest society, counts at present only between two and three hundred singing members! With such small means, and only one, and that a partial orchestral rehearsal, Mr. F. L. RITTER, the conductor of the society, deserves the highest credit for having obtained even so satisfactory a performance. When Mr. Ritter undertook the conductorship of this society, two years ago, it claimed only forty singers! and was encumbered by debt. These encumbrances are now happily cleared away, while, attracted by Mr. Ritter's disinterested enthusiasm and energy in the cause of the highest in art, new members are constantly joining the society, from among our best amateurs and church singers, and there is now really hope of a future for Oratorio here.

It is Mr. Ritter's intention to bring out Handel's "Samson" in the beginning of February, to be followed by Haydn's "Creation," a Cantata of Bach, that has never been heard here, and a miscellaneous selection from the works of the old church composers, besides parts of a Mass, written by one of our most eminent resident musicians. One great disadvantage to the performance of the "Messiah" was the fact of its taking place in a hall, so low-roofed, and deficient in acoustic advantages, as that of the Cooper Institute. New York sadly needs a large music hall; the Academy is unfit for other than operatic performances, and Irving Hall seems to be almost monopolized by social gatherings, balls, &c., this season; while Dodworth's Hall, the headquarters of classic chamber concerts, is too small. The new hall of the Messrs. Steinway, which is to be ready next year, and will contain an organ, will partly remedy this long felt want. The question of a large and well ventilated music hall, of superior architectural pretensions, and containing on ample organ, is agitated among some of our wealthy music lovers, who have seen that the existence of such a hall, unburdened by debt, and apart from managerial influence or private views, is a necessity to the advancement of pure art among us. Let us hope that this plan will not sleep, as that of a National Conservatory has so far done.

The programme for the season of Quartette Soirées, to commence early this month, under the leadership of Messrs. MASON and THOMAS, as usual, is, also as usual, promising and attractive to all lovers of this refined class of compositions. At the next Philharmonic concert, we are to have Berlioz's fantastic symphony, "An episode in the life of an artist," and Mr. Thomas promises us a new symphony by Bar-giel, at his next Symphony Soirée.

HARTFORD, CONN., JAN. 2.—The performance of the Messiah in so many cities about Christmas time shows how deeply rooted this sublime Oratorio is in the affections of the people. Its freshness is perennial, growing instead of withering with age. Every year it attracts greater and greater multitudes, and is listened to with deeper veneration and more exalted enthusiasm.

The performance of this work in Hartford is entitled to especial notice. The Beethoven Society (at the expense of nine hundred dollars) secured through Mr. Bateman the services of the magnificent PAREPA for the soprano solos. How splendidly she performed her task I need not say, for you have heard her in Boston. The audience (which filled every nook and corner of the Hall, at tickets two dollars and one dollar and a half "according to location") were in raptures and thoroughly enjoyed her grand voice and style of singing.

"Rejoice greatly" was especially beautiful, as jubilant in expression, as brilliant in execution. "Come unto me" was enthusiastically encored. Dr. GUILMETTE sang the bass solos. He was in grand voice and entered into the composer's meaning with all his great energies and vigorous style of singing. A beautiful young voice, Miss FRANKAN, a pupil of Mr. Barnett, sang finely the mezzo soprano part. Mrs. RISLY was the Alto, and Mr. PATTON, a French gentleman, sang the tenor part. He is a singer of much culture and experience. His voice is well adapted to this important and heavy style of music.

The Orchestra, mainly selected from the best musicians in Boston, performed their part admirably as usual. The Chorus singing of this Society reflects great honor not only on themselves but on their able conductor, Mr. BARNETT. They number about one hundred and forty voices. In purity of tone, the finest gradations of sound, delicacy and variety of effect they are admirable. They sing as one voice, they seem to be all moved by one impulse, all animated by one soul.

The labors of Mr. Barnett have been invaluable. His great ability as a musician, teacher and leader has gained him an eminent position in his profession; and the influence thence arising has been uniformly used in teaching his pupils and those he has under him, to understand and love the noblest works of the greatest masters.

The members of this excellent Society must be gratified to find their zeal and perseverance appreciated by the public. The "Beethoven" is growing in magnitude, and (if it is not so already) will soon become one of the most important musical institutions in the country.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- I know not why I love thee. Ballad. G. Gustave Fitze. 30
A fine, melodious song, well put together.
The bird that came in Spring. Song. Jules Benedict. 40
Describes the wild lay of the bird who preceded the leaves and flowers, has pretty cadences and bird songs in it, and is quite pleasing throughout.
Nightfall at sea. Reverie. Virgini: Gabriel. 30
The words are by Arthur Matheson, and are quite melodious. A very pure and sweet song.
Slumber song. (Schlummerlied.) Song. R. Franz. 40
Very sweet and slumberous.
Lady of the Lea. Sung by Parepa. Song. H. Smart. 40
I will not ask to press her cheek. V. Gabriel. 30
Two very "satisfying" songs, which impress you with the idea that the composers thoroughly understand their business, and are up to the classical standard.
November Rain. Song. Minnie A. Cole. 50
A little gem of a poem, with pretty music, rendering the pattering of the cold rain on the window pane almost audible.
The Candy Shop. Sung by the Buckleys. 40
Nerves. Comic song. T. Gordon. 30
Designed to raise a laugh, which the girl "without a nerve," and the other with the sweetest of trades may well do. Good music.
How fondly I think. Song and Chorus. J. W. Webster. 30
Call me thine own. Song. For Guitar. Bishop. 30

Instrumental.

- Felina Redowa. Four hands. A. Talery. 40
A lively dance, neatly arranged by G. W. Hewitt. It has three pages for each player, which is a good length for an agreeable duet. Easy.
Derniere pensee musicale. (Last musical thought of Meyerbeer.) Prelude in the 5th Act of "L'Africaine." 25
As one of the last strains in the opera, the title is appropriate. It belongs to the celebrated "Mance-nillier" scene, and has gained the special distinction (for an instrumental piece) of drawing out a round of applause.
"Les Hussards." Quadrille militaire. C. A. White. 60
Has an engraving, prettily illustrating a figure in the dance, on the title page.
A voice in the night. (Une voix dans la nuit.) Melodie for piano. A. Croises. 40
Of medium difficulty, and Nocturne style.
Wearing of the Green. Transcribed for Piano. A. Baumbach. 50

Books.

- THE SINGER'S MANUAL. W. Williams. $1.00
A church music book is not always just the thing for a singing school, and the Manual supplies a want that is a real one. It contains Lessons, Glee, Anthems and tunes in abundance.
LIBRETTOS OF "L'Africaine," and "Crispino e la Comare." Each 30
The opera is coming, so hasten to get these librettos, and study the plots thoroughly, humming over, meanwhile, the favorite airs which are inserted. Your enjoyment of the performance will be much enhanced.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Song.

O maiden with the pale blue eyes,
Thy heart is like a shining rill,
That, wrapp'd in Winter's icy guise,
Lies bound in slumbers deep and chill;
Yet thou art one to idolize!

For, fast enchained by magic spells,
Beneath the cold and wintry sky,
Deep hid within their frozen coils,
The self-same ripples folded lie
That sparkle in the Summer dells.

And ah! my fancy fondly tells
That, far within thy cold heart-deeps,
Where yet no germ of pity swells,
The golden light of promise sleeps;
The warmth of hidden passion dwells.

The meadows bloom 'neath April skies;
The flowers spring up to meet the rain;
When will the love I long for rise?
Have all my tears been shed in vain,
O maiden with the pale blue eyes?

Mozart's Letters.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF A COMPOSER.

From the Evening Post.

Jahn, Nissen and other German writers have given to the world biographies of Mozart, in which they have made extracts from his letters, as far as, in their opinion, they would interest the public; but another writer, Ludwig Nohl, of Munich, has shown his admiration of the great musician by forming a complete collection of the letters and publishing them entire. The work was translated into English by Lady Wallace, whose translations of Mendelssohn's letters have made the musical world so well acquainted with the personal history of that composer; and an American reprint comes to us from the press of Hurd and Houghton, under the title, "The Letters of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1769-1791), translated from the collection of Ludwig Nohl by Lady Wallace, with a portrait and facsimile; in two volumes."

The letters are arranged chronologically, the first being dated at Salzburg, in 1769, when the writer was thirteen years of age. It contains a long Latin sentence. The second is dated at Verona, in January, 1770, written half in German and half in Italian, to his sister. We next find Mozart at Milan, whence he writes gossip criticisms on the operas he sees, and shows an occasional play of humor, saying, for instance: "I know nothing new excepting that Herr Gellert, the Leipzig poet, is dead, and has written no more poetry since his death." To be sure, Mozart's letters during his younger years are very gay and cheerful, but they do not show much real wit. He is thoughtlessly intolerant of ugly women on the stage, and by no means insensible to the charms of a pretty ballet girl. Indeed, these letters are destitute of what is called literary merit, and it is safe to say that the only interest of about one half of them arises solely from the fact that they were written by Mozart; and even this fact fails to impart any interest to such trifles as this:

"MILAN, Carnival, Erchtag.

"Many kisses to mamma and to you. I am fairly crazed with so much business, so I can't possibly write any more."

Another feature of the book, which only serves to increase its bulk, is the fact that all the letters which Mozart wrote in Italian are given both in the original and in translation.

Most of letters at this period were written by young Mozart to his sister, mother and father. We give the following specimens:

"BOLOGNA, July 21, 1770.

"I wish mamma joy of her name-day, and hope that she may live for many hundred years to come, and retain good health, which I always ask of God, and pray to Him for you both every day. I cannot do honor to the occasion except with some Loretto bells, and wax tapers, and caps, and gauze when I return. In the mean time, good-bye, mamma. I kiss your hand a thousand times, and remain, till death, your attached son."

"MILAN, October 20, 1770.

"My dear Mamma: I cannot write much, for my fingers ache from writing out such a quantity of recitative. I hope you will pray for me that my opera ("Mitridate Ré di Ponto") may go off well, and that we soon may have a joyful meeting. I kiss your hands a thousand times, and have a great deal to say to my sister; but what? That is known only to God and myself. Please God, I hope soon to confide it to her verbally; in the meantime, I send her a thousand kisses. My compliments to all kind friends. We have lost our good Martherl, but we hope that by the mercy of God she is now in a state of blessedness."

The Mozart family, it is said, had sharp tongues, and used them vigorously. Wolfgang evidently inherited the family propensity for satire and ridicule, and in one of his letters thus describes one of his young pupils:

"Lately, at Stein's, he brought me a sonata of Becke's, but I think I already told you this. Apropos, as to his little girl, any one who can see and hear her play without laughing must be Stein [stone] like her father. She perches herself exactly opposite the treble, avoiding the centre, that she may have more room to throw herself about and make grimaces. She rolls her eyes and smirks; when a passage comes twice she always plays it slower the second time, and if three times, slower still. She raises her arms in playing a passage, and if it is to be played with emphasis she seems to give it with her elbows and not her fingers, as awkwardly and heavily as possible. The finest thing is, that if a passage occurs (which ought to flow like oil) where the fingers must necessarily be changed, she does not pay much heed to that, but lifts her hands, and quite coolly goes on again. This, moreover, puts her in a fair way to get hold of a wrong note, which often produces a curious effect. I only write this to give you some idea of piano-forte playing and teaching here, so that you may in turn derive some benefit from it. Herr Stein is quite infatuated about his daughter. She is eight years old, and learns everything by heart. She may one day be clever, for she has genius, but on this system she will never improve, nor will she ever acquire much velocity of finger, for her present method is sure to make her hand heavy. She will never master what is the most difficult and necessary, and, in fact the principal thing in music, namely, time."

At Mannheim he heard two organists, of whom he writes:

"They have two organists here; it would be worth while to come to Mannheim on purpose to hear them—which I had a famous opportunity of doing, as it is the custom here for the organist to play during the whole of the Benedicte. I heard the second organist first, and then the other. In my opinion the second is preferable to the first; for when I heard the former, I asked, 'Who is that playing on the organ?' 'Our second organist.' 'He plays miserably.' When the other began, I said, 'Who may that be?' 'Our first organist.' 'Why, he plays more miserably still.' I believe if they were pounded together, something even worse would be the result. It is enough to kill one with laughing to look at these gentlemen. The second at the organ is like a child trying to lift a millstone. You can see his anguish in his face. The first wears spectacles. I stood beside him at the organ and watched him with the intention of learning something from him; at each note he lifts his hands entirely off the keys. What he believes to be his forte is to play in six parts, but he mostly makes fifths and octaves. He often chooses to dispense altogether with his right hand when there is not the slightest need to do so, and plays with the left alone; in short, he fancies that he can do as he will, and that he is a thorough master of his organ."

He is equally bitter on his brother composers:

"MANNHEIM, November 20, 1777.

"The gala began again yesterday [in honor of the Elector's name-day]. I went to hear the mass, which was a spick-and-span-new composition of Vogler's. Two days ago I was present at the rehearsal in the afternoon, but came away immediately after the Kyrie. I never in my life heard anything like it; there is often false harmony, and he rambles into the different keys as if he wished to drag you into them by the hair of your head; but it neither repays the trouble, nor does it possess any originality, but is only quite abrupt. I shall say nothing of the way in which he carries out his ideas. I only say that no mass of Vogler's can possibly please any composer who deserves the name. For example, I suddenly hear an idea which is not bad. Well, instead of remaining not bad, no doubt it soon becomes good? Not at all! it becomes not only bad, but very bad, and this in two or three different ways: namely, scarcely has the thought arisen when something else interferes to destroy it; or he does not finish it naturally, so that it may remain good; or it is not introduced in the right place; or it is finally ruined by bad instrumentation. Such is Vogler's music."

As time proceeds the character of Mozart's letters gradually changes. No longer a prodigy, he begins to experience the trials as well as the triumphs of a great musician's life. At Paris, notwithstanding his wide reputation, he is subjected to the insolence of rich patrons, and he writes an almost amusing description of a visit to a Duchess de Chabot, at whose house he was kept waiting in a large cold room while the guests, to whom he had been invited to play, were chatting away without paying the slightest attention to him.

In July, 1778, Mozart lost his mother, and describes her death in a really affecting manner. In the same letter he states that "the ungodly arch-villain Voltaire has died miserably like a dog." For some time thereafter Mozart's letters are overlaid with complaints about the bad treatment he received from the Archbishop of Salzburg, and with rather unkind remarks about other persons. For instance, he says that Clementi is a good player of thirds, "but in all other respects he has not an atom of taste or feeling—all is mere mechanism."

Pecuniary affairs also trouble him, particularly as he intends to get married; and he also has a great deal of trouble with his future mother-in-law. At the same time he was the object of cabals and intrigues without number. His merit as a composer was criticized and his character assailed. It seems incredible that the great Mozart could have been sneered at by rivals and have been the victim of all the petty jealousies for which the members of the musical profession are unpleasantly noted. Yet such was the fact. The reading of his letters proves this. They also prove his strong domestic affections and a genial disposition, rendered somewhat irritable by troubles and annoyances. They prove a high religious tone of mind, marred by a tendency to fault-finding. They show the man as he was, with mixed virtues and faults, but hardly entitled to the eulogy of his biographer, who describes him as "a man whose mission in this world seems to have been entirely fulfilled, to whom it was given to link together the godlike in humanity, the mortal with the immortal—a man whose footprints not all the storms of time can efface,—a man who, amid all his lofty aims, esteemed the the loftiest of all to be the elevation of humanity."

The incident of the "Last Requiem," which Mozart wrote believing it to be for himself, is familiar to all; but his last written words were also prophetic. They were at the close of a letter he wrote to his wife on the 14th of October, 1791, and were these.

"P. S.—Kiss Sophie for me. To Siesmag I send two good fillips on the nose, and a hearty pull at his hair. A thousand compliments to Stoll. Adieu! 'The hour strikes! Farewell! We shall meet again!'"

The quotation is from the grand trio in the "Magic Flute."

Beethoven's Letters.

"Beethoven,"* says Schindler—as we are reminded by the Berlin Echo—(l'ami de Beethoven, as he was fond of describing himself on his cards, after the composer's death), "was, in his political opinions, a republican, being more especially induced to be one by his genuinely artistic nature. Plato's Republic had become part and parcel of his very flesh and blood, and it was by such principles that he judged all the constitutions in the world. Thus he wanted everything to be arranged as Plato had prescribed. He lived in the firm belief that Napoleon intended nothing less than to republicanize France on such principles, and this—in his opinion—was the commencement of a state of universal happiness. Hence his enthusiastic veneration of Napoleon." Subjoined to the above is the well-known story of the paroxysm of indignation into which Beethoven was thrown on receiving the intelligence of Napoleon's coronation as Emperor, at the very moment Beethoven was about to dedicate the Sinfonia Eroica to him. In this relation of Schindler's the most interesting part probably is his statement that: Beethoven wanted to see everything arranged on the model of Plato's Republic, and regarded Napoleon as such a follower of Plato. Considering the lively interest which Beethoven took in general political events—his best years, too, agreed with the period of the French Republic—we should be compelled without more ado to doubt his sanity and at once to declare him cracked, if Plato's Republic with all its palpable absurdities had really and truly become "part and parcel of his very flesh and blood." In this sense we feel inclined to look upon Schindler's views as erroneous, an evil, by the way, with which we commonly meet when people of subordinate capacity publish their pictures of eminent men, and of men who even stand absolutely alone, as truthful ones. The matter, however, assumes a different aspect when Herr von Köchel seeks to cast doubt upon the gist of Schindler's story generally. A reason for this he finds in a letter of Beethoven's to the Arch-Duke Rudolph. He says, page 12:

"He" (Beethoven) "expressed enthusiastic delight when the Arch-Duke dedicated to him, as his master, his 'Pianoforte Variations' on a theme given him by Beethoven, and acknowledged himself on the title page 'his pupil.' Beethoven's Letters No. 37, 38, 39, 43, 45, overflow with allusions to the fact. In these letters Beethoven calls 'the Variations a masterpiece,' and the Arch-Duke 'a competitor for the laurels of fame,' 'his most gracious pupil, a favorite of the Muses,' continuing (Letter 38) thus: 'My thanks for the surprise and gracious favor (the Dedication), with which I have been honored. I scarcely dare express either by word of mouth or in writing, for I stand too low, even if I wished, or most earnestly desired it, to return like with like.'"

Hereupon, Herr von Köchel remarks:

"How can we make this phrase agree with Beethoven's republican principles as trumpeted forth by Schindler?" Well, if the question is one of explanatory art of this description, there are more 'Phrases' at our service. For instance, in the 60th Letter to the Arch-Duke, we find: 'If your Royal Highness would render me happy by a letter, I most humbly beg, etc.'" and immediately afterwards:

"If your Royal Highness would have the goodness, and if it is in according with your position to recommend the Mass to Prince Anton in Dresden, so that his Majesty the King of Saxony might subscribe to it, etc."

(The work to which allusion is here made is the so-called Grand Mass, which Beethoven, on the advice of several persons, had offered to the Kings of France, Prussia, etc). Referring to this same Mass, Beethoven speaks (Letter 61) of his "trifling talent." Still more striking is his dedication of the Ninth Symphony to the King of Prussia. The dedication commences with the words:

"Your Majesty! It is a great and happy event in my life that your Majesty should have been most graciously pleased to allow me most humbly to dedicate the present work to your gracious self."

Now, in one of the letters collected by Herr von Nohl mention is made in no very obscure terms of an Order. All this, however, and every thing similar which might with some trouble be collected, is placed in its proper light by a letter of Beethoven's to Pilat, the Editor of the Oesterreichischer Beobachter. It is, in substance, to the following effect:—

"I should account it an honor if you would have the kindness to mention, in your so universally esteemed paper, the fact of my having been created a foreign member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music. However little vanity and ambition I may possess, it may, perhaps, be advisable not to pass over in complete silence things of this kind, since in practical life we have to live and work for others to whom they may frequently prove advantageous."

It was considerations for definite practical circumstances which induced Beethoven to enter, with more or less tact and prudence, upon connections which appear to clash with his "republican" sentiments. But Beethoven was no republican in the sense that a practical politician, like Mazzini, for instance, is. His political opinions sprang, on the one hand, from the instinctive self-esteem of genius, which acknowledges only the minds "by the grace of God," and, on the other, from idealizing notions of the world generally, notions founded upon antique models, and his own peculiar conceptions of man's dignity. It was this mode of looking at things which caused him, ill, deaf, and worried by family troubles, to write the concluding movement—when taken objectively, a great mistake, but, subjectively, highly to be valued—of the Ninth Symphony, and we find an undoubted key to it in what he says to the Arch-Duke Rudolph (Letter 66 in Köchel):—

"May Heaven bless me through your Royal Highness, and may the Lord himself be ever over and with your Royal Highness. There is nothing higher than to approach the Godhead more nearly than other men, and to spread the rays of the Godhead among mankind here below."

If, in opposition to such views from out the writer's very soul, we preferred forming our opinion from separate detached expressions of feeling—constructing the entire man out of accidental symptoms of weakness and wrongheadedness—here, as elsewhere, it would be easy to produce a repulsive and distorted caricature, even of a most noble nature. Thus, in November, 1824, Beethoven writes as follows to Schott in Mayence about the Arch-Duke:

"I am sorry to inform you that it will still be a little longer before I send off the works. There was not so very much still to look over in the copies, but, not having passed the summer here, I am obliged to give two lessons a day at his Imperial Highness's, the Arch-Duke Rudolph. This bewilders me so that I am almost incapable of anything else. And yet I cannot live on what I have to receive; my pen alone can assist me to do so. Notwithstanding this, no consideration is shown either for my health or my valuable time."

It was also to Schott that Beethoven wrote shortly afterwards (17th December, 1824):—

"The Arch-Duke did not leave here till yesterday, and I was obliged to spend much of my time with him. I am beloved and eminently esteemed by him; but—a man cannot live on this, and the cry re-echoed from various quarters: 'He who has a lamp, pours oil in it,' has no effect here."

Now it is pretty generally known that the Arch-Duke caused the annuity settled upon Beethoven to be regularly paid, besides affording him material assistance on the dedication of different works and other occasions, while Beethoven—as is proved by his numerous letters of excuse—did not display in the matter of the lessons all the conscientiousness of a schoolmaster. But would any one be, on this account, justified in accusing Beethoven of ingratitude and calumny! The momentary ill-humor of genius is expressed very naively. Moreover, we must take into account Beethoven's deafness and other ailments, the oppression exerted by which increased a melancholy frame of mind, and, moreover, the especial care Beethoven exhibited for his giddy nephew. Isolated, and having no family of his own, Beethoven had bestowed all his personal kindness on Carl's father, and on Carl himself. For the first, according to repeated statements of his own, he had in a few years expended 10,000 florins; for the sake of the latter, he preferred contracting debts to changing one of the bank-notes lying in his desk. Numerous letters, with which the public have long been acquainted, afford, moreover, the most eloquent testimony of the great love with which he sought to conduct his nephew's education. It is true that, even in this, he committed mistakes. At any rate, it could not contribute towards the proper education of the frivolous youth that, side by side with the most admirable advice, and most touching outburst of feeling, such passages as the following should occur in the letters addressed to him:—"Write at once to say whether you have received this letter. I will send you a few lines for that Schindler, the contemptible object, as I do not want to have anything to do directly with the wretch." (Nohl, page 259—or (ibid, page 291): "My dear Son,—So we have to-day the joiner with the old—witch—at Asinanio's house, not to forget the pictures," &c.

By "Asinanio"—or, probably, more correct, "Asinaccio"—was meant, however, Beethoven's brother, and Carl's uncle, Johann. Lastly, what might not be said of Beethoven's endless complaints of want of money, of his letters to music-publishers on the same subject, as well as of the course he took with the London Philharmonic Society? Any observations would be all the more justifiable, because it is now authentically proved that, not only from the Arch-Duke, but, after various intermediate circumstances, even after the death of Prince Kinsky, and of Prince Lobkowitz, Beethoven received, up to the day of his death, a yearly sum which would alone have sufficed for him to live comfortably and respectably! (See Köchel, page 87). Nor have there been wanting persons to take advantage of these circumstances and charge Beethoven with being swayed by an unusual love of money. Apart from the separate facts and relations which would sufficiently explain this "Interest," without our being able to discover the fundamental feeling of egotism which characterizes an "interested" sentiment—apart from this, the peculiar nature of a creative genius like Beethoven has been totally overlooked. Busied with his own thoughts, which sprang up involuntarily in his brain, sustained by the consciousness of realizing himself truly in his compositions alone, the mere idea of dependence upon others for support must have been fearful for his organization, which consumed his strength—this very contradiction, which he plainly perceived, between the natural conditions of his life and the practical requirements of a position to be obtained or duties to be fulfilled for the sake of supporting existence must have rendered him doubly anxious and doubly inclined to take a sombre view of things. This is a trait he shares with Schopenhauer, but with this difference, that the latter, who originally possessed property which made him independent, did not display any special anxiety about his pecuniary circumstances till after he had suffered a very heavy loss and age was creeping upon him. "I should inevitably starve," he said to me once in 1852, "were I to lose my property," and then proceeded to descant upon the abnormal position of those who labored for mankind. Indeed, the similarity between Beethoven and Schopenhauer, as far as regards their dispositions and characters, is rather striking. The fundamental trait of melancholy, for instance, is clearly perceptible in Beethoven as long ago as 1787, that is to say, even in his youth. For instance, he writes in the above year from Bonn to Dr. Schade at Augsburg:

"I met my mother, but in the most pitiable state of health; she was suffering from consumption, and, at last, about seven weeks since, died after having gone through a great deal of suffering and pain. She was such a good and affectionate mother to me, my best friend! Oh! who was happier than I was, while I could yet pronounce the sweet name of mother, and it could be heard, and to whom can I utter it at present? To the dumb pictures of her, which my power of imagination creates? As yet, I have enjoyed but few pleasant hours since I have been here; during the whole period, I have suffered from shortness of breath, and cannot help dreading that it will end in nothing more or less than consumption; to this is to be added melancholy, which is for me almost as great an evil as my illness itself."

The peculiar energy of will, in contradiction to what is commonplace, is, in a great degree, common to both. No less so, a certain touch of sturdy humor allied to this and bordering on contempt for the world. At the same time, the two men were alike in the matter of "Resignation." Schopenhauer read Oupnekat over night, and, in the morning, played on the flute to calm his mind.—Beethoven read Plutarch, who "taught him to be resigned." Still he was a stranger to ascetic behavior, for in the same letter in which, on the 29th June, 1800, he makes the above statement, he burst out into the words: "Resignation! what a miserable resource, and yet it is the only one left me."—And—we might add—the first movement of the Sonata in C minor, Op. 3, together with the following strain of dreamy enthusiasm, shows his mode of being resigned. The disposition, too, displayed herein is precisely the same as that which predominates in the later Quartets; the transcendental tone partially prevailing in these, must not on any account be confounded with resignation properly so-called.

But all the more sharply did the composer and thinker diverge from each other in their objective representation of life itself. Whereas, in the case of Schopenhauer, a profoundly significant general conception was followed by a series of thoughts more than compensating by their striking truths for the faults of the first sketch, Beethoven loses himself more and more in a subjective direction, less adapted than any other for expressing with full justice any general worldly subject (as he attempts to do in the Ninth Symphony and the Grand Mass).

It may, perhaps, interest many persons to learn that Schopenhauer himself occasionally remarked he was said outwardly to resemble Beethoven. This may have arisen from their thick-set figures and the habitual expression of their faces. The resemblance between them in details could, on the other hand, have been but very small; their hair, eyes, nose, and mouth were quite different. The energy characterizing the upper part of the nose, and the broad chin, combined with the frank expression of extraordinary force of will, were, probably, common to both. To judge by what we have heard about Beethoven's skull, there does not appear to have been any particular similarity of construction between the skulls of the two.

As we happen to be speaking of the external appearance of the two, we may mention an antipathy common to both. "I think," writes Beethoven to Dr. Braunhoffer, "that stronger medicine is at length necessary, such, however, as does not tend to constipation. I might drink white wine and water, for I shall always feel a repugnance for that mephitic beer!" Neither of them thought much of St. Gambrinus.—But whoever is fond of playing with analogies would find a very wide field afforded him by a parallel between Schopenhauer as the philosopher, and Beethoven as the composer, of the will. People usually forget, however, that, in such matters, the characterizing element consists not in the matter, which is more or less identical, but in the completely different form of its representation. With regard, however, to the manner in which they struggled, on the other hand, with the outward representation, both have a great deal in common. Beethoven's handwriting and Schopenhauer's handwriting present, at the first glance, a confused and intricate tangle, springing from repeated efforts to clothe the idea originally conceived in the most complete and pregnant form. Clearly as both know from the outset what they really want to say, the first expression by no means satisfies them, and it is not till much casting to and fro, much re-writing and re-moulding, that they find the expression which they consider sufficient for the perfection of the work.

To return to the Letters, it may, in conclusion, be observed that in the naive directness with which the momentary impressions of the writers are mirrored in them, Beethoven and Schopenhauer again closely approached each other. They represent, to a certain extent, the uttermost limit—as regards sincerity—in the sentiment, which cannot be too strongly recommended especially to modern authors, of Seneca (Epist. 24): "Turpe est aliud sentire, aliud loqui, quanto turpius, aliud scribere, aliud sentire."

Of the industry and conscientious care displayed by both editors, the best proof is afforded by their own introductions and remarks. What is contained therein, as well in the letters of Beethoven collected by these gentlemen, we consider it all the less our task to state, because we desire to excite the public, who already take things rather too easily, to read the Letters, and do not wish to spare them the trouble by extracting for them the most "piquant" bits.—*London Mus. ### Mendelssohn's Overture to "The Fair Melusina."

This is what Robert Schumann said of it after its first performance in Leipzig in December, 1835.

"There are works of such fine spiritual structure, that bearish criticism itself stands as it were abashed before them, scarce knowing how to make its compliments. This was already the case with the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' overture (at least I only remember to have read poetical reviews of it, and not a word of opposition); and now it is the case again with this to the story of 'The fair Melusina.'"

"To understand it, no one needs to read the long-spun, although richly imaginative tale of Tieck; it is enough to know: that the charming Melusina was violently in love with the handsome knight Lusignan, and married him upon his promising that certain days in the year he would leave her alone. One day the truth breaks upon Lusignan, that Melusina is a mermaid—half fish, half woman! The material is variously worked up, in words, as in tones. But one must not here, any more than in the overture to Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' wish to trace so coarse a historical thread all through. (A curious person asked Mendelssohn once, what the overture to Melusina meant; Mendelssohn brusquely answered: 'Em—a mésalliance'.)—Always conceiving his subject poetically, Mendelssohn here portrays only the characters of the man and the woman, of the proud knightly Lusignan and the enticing, yielding Melusina; but it is as if the watery waves came up amid their embraces, and overwhelmed and parted them again. And this revives in every listener those pleasant images by which the youthful fancy loves to linger, those fables of the life deep down beneath the watery abyss, full of shooting fishes with golden scales, of pearls in open shells, of buried treasures, which the sea has snatched from men, of emerald castles towering one above another, &c.—This, it seems to us, is what distinguishes this overture from the earlier ones; that it narrates these kind of things quite in the manner of a story, and does not experience them. Hence at first sight the surface appears somewhat cold, dumb; but what a life and interweaving there is down below is more clearly expressed through music than through words; for which reason the overture (we confess) is far better than this description of it.

"What may he said of the musical composition after two hearings and a few chance peeps into the score, limits itself to what is understood of itself,—that it is written by a master in the handling of form and means. The whole begins and ends with a magical wave figure, which emerges several times in the course of the piece; the effect is to transport one, as it were, suddenly out of the battle ground of violent human passions into the vast, earth-surrounding element of the water, particularly from the point where it modulates from A flat, through G, to C. The rhythm of the knight theme in F minor would gain in pride and consequence by a still slower tempo. Right tenderly and clinging still sounds on in mind the melody in A flat, bell which we descry the head of Melusina. Of single instrumental effects we still hear the beautiful B flat of the trumpet (near the beginning), which forms the seventh to the chord, —a tone out of the primeval times."

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

There may be those who do not feel its power in comparison with the more Titanic and heroic stuff of which the 3d, the 5th, the 7th and the 9th are made; it does not so sweep all away with multitudinous strong arms like a rushing torrent. But to the lover of serene, deep, heavenly beauty in a tone-poem—whether the beauty of sunshiny joy, or of the glowing inmost soul of an absorbing, pure, ideal passion, there is no Symphony more beautiful, more fraught with exquisite delight, more Raphael-like in the harmonious fusion of its elements and the divine atmosphere that trembles round them, than this in B flat. Berlioz in speaking of it hardly emphasizes enough that glowing warmth, which, with all its sunshine buoyancy, makes it as much a love poem as the "Adelaide." What he says, however, is worth translating, at least in part:

"... The character of this score is generally lively, alert, gay, or a celestial sweetness. If we except the meditative Adagio, which serves it for an introduction, the first movement (Allegro vivace) is almost entirely consecrated to joy. The motive in detached notes, with which the Allegro begins, is but a canvass upon which the author proceeds to spread other melodies more real, thus rendering accessory what seems at first the principal idea or theme.

"This artifice, to be sure, had been happily employed by Haydn and Mozart. But in the second part of the same Allegro we find a really new idea, of which the first measures captivate attention, and which, after carrying the listener away in its mysterious developments, strikes him with astonishment by its unexpected conclusion. It consists in this: After a vigorous tutti, the first violins take a morsel of the first theme, and play with it pianissimo, dialogue-wise, with the second violins, till it ends with holds upon the dominant seventh chord of the key of B natural; each of these holds is cut short by two measures of silence, only filled by a light tremolo of the tympani upon B flat (the enharmonic major third of the fundamental F sharp). This is repeated, and then the tympani are silent to let the strings softly murmur other fragments of the theme, and arrive, by a new enharmonic modulation, on the 6-4 chord of B flat. Then the drums re-enter on the same sound (which, instead of being the sensible, or seventh, note as before, is now a veritable tonic), and continue the tremolo for twenty measures. The force of the tonality of this B flat, scarcely perceptible at first, grows greater and greater as the tremolo prolongs itself; then the other instruments, sowing their path with little unfinished phrases, end, with the continued rumbling of the tympani, in a general forte where the perfect chord of B flat establishes itself with full orchestra at last in all its majesty. This astonishing crescendo is one of the best invented things we know in music; we only find its parallel in that which ends the Scherzo of the Symphony in C minor. But that, in spite of its immense effect, is conceived upon a scale less vast; setting out piano to arrive at the final explosion, without departing from the principal key: whereas this one which we are describing, sets out with mezzo forte, loses itself for an instant in a pianissimo beneath harmonies continually vague and undecisive; then reappears with chords of a more fixed tonality, and bursts forth only at the moment when the cloud which veiled this modulation is completely dissipated. It is like a river, whose calm waters suddenly disappear, and only emerge from their subterranean bed to plunge down again, a foaming, roaring cascade.

"As for the Adagio, it eludes analysis. . . . It is so pure in its forms, the expression of the melody is so angelic and of such irresistible tenderness, that the prodigious art with which it is wrought, disappears completely. One is seized, from the first measure, with an emotion which at length grows overpowering by its intensity; and it is only with one of the giants of poetry that we find a point of comparison for this sublime page of the giant of music. Nothing in fact so much resembles the impression produced by this Adagio, as that which one experiences in reading the touching episode of Francesca di Rimini, in the Divina Commedia of Dante. . .

"The Scherzo consists almost entirely of rhythmic phrases in two-four time, forced to enter into the combinations of three-four measure. This means, which Beethoven has frequently used, gives much nerve to the style; the melodic endings become thereby more piquant, more unexpected; besides, these rhythms à contretemps have in themselves a very real charm, although difficult to explain. You experience pleasure in seeing the measure, thus broken up, recover itself whole at the end of each period, and the sense of the musical discourse, for a while suspended, arrive nevertheless at a satisfactory conclusion, a complete solution. The melody of the Trio, confided to wind instruments, is of a delicious freshness; its movement is slower than the rest of the Scherzo, and its simplicity comes out all the more elegant from the opposition of the little phrases flung by the violins upon the harmony, like so many charming enticements.

"The Finale, gay and frisky, returns to ordinary rhythmic forms. It consists of a rustling and crackling of scintillating notes, a continual babillage, now and then cut short by harsh and savage chords, where those choleric starts, which we have often noticed in this master, manifest themselves again."

Beethoven wrote grander symphonies, but none more beautiful, more tender, delicate and passion-fraught than this. It is warm music; a whole rhythmic history of deep, consuming love, with its hopes and its despairs, its fitful moods, its infinite longings, Platonic meditations, reveries, exquisite caprices, depths "most musical, most melancholy," and heights of rapture uncontaminable and heaven-storming. In sentiment, spirit, age, (speaking as of the heart's lifetime) it seems to class with the song Adelaide, and such Sonatas as the Pathétique, the Mondschein, and that entitled Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour. But this is the same prompting carried out on a complete scale; this is the whole dramatic poem, of which those are simply songs and sketches. Talk of learned, abstract, metaphysical German music! of Symphonies as forms remote from common sympathies! as cold affairs compared with the impassioned Italian operas that we hear! Either one only fancies that he listens to this symphony, hearing as one who hears not, deaf to sounds palpably before him, or he must recognize in it a warmth of feeling, a depth and energy of passion, an out-gushing from sweet secret springs of melody, a wealth of musical ideas, colorings and effects, and a progressive interest as of an ever deepening plot, which makes the said operas seem cold and empty in comparison.

The Adagio, introductory to the Allegro, is profoundly melancholy, full of love-sick pensiveness and tenderness. The promise is fully sustained in the impassioned outbursts of the Allegro. What dreams of happiness! what eager grasping for them! crossed continually on the brightest verge of triumph by the cold shadow of Fate! But the same quenchless ardor of fidelity to a deep, ideal, spiritual sentiment, which pervades the song of "Adelaide," seems to inspire this whole Allegro. The glees and glooms, the heaven-climbing hopes and the heart-sinkings of an immortal love, are the lights and shades that checker this exquisitely woven, warmly colored web of harmony. The uncontrollable fire and restlessness of the Allegro is subdued in the Adagio to a sweet, resigned, spiritually sustained mood of melancholy. Over a ground-work of accompaniment, in which a little sobbing phrase is continually kept up, flows the loveliest and most consoling melody; but when this melody ceases upon the ear, and lingers only in the mind, the little accompanying phrase still throbs in drum beats, like the heart palpitating a few times yet with the old habit of a sorrow that has already yielded to higher thoughts and influences. There is something so human and so heavenly in this Adagio that all audiences appear to feel it. This, as also the resolute, finely imaginative minuet and trio, and the rejoicing finale are equally absorbing. D.

Music Abroad.

COLOGNE.—The following letter, dated Dec. 17, appears in the London Orchestra. There is, we fear, too much truth in the description of one class of "young Germany." But then there is another, truer and more German class, of whom we have lately seen and heard here a fair specimen in young Rosa.

Nothing can be more absurd and disgusting than the presumption of modern young German composers, very few excepted. The young musician who is so happy as to hit on a strange mode of talking, or walking, or dressing, or writing, and who possesses a sufficient amount of swagger, begins first to be called "clever." As soon as he gets this title, he walks, talks, dresses, and writes himself up to a genius. He is a pianist, and by dint of promenading up and down the key-board, throwing from time to time his long hair back with a violent and inspired movement of the head; by dint of heaping up a quantity of notes, of modulating a common-place figure of three or four bars over and over again through every tonality, of using the accord of the dominant seventh as a bridge to go anywhere but never knowing how to finish, because he never knows how to begin; by dint, I say, of writing all this chaos down and scoring it in the most eccentric way, he conceives he has composed an entirely new and marvellous work. Then he gets by heart the best verses of Schiller, Goethe, and Herder, as well as the finest sentences of the renowned works on Æsthetics, and so boldly begins to talk about music in autocratic style, and is given to "interpret" and "define" the Beautiful in Art. By and by the arrogance of his conversation and his piano playing begin to recruit him a few admirers, composed generally of feeble-minded and inexperienced students; now he gets a friend in the press, then a publisher, and in a very few years he is proclaimed a man of genius. This dangerous generation of musicians in Germany is the result of the great influence so long exercised in this country by Liszt and Wagner. The history of humanity shows clearly enough how great men as well as great humbugs have always created new sects of admirers and imitators. But alas! imitation is the source of corruption in literature and the fine arts, and much more so in music; for the field is a wide one, belonging to the metaphysical branch, and the demonstration more infinite, not being subject to material form. So the imitators of Liszt and Wagner are nothing less than the elements of musical decline in Germany. With what a shock of disappointment a first introduction to one of these modern geniuses is attended, after one has heard and read so much about them, may be understood by the following account:

Johannes Brahms, a young composer, pupil of the departed R. Schumann and the Abbé Liszt, produced himself for the first time at the Gürzenich concert in Cologne on Tuesday last, the 12th instant, as pianist and composer. He has long enjoyed in Germany the reputation of a man of genius. I do not want to give you a description of his figure and manners; suffice it to say he is a good specimen of the category already mentioned. He first played the beautiful E flat concerto of Beethoven for piano and orchestra. His touch is hard, his execution inaccurate, he has very little expression, but affects the greatest assurance and excitement à la Liszt, without being a Liszt. The public were highly disappointed.

This was Herr Brahms as pianist; but now enter Herr Brahms as composer, himself leading the orchestra with calm and magisterial dignity. His Serenade für Orchester in D natural contains six parts; Allegro, Scherzo, Adagio, Menuetto, Scherzo, Finale. The music of this composition is of the most eccentric kind imaginable, utterly void of every melodic idea, and as heavy and tiresome as a long speech without form and sense can be. The last two movements being a little clearer, received some mark of approbation. As soon as the Serenade was over three quarters of the audience rushed out of the room. It was the finest protest I ever saw entered by an intelligent and self-respecting public against vanity and exaggeration. In consequence of this incident, the magnificent symphony of Mendelssohn (No. IV, in A natural), capably rendered by the orchestra under F. Hiller, was played to empty benches. The overture to "Oberon" (Weber), which began the concert, was the other instrumental piece of the programme, and splendidly executed it was. We made a new acquaintance—a very clever cantata by F. Hiller, called "Pfingsten" (Whitsuntide), for chorus and orchestra. Hiller with his pure and elevated style knows how to write good music. His melodic ideas are small, but agreeable, his harmony clear and unaffected, his scoring first-rate, and he never attempts to produce effects in spite of beauty and common sense.

A psalm, solo and chorus by Marcello, scored by the departed M. Lindpaintner, introduced for the first time Fri. Erna Borchard to the public. She is very handsome, Polish by birth, her real name being something in sky. I remember to have heard her sing a very commonplace German Lied at a private party in London two seasons ago. She has a very good mezzo-soprano, but has improved her style very little indeed. After the psalm of Marcello she sang the beautiful aria di concerto of Beethoven "Ahi perfido," and she spoiled it altogether, transposing it a tone lower, and altering all the high passages. But you see ladies have such peculiar means of pushing themselves forward, especially if they are pretty (as generally they all are), so that Mdlle. Borchard is prima donna at the Royal Opera House in Weimar.

I cannot pass unnoticed the second "Historical Concert" given here by the Conjugi Marchesi with decided success. This second programme began with Porpora and ended with Rossini, embracing the era from 1735 to 1820 and bringing out the beautiful but forgotten gems of Jomelli, Gluck, Sacchini, Cimarosa, Fioravanti, and Paisiello. I am extremely sorry that I cannot send you the account about Niemann, the celebrated German tenor, as I intended to do, but I was absent when he sang "Tannhäuser," and on the evening I went to hear him in "Faust," we were all disappointed. The primo tenore on coming out and seeing that the room was not quite full, dicto facto began to sing sotto voce, and after the first act obstinately refused to go on. We were sent away with our money returned, but public indignation was so great that Niemann was obliged to leave Cologne without again appearing. Thus all I can tell you is that he looks handsome and tall, but very pretentious. Mr. Mapleson has been here the last few days hearing artists and the successful opera "Loreley" by Max Bruch, who by the way is an exception among the young German composers, his music being full of melodies and dramatic thoughts.

The musical world in general will be happy to know that the indefatigable English Impresario has secured this beautiful opera for Her Majesty's theatre. It will be a new field of glory for Mlle. Tietjens, who fills splendidly the part of Leonora; and the admirers of Mendelssohn in particular may rejoice to hear that the celebrated finale of "Loreley," composed by the lamented genius, may be executed instead of that by Bruch. Mr. Mapleson has gone on to Hanover in search of novelties. Amongst other important engagements he has concluded one with our professor of singing at the Conservatoire, Madame Marchesi (the instructress of Tietjens, Frick, Ilma de Murska, etc.). He has obtained permission from the authorities for her to visit England under his auspices to give instructions at Her Majesty's and elsewhere, during the months of May and June.

JENA. The concerts of the Academic Union are increasing more and more in public favor, the natural consequence of the spirit and cleverness with which they are managed. The following are the last three programmes:—Nov. 21st: Overture to Fierabras, Schubert; Violin Concerto (No. IX, D minor), with orchestral accompaniment, Spohr (performed by Herr Kömpel of Weimar); "Furiantans und Reigen seliger Geister," from Gluck's Orpheus; Overture to the tragedy of Loreley, Emil Naumann; "Elegy for the Violin with orchestral accompaniment," Ernst (played by Herr Kömpel); "Suite for Orchestra," Op. 101, C major, Raff.—Nov. 28th: Symphony No. 1, B flat major, Schumann; "Pianoforte Concerto, C minor, Op. 37 (with cadences by Moscheles), Beethoven; Three Songs, "Am Meer," "Der Lindenbaum," and "Die Post," Schubert (arranged for male chorus and orchestra by Herr W. Tschirch of the Academic Gesangverein); Pieces for the Pianoforte, namely: Fugue in C sharp minor, Bach; and Notturmo, F minor, Chopin (pianist, Madlle. Mehlig; "Aufforderung zum Tanz," C. M. v. Weber, scored by Hector Berlioz; "Don Juan Fantasia," Liszt. Dec. 5th.—Symphony D minor, Op. 44, R. Volckmann; Overture and Act I. of Alceste, Gluck; Concerto for string-instruments, flutes, oboes, bassoons, and horns, F major, No. 111, composed in 1776, Ph. E. Bach; Songs at the Piano; "Wer sich der Einsamkeit ergibt," "Des Mädchens Klage," and "Mein," Schubert (vocalist, Madame Köster).—Herren Cossman, Kömpel, and Lassen have given the first of a series of Soirées for Chamber Music, when the following works were performed,—Sonata in B flat major, for Violoncello and Pianoforte, Mendelssohn; Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte, op. 23 (Kreutzer Sonata), Beethoven; Adagio for Violoncello (from the Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 35), Chopin; Trio for Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte, E flat major, Schubert.

DARMSTADT. However great the success experienced by Meyerbeer's last chef-d'œuvre in London and Paris, it is fully equalled by that which it has achieved at Darmstadt. Not only do the good Darmstadtians themselves flock to the theatre, but the neighboring country for miles around contributes its contingent of auditors. Visitors come even from the north of Germany, and according to some of the German papers, many persons who have seen the mise-en-scène at Berlin, award the palm to the mode in which the piece is put on the stage here, especially as regards the monster Ship. Intendants and Managers, Stage-Managers and Inspectors, arrive, are lost in admiration, and immediately determine to have the piece got up, as far as possible, in the same manner. This, of course, brings in plenty of business to the ship-building yard, and that eminent naval architect, Herr Brand, the master-carpenter. Excursion trains are organized to waft over visitors from Mayence, and the railway officials even sell the tickets. The Grand Duke has publicly thanked the management for the mode in which everything connected with the Africaine has been carried out, and desired that the persons engaged in the performance should be informed how highly he is gratified with their efforts.

MUNICH. The reign of Wagnerism is over. The New York Review (always deeply interested in the movements of the musical reformer) sums up the last acts as follows:

Some highly interesting and perhaps important news reaches us from Bavaria in regard to an affair to which we alluded in our last issue, namely the quarrel of Richard Wagner with the courtiers of King Ludwig II. We mentioned that Wagner had made an anonymous attack in the newspapers. This attack was directed against Mr. Pfistermeister, the Secretary of the king's cabinet, who had resisted the demands of Wagner for a great sum of money. After that article had been published, Mr. Pfistermeister and two of the ministers of the king sent in their resignation. At the same time public meetings were held by the people in the different cities of the kingdom, at which the minister's action was endorsed, and delegations were appointed to wait upon the king, and request him to discharge Wagner from service. The decision of the king seemed doubtful. But at this juncture the queen dowager and the king's uncle Carl came to Munich and brought their pressure to bear. The entire cabinet also sent a memorial to the king, and the latter was unable to resist these combined efforts, and so sent Wagner away. He announced his resolution to the ministers, saying: "I want to show my good subjects that their confidence and love are dearer to me than anything else." The clergy and the bureaucracy immediately sent a deputation to Pfistermeister and congratulated him upon his victory, and when the king entered his box at the theatre on the 9th of December (the day after Wagner's dismissal) the reactionary party and the nobility rose and cheered lustily. The king was "deeply moved." Wagner departed on the morning of the 10th accompanied by a few friends. Before his departure he was threatened with seizure of his furniture for a debt of 2800 florins. He very indignantly stepped to his strong box, paid the money, and said with a sigh: "Such things can happen in Munich only!" He went first to Berne, but intends to make Geneva his home. The king, it is said, has promised Wagner a public satisfaction. It is certainly true that Wagner has acted very foolishly towards the courtiers of King Ludwig II., and that his impetuosity and self-reliance sometimes bordered upon madness. Being a radical democrat in politics, and having fought for the red republic in Dresden on the barricades, he was no persona grata to the Catholic party of Bavaria, but he could have kept himself in influence and power, if he had been more circumspect and cautious, and he could have done a great deal of good in politics and art by a more diplomatic demeanor. He thought that the king, who is merely a boy, and like all kings of Bavaria, has either four or six senses, would be entirely under his power; but in this he was mistaken. He should have remembered the advice: "Do not put your trust in princes." The golden era of music, which seemed to dawn upon Munich, is, of course, no longer to be expected.

London.

SIG. ARDITI'S CONCERTS.—The "popular" feature at these entertainments is at present indisputably the "selection" from Herr Wagner's Tannhäuser. The "music of the Future" in the form under which it is exhibited by Signor Arditì evidently possesses charms for the ear of the many. The clever Italian has accomplished his task most judiciously. Every snatch of genuine "tune" to be found in Tannhäuser is pressed into his pot-pourri, and for the most part set off with a pomp of orchestral instrumentation not to be met with even in the score of Herr Wagner himself. Such a "gorgeous company" of horns and trumpets, trombones and ophicleides, is altogether without precedent. Fancy no less than 16 French horns—not to mention other brass instruments—in the "Chasse;" the appeal to Tannhäuser on behalf of Elizabeth performed (and splendidly performed by Mr. Phassey) on the euphonium; and Tannhäuser's apostrophe to Venus dressed up for a multitude of instruments in unison—a sort of parody on the famous "prélude à l'unisson" to the last act of Meyerbeer's Africaine! All this is done, and effectively done, and the crowded audience roars in fancied ecstasy. No harmonious noises in our remembrance come up to the more strident passages in the Wagner "selection," the climax of which is appropriately reached in the grand march and chorus at the end. Herr Wagner speaks loud enough in all conscience; but his sonority compared with that of Signor Arditì is as small beer to thunder.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Perhaps the most perfect achievement of the Crystal Palace Band, since Herr Auguste Manns "created" it, was its execution of Schumann's second (not second-best but first-best) symphony—the symphony in C major. This was at the last concert but one, another admirable feature in which was Mendelssohn's Hebrides overture. The remainder of the programme consisted, among other things, of Vieuxtemps' Fantaisie Caprice in A, played by Mr. H. Blagrove, with a number of vocal pieces, contributed by Milles. Sinico and Edl, and Signor Stagno, the best of which was Annchen's second air from Der Freischütz (by Mlle. Sinico—viola, Mr. Stöhring). There was also the new Hymn which M. Guonod has composed, as offertorium, in his Mass for St. Cecile—for solo violin (Mr. Blagrove), with orchestra, and which we conscientiously advise M. Guonod to suppress.

At the last concert, Mr. Henry Smart's Bride of Dunkerron was given entire. As far as the orchestra was concerned, it was the best performance we have yet heard of this romantic and beautiful Cantata; the solo singers, too—Madame Rudersdorff, Messrs. Cummings and Lewis Thomas—were all that could be wished; but the chorus was by no means up to the mark. The Bride of Dunkerron has yet to be afforded a chance of appreciation through the medium of an unexceptionally good performance. Luckily it can keep. Weber's overture to Euryanthe; a romance from La Reine de Saba (Mr. Cummings); a Valse, by Randegger (Madame Rudersdorff); M. Gounod's "Nazareth" (Mr. Thomas, with chorus); and the third and greatest overture to Beethoven's Leonora, completed the programme.—Mus. World, Dec. 30.

THE CONCORDIA MUSICAL SOCIETY FOR THE PRODUCTION OF UNPERFORMED OR UNFAMILIAR MASTERPIECES.—This new and already flourishing society made its profession of faith, on Thursday evening, 28th instant, through the medium of its conductor, Mr. Volckmann, who read a paper in the lower room Exeter Hall at a special rehearsal and meeting convened for the occasion. The salient points of this address were received throughout with acclamation. Amongst the most noticeable of these were the assurances that the Concordia was not in any way antagonistic to existing institutions, that it sought to widen the knowledge of great works, which the mere commercial spirit of concert-giving could never achieve, seeing that popularity, sometimes irrespective of intrinsic merit, was what the public would pay for the most readily, that the Concordia sought to be independent, self-supporting, and therefore unshackled by the slavish bonds of prejudice, that by its efforts all real lovers of music would be enabled to hear, and perform such compositions as they themselves approved, that it would ultimately occupy a paramount position in musical history, and that the names of its original members would be honored as those of amateurs of the amateurs.

PARIS.—The Africaine is now added to the revolving circle (whether it will not drop out before the rest?) which continually brings up in turn Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, Guillaume Tell, Favorita, and La Juive.

Flotow's Martha (strange to say) was unknown to the Parisians until last month, when it was produced at the Lyrique. A correspondent writes:

M. Flotow—or M. de Flottow, as he is called here—has journeyed all the way from Germany to superintend the production of his opera Martha at the Theatre-Lyrique. Not merely to superintend his opera, however, since its production involved very serious changes which M. Carvalho would not take upon himself to see carried out without the sanction and even the presence of the composer. M. Carvalho is prone to alteration in classic operas and prompt to undertake them—witness how he has handled Der Freischütz, the Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico, and other works of the great masters, which more conscientious and less daring managers would have shrunk from attempting. We may naturally suppose that M. Carvalho looks upon M. Flotow, or de Flottow, as a great master, and consequently he treats the work of a great master, as is his custom, as though it stood in need of revision and amendment. Nevertheless, as M. Flotow himself approved of the alteration in Martha, no one has a right to find fault with the manager of the Theatre-Lyrique, nor has the public serious cause to grumble. Martha was a very pretty opera as it stood, and, for my own part, with all the 'improvements' accomplished and the additions made, I cannot help thinking that the general effect is not so good as it was. The score is now enlarged by the introduction of three pieces from M. Flotow's opera L'Ame en peine, one of them being the celebrated couplets, "Dès le matin, j'ai paré ma chaumière," with other words written by M. de St. Georges, who, by the way was the author of the ballet Lady Henriette; ou, la Servante de Greenwich, produced at the Opera in 1844, and which was the original of Martha. It is strange—not, however, altogether unaccountable—that so well informed a writer as M. Gustave Bertrand of Le Ménestrel, in his notice of the first performance at the Theatre-Lyrique, when narrating the origin and history of the subject, tracing the various ways in which it has been employed, should have entirely overlooked Mr. Balfe's Maid of Honor. Was M. Bertrand ignorant of the existence of the English work? or did he willfully conceal it? In order to strengthen the earlier part of the opera, the "Beer Song" sung by Plunkett, has been transferred from the third to the first act, the effect of which, in my opinion, is only to weaken the third act. The grand soprano air from the L'Ame en peine has been interpolated merely to permit Mlle. Nilsson to triumph in her high notes, where the young Swedish songstress can triumph. Altogether I prefer the unadulterated Martha, which is certainly not a chef-d'œuvre, but is an exceedingly agreeable work, and, it may be, destined to live longer than more lordly and profounder compositions. What the changes may effect in the attraction of the opera remains to be told. What a pity that M. Carvalho is nothing if not meddling. M. Flotow, or de Flottow, remained for the second representation, and was so satisfied with the music and the performance that he started off back to Germany. The following is the distribution of the characters in Martha at the Theatre-Lyrique: Martha, Mlle. Nilsson; Nancy, Mlle. Dubois; Lionel, M. Michot; and Plunkett, M. Troy. Mlle. Nilsson was encored in the "Last rose of summer," but the sentimental cantabile is evidently not her style. She gave some parts of the music with charming effect, and the brilliancy and purity of her high tones in the "Spinning-wheel" quartet told wonderfully well. Mlle. Dubois is not an artist of the first force, but contrived to elicit an encore in the "couplets de chasse" in the third act. Nor can I say much for M. Michot, who roared lustily when the opportunity was afforded him, and who, with forbearance, would do something. M. Troy was more to my taste in Plunkett, singing and acting like an artist, and always without a seeming endeavor to do too much. He was called on to repeat the "couplets de chasse" in the third act and the air borrowed from L'Ame en peine. The band and chorus were excellent, and the performance a decided success.

Madame Marie Cabel has re-appeared at the Opera-Comique in the Ambassadrice of Auber. She was received the first night with the most enthusiastic plaudits from all parts of the theatre.

The second performance of the second series of Popular Concerts of Classical Music was given on Sunday last. The following was the selection:—Overture to Struensee—Meyerbeer; Symphony, No. 51—Haydn; Adagio from the Clarinet Quintet (clarinet, M. Grisey)—Mozart; Music to Le Comte d'Egmont—Beethoven.

The Gazette Musicale says: Mr. Charles Adams, "the celebrated English (American) tenor, who has created the part of Vasco de Gama with so much éclat in English," has passed the week in Paris in order to hear L'Africaine at the Grand Opera. He goes to Madrid, where he is called to play the part of Vasco in Italian at the royal theatre. Mme. Rose Cziglag, who was supposed to have retired from the stage, has made a brilliant engagement at the same theatre.—Mario has recently appeared there in Faust, exciting great enthusiasm.

At a recent concert in Pesth, Carlotta Patti was called twenty times before the curtain. Afterwards, Alexandre Dumas, at his request, was presented to her, and said, among other flattering things, "You have had the greatest success which can satisfy the ambition of an artist." "But greater success than all," exclaimed Carlotta, "to have made your acquaintance, dear master." "Oh!" exclaimed Dumas, in an ecstasy of feeling, "such talent, beauty, esprit, in a single person is too much!" Upon which he opened his arms and embraced the charming artist many times in presence of some fifty people who surrounded them. The French paper which recounts these facts also gives the couplet which Dumas wrote in Mlle. Patti's album next day. It shows that his poetry is hardly equal to his prose:

"A CARLOTTA PATTI.

"Je me plains à t'entendre, étant homme et chrétien; Mais si j'étais oiseau, j'en mourrais de chagrin."
A. DUMAS."

Music in the Public Schools.

I.

We have spent some time during the past two months in witnessing the way in which the rudiments of vocal music are now taught in the public schools of Boston,—especially the Primary schools. We must own we had not believed that we could have become so deeply interested in things so a-b-c-denarian and processes so literal and dry. But in the first visit to a primary school in Poplar Street, during the music hours, we experienced a fresh and really delightful sensation, which we were very happy to have renewed as often as we could make it convenient. In witnessing true teaching, that by persons who have a genius for teaching, even of the merest alphabet and humblest motions of any art, and in seeing a room full of little children intelligently alive to it and happy in it, one unconsciously becomes a child with the rest and shares their curiosity and their surprise at the genial presentation of things which he has known too long to think at all about them, until it comes to teaching them, and then he finds how the effort to impart to others makes old things new and more significant than ever to himself.

For many years, twenty at least, has singing in a manner been taught in our schools. But the idea of the teaching has been very vague, the methods blind and groping, the teachers independent of each other, each following his own path, resulting for the most part in sleepy and mechanical routine, the time of teaching and practice very limited, the results small, the faith of the community still smaller. In all the Grammar Schools there have been semi-weekly visitations of the singing teacher, and more or less daily exercise of singing by rote. More or less pleasure has been found in it, especially where the master of the school has himself taken an interest in it. By degrees, through the urgency of zealous members of the School Committee, better teachers have been found and more effective training realized in some of the schools, and the singing at the annual school Festival by a thousand or more fresh young voices has given delightful evidence of what can be done. Yet most of that has been the result of special practice limited to the one object of the yearly exhibition. Real, consistent, unitary teaching there had scarcely been; no unity of method, text-book or of teachers. And the great difficulty has been that the teaching did not take the pupil early enough, was not pursued uninterruptedly enough upon a well graduated scale, and that the majority of teachers in the schools were not interested in the subject, not musical themselves, nor capable of co-operating with the music-teacher by representing him themselves in the intervals of his visits far-between and short.

But, more than all, the want was of a man, an organizing and inspiring mind, who should embody a right vital method in himself, interest master and pupil everywhere and fill them all with the spirit of teaching and of learning how to sing and something about music. Many have been tried, and finally the right man is found; a man with small pretention to musicianship, but with musical sensibility, and a singular gift for teaching the youngest children, in classes as he finds them, how to sing. It is now not much more than a year since Mr. L. W. MASON was called from the good work he was doing in Cincinnati, to introduce his system of musical instruction into the Primary Schools of Boston; and under his supervision it is already in successful operation in 185 of the 250 primary schools. During the greater part of the year his efforts have been chiefly concentrated upon certain groups of these schools, four or five, in different districts; here the virtue of the plan is tested and illustrated to the school committee and to all comers, and from these centres the example is gradually spreading through the schools.

We entered a room on the lowest floor of a primary school. Some forty children of the age of five or six years, whose faces lit up with joy at the arrival of Mr. Mason, sang first a number of little songs by rote, all in good time, and nearly all of them in tune, and with a very pleasant average of good round musical tone; their attention was called to various points of expression loud and soft, and so forth, and one after another made in a manner a critic upon the whole. These little songs and exercises form the first seventeen pages of Hohmann's "Practical Course of Singing," Part I, an excellent manual which Mr. M. has had translated from the German. Then they sang the scale, upward and downward, by the scale names: One, two, three, &c. and by the syllables: Do, re, mi, &c., answering every question that could be thought of to test their understanding of what they were doing. Then came musical notation from the black board—a few steps only, as little technical as possible, things before names, the pupils copying the notes and signs upon their slates, and naming and describing all that the teacher wrote upon the board, such as: notes, short and long; the staff, its degrees, lines and spaces; the G Cleff, and the first six sounds in the key of G written in that Cleff; and several other things, followed by other songs at the discretion of the teacher. All this is dry in the description, but it was charming in the reality, for it was real happy acquisition of knowledge and first trial of young faculties, and the dry detail taught reflected something of the glow of the young soul receiving and as it were discovering it. It was evident that these little ones understood and enjoyed each stage of the process. And thus they were unconsciously inspired with order and with rhythmical behavior at the same time.

Ascending one flight, we found a somewhat larger class of children six or six and a half years old—fourth and third classes. Here the songs in the little manual were continued by rote, and afterwards examined carefully by note: but first new characters were learned, minuter subdivisions of time, &c., and various exercises explained and sung from charts hung up before them. Now and then one little child was called to take the pointing rod and teach the lesson to the others, and by various such devices their interest and attention were thoroughly engaged. The proportion of true voices and the average of good tone were manifestly greater here than in the room below. Still greater in the first and second classes (ages about seven) in the story above, where the technical course was carried forward several stages, and the song-singing even extended to singing in two parts, revealing to their fresh sense the new miracle of harmony.

And so the system is carried through the classes of the Primary school. Much is due not only to the wise and patient method of the teacher, but also to the sympathetic spirit of the man, his remarkable genius for teaching and for interesting children. But this is only the smallest portion of his work. For how shall one mind divide itself every week amongst 250 schools? The great fact is, that in each school he leaves behind him music-teachers as well as scholars. The mistresses of the primary schools become interested in such admirable teaching, and soon enlist as auxiliaries to Mr. Mason. And that too, in many instances, where they are not musical themselves. With the aid of an instrument, and their own quick intelligence, they can keep the ball in motion until he comes round again; and not seldom, when he comes, he finds that the inventiveness of these young women, trained in our Normal Schools, has worked out some portion of his method into new fineness and beauty of detail, which he is happy to adopt.

Before following the system up into the Grammar and the High Schools, we have to tell of another, closely allied, course of instruction, which in like manner has been fully tested in a few schools and is gradually finding its way into all the schools, and of another live man with the gift of teaching in him, who is inspiring all the teachers with his method so that they can teach it in their several class rooms in the intervals of his necessarily not very frequent visits. We allude to the exercises in the formation of the voice, the development of tone, called "Vocal Gymnastics," under the admirable direction of Mr. MURKIN. These exercises have special reference to physical health, but at the same time are forming the vocal material for all our choirs and choruses, making good readers, and revolutionizing the pinched, shallow, nasal habits of our Yankee speech. Of this next time.

Concerts.

MESSES. KREISSMANN AND LEONHARD gave their fifth and, we regret to say, their last Soirée at the Chickering hall on Saturday evening, the 6th inst. An uncommonly large audience listened with the finer sensibilities alive to every item of the following choice programme:

- 1 Sonata appassionata, op. 57..... Beethoven.
Allegro assai—Andante—Allegro.
- 2 Aria..... Bach.
- 3 Last movement from Fantasia, op. 17..... Schumann.
- 4 Song, "Der Erlkönig"..... Schubert.
- 5 Songs..... R. Franz.
a. Stille Sicherheit—b. Trübe wird's,
c. Sonnenuntergang.—d. Malin.
- 6 Andante spianato and Polonaise, op. 53..... Chopin.
- 7 Songs..... R. Franz.
a. Die Lotosblume.—b. Das dunkelgrüne Laub.
c. Schlummerlied.—d. Im Frühling.
- 8 a. Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1..... Chopin.
b. Gavotte (B minor)..... Bach.

Mr. Leonhard ripens and deepens constantly in the thoughtful interpretation of the masters, the true poets of piano-forte music. There is intellectual weight and soulful fervor in his rendering of Beethoven; and he entered into all the passion, reproducing the energy and delicacy, the light and shade, of that extremely difficult Sonata in F minor, commonly called "Appassionata."

Mr. Kreissmann's voice was not so perfectly under his control as it is sometimes. The higher tones came out with difficulty, and somewhat strange in quality. This gave a bad start to the Bach aria

(from one of the Cantatas), which nevertheless captivated by the vitality and beauty of its sustained melody, and of the thoroughly loyal and artistic accompaniment by Franz, perfectly played by Mr. DRESSEL. The "Erl King" also made its effect mostly by the breathless rider-like accompaniment, played with such vivid dramatic suggestion, by the same gentleman. But in the songs by Franz the singer was much happier, indeed quite himself again, and every one was charmed by them. We wish we had room to speak of each, for they are all so individual; we can only allude to one of the earliest, the most beautiful of all "Slumber Songs" ever yet composed (the English words of which were given in our last), and the "May Song," a tricky little thing in which the spirit of Goethe's "Zwischen Hecken und Dorn" is most happily caught.

We trust it will not be long before we have more concerts like these. They outweigh in real musical, poetic value a hundred of the loudly advertised entertainments on which the newspaper critics bestow their more liberal comments.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The second Chamber Concert again filled the Chickering Hall. Again a very interesting programme, consisting of three large works; we could not but regret, however, that the Beethoven Quartet, op. 132, was not repeated this time, while something of the first impression still remained.

1. Quartet in E flat, Op. 44.....Mendelssohn
Allegro, Scherzo, Adagio, Finale, Allegro con fuoco.
2. Trio in D, Op. 70.....Beethoven
Alto. Vivace. Largo assai, Finale, Presto.
3. Grand Quintet, Op. 58, in F.....A. Rubenstein
Introduction Lento and Allegro Moderato, Scherzo Moderato, Andante assai, Finale, Allegro non troppo. (First time.)

The Mendelssohn Quartet was a delightfully welcome revival; it tingles with fine imaginative vitality in every phrase, and was rendered with much life and delicacy, in short happily. One of the freshest and most unfading of the Mendelssohnian pictures of elfin revelry, is that Scherzo, which was keenly relished.

Beethoven's wonderful Trio in D, called, from the mystical halo of soft accompaniment which floats around the subject of the slow movement, the "Geister" Trio, was played by Mrs. FRODOCK, Messrs. SCHULTZE and WULF FRIES. It was the lady's first appearance as pianist, and it was not a little remarkable that one so distinguished as an organist could cope so successfully with so arduous a task requiring a different kind of touch. It was in the main a well-conceived, good truthful rendering, honest and consistent, with no nonsense, no false striving for effect. The execution of the first two movements especially was quite satisfactory, although without the perfect ease and elasticity, the poetic inspiration of such pianists as Drosel or Leonhard. Her perfectly modest, quiet bearing won esteem for the woman and the artist. She was of course truly supported by the other artists.

Of the Rubenstein Quintet we can only say that portions of it interested us, the first particularly; but that much of it has left little or no impression on our mind. We are inclined however, to ascribe this largely to the heat of the room, under which our musical spirits drooped before the concert was over.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The Wednesday Afternoon Concerts have begun again (their twelfth season) with every promise of success. Other engagements have denied us the coveted pleasure of hearing the first two. But we give the programmes, which indicate a disposition to keep fully up to last year's standard, and even to improve upon it, in the quantity and quality of sterling classical matter, with just enough of light, sparkling, superficial music to reconcile the younger crowd. These were the selections on Wednesday, Jan. 10.

- Overture to Euryanthe.....Weber
Waltz. "Rheinbogen" (first time).....Strauss Symphony No. 8, in G.....Beethoven
Fantasia for Bassoon, on Themes from "La Sonnambula".....Elis Paul Elts.

- (His first appearance as a member of the Society)
"Frühlings Erwachen" (Song without words) C. E. Bach
(First time.)
Finale Second Act "Der Freischütz".....Weber Victoria March.....Hamm
(First time.)

and these for Wednesday, Jan. 17.

- Concert Overture in A.....Julius Rietz Waltz, "Rheinbogen".....Strauss
(First time.)
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
"Frühlings Erwachen".....C. E. Bach
Overture to Medea.....Bargiel
(First time.)
Finale to "Lorely".....Mendelssohn

The good influence of the "Symphony Concerts" appears already in these programmes, and in the strengthening of the string department of the little orchestra for the better rendering of the more important pieces. We think it a good plan, good for the musical culture of the people, and good artistic economy, for the Union thus to reproduce works just before given by the larger band of the Symphony Concerts, as here in the case of the Euryanthe overture and the Mozart Symphony. It furnishes a good review of the lesson, and helps to fasten the impression of the music. The Concert overture by Rietz is well worth retaining from the repertoire of last year; and the overture by Bargiel, one of the most noted of the new composers in Germany, gives earnest of a laudable intention in Mr. ZERRAHN and his associates to make these concerts the occasions for testing such new works and authors, about whom there may be some curiosity, leaving it to the other concerts to deal exclusively with things of unquestioned excellence. This division of labor is pretty certain to work well. We hope to be more fortunate with the rest of the Wednesday Concerts, and wish them the fullest measure of success, believing that they do good.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S CLUB. The annual vocal concert given by this club of amateurs to their invited friends has become one of the institutions, always looked forward to with a peculiar interest. This year it occurred on Monday evening, Jan. 1st, and was repeated on the 8th. The Chickering room was crowded. The choir is larger, more perfectly balanced, and in more admirable training than ever before; in truth we think we scarcely ever heard a finer ensemble than that of these forty or more well selected voices. The opening piece, a Choral by Bach, was richly sonorous, clear and even in all the parts, and set a good stamp on the thing from the beginning. The "New Year's Song" by Schumann, a lengthy composition to a long string of verses, was full of interesting bits, but seemed to us indefinite and unsatisfactory in form, without sustained inspiration or progress; not one of his stronger works. It was exceedingly well sung and well accompanied by Mr. Parker on the grand piano; the bits of solo, male and female, were really artistic. An Offertorium (Lauda anima), by Hauptmann, pleased as a good solid, elegant church composition. But what stole all hearts away, and had to be repeated, was the exquisite and airy rendering of the "Hunting Song" by Mendelssohn.

Gade's "Comala," subject from Ossian, sung by the Club two years ago, formed the second part of the concert. We were more impressed by its peculiar romantic beauty this time than before. The coloring and atmosphere are somewhat monotonous, to be sure, but it fastens upon you by a poetic spell, a sometime bard-like, shadowy, antique and vast. The heroic shape of Fingal stands out boldly and sublimely in the music; and most artistically and feelingly was this part rendered by Mr. WETTERBERG. The part of Comala was sung with expression and refinement, and Miss HOUTON in the part of the companion maiden entered fully into the spirit of the music. But the great impression was made by the delicacy and sweetness with which the female choruses were sung; by the grandeur of the sonorous basses and tenors in the choruses of hardy warriors; and above all by the wild, mysterious chorus of spirits guiding the souls of the slain heroes from the battle field, and the concluding chorus of hardy and virgins.

Mr. Parker, in this quiet, sheltered way, is keeping open a clear spring of true, refreshing musical culture.

Italian-German Opera.

The Italian Opera commonly sweeps over us like a hot, consuming Simoom every year, scorching the tender germs of more quiet, wholesome, genuine musical movements, and creating such a fashionable excitement that no other good thing can live until the storm is past. But this time, limited to two weeks, it does not seem to be doing a great deal of harm. Its flaunting and bombastic announcements ("Ensemble to be nowhere equalled in the world!") were so absurd, that musical people could laugh and go on undisturbed about their own business. The Maritzek Italian troupe is supplemented by all that holds together of Grover's German company; the latter, who do the best things, are put into the afternoon.

At this time of writing, three Italian operas have been given this week; viz. Lucrezia Borgia, I Puritani, and Petrella's Ione; the two former very hacknied, the latter not a thing we care to hear a second time. But for those who admire these things, it is of course all very well; the Opera is addressed to them. We heard the first half of I Puritani. It is good music of its kind; much of Bellini's purest melody is in it, and he had a real genius for melody; the vein is his own peculiarly, much to be admired, though growing somewhat monotonous; in the Sonnambula it keeps its freshness longest. The Puritani music runs clear and fine, but syrupy; two hours of it must surely cloy. And the stereotyped roaring of the two basses in Suoni la tromba is an exercise from witnessing which we would fain be exempt for the rest of our mortal life. We thought the orchestra and chorus unusually large and good. Miss KELLOGG, in the principal rôle, sang with more voice and finished vocalism than ever, clever in all points of music and of action, bright, intelligent, and well read in her part, but lacking the charm of unconsciousness, the art to conceal art, and what is better to forget herself in art. But her effort justly won her loud and oft repeated plaudits. BELLINI is the same glorious baritone that he was, the best among the men, and made a capital Ricardo. We were much pleased, too, with the Giorgio of Sig. ANTONUCCI, one of the new comers; his bearing is natural and manly, and he sings like an artist, with a good musical bass voice. Of the new tenor, Sig. INFRE, as Lord Arthur, we got no very agreeable impression; he strains hard to bring out his tones, which sound thin at the best; but we are told that he grew in grace in the last acts of the opera. The secondary characters were filled by well-known German faces, MUELLER, REICHARDT, &c. The conductor, Sig. TORIANI, seemed to take it easily.

We heard too, (and count it rare good fortune) the Matinée of Wednesday, Boildieu's La Dame Blanche, by the Germans. To our taste there is more charm in this light, graceful, natural opera than in all the Italian pieces announced for this season put together. This Frenchman has caught something of Mozart's spirit; it is sincere, wholesome, happily inspired music, such as cannot lose its freshness. Simple as it seems, your ear is perpetually caught by fine traits in the orchestra or on the stage. The two trios, the great auction scene, in fact all the ensembles, are intensely interesting; the attention never flags; the excitement never is unwholesome; the feeling never overdone and sentimental; yet it is full of sentiment, as it is full of grace and humor.

Of course HABELMANN was George Brown: without him how could the play be given? The exquisite beauty and sweetness of his voice has lost nothing, while the manlier qualities have even gained; in singing, make-up, and in action it was as perfect a rendering of that difficult part as any reasonable man can care to see and hear. HERMANN, too, as the malign genius of the plot, the steward, was grandly sonorous and musical in voice, and dignified and true in action. Mme. JOHANNSEN was in good voice for her, and sang with all that truth of feeling and conception, which have ever distinguished her. Mlle. DZIURA filled the coquettish part of the farmer's wife agreeably, though singing often out of tune; and the Herren STEINECKE and LEHMANN did their best. The chorus was capital, in naturalness of action and of grouping, as well as in singing. The orchestra was somewhat curtailed of its fair proportions, but was in the main good, and the addition of a harp, well played, helped greatly to realize and brighten up some of the finest intentions of the composer. A new figure occupied the Conductor's chair (high NEUENDORFF, we are told), who certainly handled his forces with sure grasp and energy.

"Martha" is up for this afternoon. The most remarkable announcement of the week, perhaps the most remarkable we ever saw, is that (by request of lovers of the music of the "IMMORTAL BEETHOVEN") of Fidelio, "as an Oratorio" (!) on Sunday evening. "Observe," says the inventive manager, "the Dialogue is entirely omitted; the music is given as an Oratorio, after the manner of its most frequent modern presentation" (!). This is the strangest piece of information ever vouchsafed to a musical public. Would not such a statement succeed better in Pithole City than in Boston? though possibly we do injustice to that mushroom oleaginous metropolis.

NEXT IN ORDER. On Monday evening a Chamber Concert, given in compliment to CARL ROSA, at Chickering's Hall. The gifted young violinist will play with OTTO DRESSEL the "Kreutzer Sonata," and a Trio by Mendelssohn or Beethoven; besides the Chaconne by Bach, Schumann's charming Abendlied, &c. Mr. KRUISMANN will sing Franz songs. A room full is guaranteed by the Harvard Musical Association, in grateful return for Rosa's very important aid at the start of the Symphony Concerts.

Next Thursday, at 4 P.M., the second SYMPHONY CONCERT, with the aid of OTTO DRESSEL. A glorious programme. See advertisement.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club's next Concert occurs on Tuesday, Feb. 6th. The programme will contain two of the finest string works extant, viz. Beethoven's great Quartet, op. 132, in A minor—that which made such an impression on the audience at the first concert—and Mendelssohn's B flat Quintet. Mr. Daum will play, instead of Mr. Lang—the latter being very much engaged during the same week. Mr. Lang is reserved for the fourth concert.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. At a meeting of the society on the evening of the 14th instant, the president, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, having been requested by vote of the board of trustees, submitted, with a few feeling remarks, the following resolutions, expressing the great loss the society have sustained in the decease of their late treasurer, MATTHEW S. PARKER, Esq. The resolutions were seconded, with some appropriate remarks, by the secretary and others, and were unanimously passed:—

Whereas, Since the last meeting of this society it has pleased Almighty God to remove from the scene of his earthly labors our friend and brother, Matthew S. Parker; therefore

Resolved, That we avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity, individually and personally, to record our sense of the great loss we have sustained in the death of our esteemed and venerable associate, whose many estimable qualities of mind and of character had so endeared him to all our hearts.

Resolved, That, while with a deep and earnest sorrow we deplore our loss, we also thank God for the long life of usefulness and honor which has just closed; a life fragrant with the memories of good deeds, beautiful in its unpretending piety, full of Christian benevolence, abounding in charity and kindness and good will towards all, a model of gentleness and purity, and, outreaching almost the utmost limit of the years that are allotted to man, patient and resigned unto the end.

Resolved, That as members of the Handel and Haydn Society, of which our honored brother was the last surviving original associate, and has continued now more than fifty years its firmest and most steadfast friend—holding all this while, with an interval of but two or three years, some post of honor and trust in the administration of the society's affairs—its first secretary, and for the last twenty-five years, and until his death, its trusty and devoted treasurer, we desire to express and put on record our high sense of his invaluable services in the sacred cause to whose interests we stand pledged—of the faithfulness and assiduity with which he has always discharged the official duties we have committed to his care—of the praiseworthy example he has given us in his conscientious attendance upon the oft-recurring and sometimes tedious requirements of the society's ordinary work, no less than his punctuality and constancy at their public performances, and the rich legacy he has left us in the memory of his unsullied honor and integrity and consistency of character in all the relations of life.

Resolved, That the secretary of the society be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased, expressing to them, at the same time, our earnest sympathy with them in their affliction, and our firm assurance that the soul of our friend and brother has found, in Heaven, the reward of his Christian faith and faithfulness upon the earth.

MOZART'S LETTERS. We have only room now to acknowledge the receipt from Messrs. Hurd & Houghton of their beautiful reprint of Lady Wallace's translation of these most individual and charming letters, collected and published, many of them for the first time, by Nohl. They form two delightful volumes, and bring you very near to the real every day life of the inspired boy and man. With far less of literary culture, and in great part simply playful, to the reader of right insight they must be quite as interesting as the letters of Mendelssohn. They begin with his thirteenth year (1769) and continue into the year of his death (1791).—Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co., at the "old corner," have the book for sale.

PITTSBURG, PA. Handel's "Messiah" was performed here also, about New Year, by the Philharmonic Society. Lafayette Hall crowded; over one hundred performers; Prof. W. T. Wamelink conducting; Mr. C. C. Mellor presiding at piano. A local critic "doubts whether this great masterpiece was ever performed in a more satisfactory and artistic manner." (!) Pit-hole City possibly may beat it next year. At the next performance of the Society, Haydn's third Mass and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be given.

PHILADELPHIA. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" is to be performed here for the first time on the 9th of February, by the Handel & Haydn Society. Mr. Rudolphsen, of Boston, will sing the part of the prophet; tenor, Mr. Simpson, of New York; soprano, Miss Alexander; contralto, Miss McCaffrey. The libretto contains not only the words, but descriptive notes upon each number of the music and a sketch of the life of the composer.

The "Germania" Afternoon Rehearsals are still popular, but cannot, it seems, yet trust an audience to swallow a Symphony whole. They play each time a single movement of one, and in this way lately Schubert's C-major Symphony has been served up by instalments.—Mr. WOLFFSOHN's Beethoven Sonata Concerts, and Mr. JARVIS's Matinees (who plays in one programme a Faust transcription by Liszt, a Beethoven Sonata, things by Chopin and Schumann, the Septette Militaire by Hummel, Mr. Schmitz, the excellent 'cellist, contributing a Romberg Concerto), are progressing very successfully by all accounts.—The Maretzke-Grover Opera has been in Philadelphia just what it is and will be here.

The friends of Mrs. VAN ZANDT will be gratified to learn that that lady has already begun a successful musical career abroad. She has received six offers of operatic engagements, and has signed a contract for six months to sing at the royal opera houses of Berlin, Amsterdam, Copenhagen and Stockholm. Madame Van Zandt sings in Europe under the Italianized name of Signora Vanzini, by which she is now known to the public.—Eve. Post.

A QUANDARY. Under this head the funny Saturday Press gives utterance and relief to a very common perplexity.

MY DEAR PRESS: I want to buy a piano, and, of course, refer to your advertisements to find the best.

I read of Steinway that Mills, and Mason, and Maretzek, and Gottschalk, and every other musical fellow say it is the best, and so I make up my mind to buy a Steinway; but as I look further, I find Chickering recommended by Mills, and Mason, and Maretzek, and Gottschalk, as being, by all odds, the most superior, and I conclude to patronize Chickering. My eyes wander along, and find that Mills, and Mason, and Maretzek, and Gottschalk think, after all, that Geo. Steck & Co.'s piano is the best, and still further, that Schütze & Ludloff far outstrip all others.

What am I to do? Tell me before I go mad.

HYP0.

Answer: Buy one of each—Ed.

MARCELLO'S "O Lord our Governor," at Trinity Church, New York. The Weekly Review says:

This grand old anthem has been sung several times lately, at this church, and its very effective rendering—evidently the result of diligent perseverance, and careful labor, on the part of those having the direction of the excellent choir,—makes it, aside from its intrinsic worth, a noticeable event in church music. Benedetto Marcello, the composer, was born at Venice, in 1686, of a patrician family, and is an exception to the rule that musicians are good for naught but music, for he was one of the council of the Forty, and filled various other offices of dignity and importance. He died in 1739. In 1724—26, he published his greatest work, "Estrò poetico Harmonico; parafrasi sopra li primi venticinque Salmi, Poesia di G. A. Giustiani, Musica di B. Marcello de patrizi Veneti"—in 8 vols. folio. This highly sounding title was not more extravagant than the praises the work received upon its appearance. Suard likens it to almost all that is beautiful in art, and illustrates his rhapsody with classical and oriental allusions, while all the musical critics of the day find nothing to condemn in it. There is a copy of the "Salmi" in the Real Collegio di Musico at Naples, in good condition. About the middle of the last century Avison proposed, and Garth, organist at Durham, carried out an English version, from which this anthem is selected. The undertaking was not very successful, and the work, of the same size as the Italian edition, is now somewhat rare.

Mr. Diller, the organist of Trinity, certainly deserves the hearty thanks of all lovers of ecclesiastical music for his successful efforts in training his fine choir. The prominent tenor and bass parts were on the occasion referred to, well given, by Messrs. Weeks and Giles, but from its arrangement, the beauty of the anthem rests with the soprano and alto—the former, Masters Ehrlich and Toedt, the latter, Master Grandin. Ehrlich, Coker's successor, has a voice of rare sweetness, with "les larmes" in it, and a knowledge in music wonderful, considering his years. Grandin's alto is like the trumpet stop of an organ, and it rings through the church ring stirringly; while Toedt sings as though a flute was speaking. Add to these, an accurate chorus, worthy of any English cathedral, and the accompaniment so deftly and exquisitely played, and surely Marcello might well come up to hear his work, from his stately tomb under San Martino, in Venice!

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

When sorrow sleepeth, wake it not. Song.
Edward Land. 30

Has English and German words, and is excellent throughout, in words and music.
Nothing better. (Nichts schöneres.) Song.
R. Schumann. 30

One of those warm-hearted German home songs, that make a German home so pleasant. The singer is one to whom "it never occurred" to think, that anything could be more beautiful, or better, in any way, than the lady who was, first, his love, then his bride, then his wife. English and German words.

Fair as a heav'nly angel. (Bella siccome un angelo.) Romance from "Crispino e la Comare."

One of the most pleasing songs in this clever comic opera, which is now having a great run.
From Mighty Kings. Judas Maccabæus. 40

A well-known powerful and brilliant air by Handel. Rather difficult to execute, but repays thorough study.

The Swallows farwell. (Abschied der Schwalben.) Duet. Kücken. 50

"Ah! swallows, wherefore fly away!" The shepherd's simple good-bye to the swallows, who have been circling around his flocks, as if twittering a parting word in the ears of their playfellow, the Lamb. With this simple subject there is uncommonly pretty music, and the duet is very attractive.

Flee as a bird. Song. Arranged for Guitar by Haydn. 40

One of the sweetest of sacred songs.
Nel sentiere di mia vita. Baritone song.
G. Rizzio. 3

An elegant Italian song.
My boy will not come home. Song.
J. W. Turner. 30

A simple ballad, in Mr. Turner's well-known tasteful style.

Instrumental.

"Crown Jewels." By A. Baumbach.
How so fair. From Martha. 40
Ah! dont mingle. From Sonnambula. 40
Ever of thee. 40
Shadow song. From Dinorah. 40

These are four excellent arrangements, both for learners and amateurs. Mr. Baumbach composes with facility, but yet in excellent taste, and teachers, especially, are glad to get such pieces, which are not too hard, are excellent practice, and, at the same time, good music.

Marche des Tambours. S. Smith. 60
A brilliant piece.
Silver spray Redowa. E. O. Eaton. 30
Golden ray Polka. J. W. Turner. 30
Les Adieux des Nideck. Grand valse. F. Haase. 40
Three taking pieces by good composers.

Books.

Mendelssohn's Songs without words. $4.00
Mendelssohn wrote, not for present fame, but for an enduring reputation. It so happened that he has had both, and these productions, not remarkably brilliant or taking, perhaps, at first trial, grow upon one, till we become fast friends with them, and seem, while playing, to come in closer communion with the Master's masterly thoughts.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Praise of Music.

(The first two verses partly imitated from a MS. in the German Tabulatur, A.D. 1690.)

Hail, glorious Music! royal art,
How often hast thou cheered my heart!
My noblest powers to thee I'd give,
Though I a thousand years should live.

Then let the changing seasons roll,
I'll sing, with all my heart and soul,
While life's best blessings rest with me,
Love, health, content, song, poesy!

When foolish tongues those accents blame,
In which, untired, I sound thy fame,
Such blame to me no lane doth bring;
They chide, because they cannot sing.

Then, joyful, while the seasons roll,
Will I sing on, with heart and soul;
For Life's best blessings rest with me,
Love, health, content, song, poesy!

Let others prize the wealth they've won—
They are not lords of what they own!
A songful, brave, contented heart
Is wealth, of man's best self a part.

So let me, while the seasons roll,
Sing on with all my heart and soul;
Life's richest blessings rest with me,
Love, health, content, song, poesy!

Then, royal Music, art divine,
My constant service shall be thine;
Aid thou my days to flow along,
A full, complete, harmonious song.

Then, grateful while the seasons roll,
I'll sing with all my heart and soul,
For Life's best blessings rest with me,
Love, health, content, song, poesy!

Musical Grammar.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

Grammar teaches how to speak and write a language correctly. Music is a language, expressive of sentiments and emotions. Musical Grammar, therefore, teaches how to compose and write music correctly. All persons have occasion for a knowledge of the grammar of their vernacular, in giving utterance to their thoughts, few and simple though they be. Many, however, study music only to acquire the ability to interpret the thoughts of others to the listener, and the study of musical grammar has not always been insisted upon. Nevertheless a knowledge of this science has its value to every student of musical art. For almost every one who pays any considerable attention to the study of music has, at some time or other, occasion to express his own thoughts, either in the ephemeral style of improvisation upon themes of the opera last heard, or in writing down his more matured conception of some strain, heard else only in his imagination; or at least, in the re-arrangement of the thoughts of others. And even should none of these graver occasions for such knowledge arise, the selection of music for study and practice involves the determination of questions of merit, as to style of composition, which can be properly decided only by one familiar with the principles underlying such work. What we call finish in a musical work can only be appreciated by one conversant with such knowledge. To the student of the classical master-works such information is especially valuable, since these works are often as remarkable for the skilful manner in which motives are treated in accordance with the technical rules of composition, as for the truth and force of the thought itself. This is still more emphatically true of the Fugue, which is the highest development of the intellectual in music, as distinguished from the emotional.

For the information of younger students, who may never have given this subject much attention, the following schedule of Musical Grammar is presented. In this it is attempted to give each department of this science its true rank and logical place.

The scale is the alphabet of tones. With this, therefore, we begin. Next comes a consideration of intervals, consonances, and dissonances. Then comes the minor scale, and the study of both major and minor scales in all keys. Next we have the three primary chords, from which all others are in some way derived. These are the major and minor triads, and the chord of the dominant seventh, and they are to be studied in all keys.

The second stage of knowledge in this science involves acquaintance with the mutations of these primary harmonies,—changes of position and inversion,—and the doctrine of discords. It is believed that all discords may be ranked under one of these three heads: suspensions, appoggiaturas, and passing-notes. The proper figuring of these various chords and discords is included here, and with the addition of so much of the knowledge belonging to the following stage as relates to forbidden parallelisms, we have the science of ThorOUGH Bass.

The third stage of progress includes the syntax of chords. Modulation and Cadence are taught here. And here comes in a new aspect in which we may regard musical compositions. Hitherto they have seemed to us merely successions of chords. We are now to consider them as combinations of two or more separate and independent voice-parts, or melodies. This stage embraces the whole doctrine of Counterpoint, both simple and double, Imitation, Canon, and Fugue. We also learn to discriminate between the strict and free style of composition. The former is written for voices alone; or, if for instruments, it is conceived to be for a certain number of voices, from which it never varies except when one voice temporarily rests. In the free style one air or melody takes very decided preference over the accompanying voices, and chords are taken now full, now very thin, as the fancy of the composer suggests. The free style has been built up by a system of licensed deviations from the severe rules of the strict style. The study of strict composition, therefore, is of great use even to the student who never designs to write in this manner.

In the fourth stage of progress we come to the doctrine of Symmetry. This embraces measures, phrases, and periods. The consideration of Musical Form follows this. Here we inquire into the distinguishing characteristics of the various kinds of composition; such as songs, dances, romances, nocturnes, the rondo, sonata, symphony, opera, cantata, oratorio, etc.

We have now, as far as it regards the melody, harmony, and form, the ability to write any kind of composition we may desire. The question of the color, or timbre, of tones to be employed now arises. This involves the study of the varieties of the human voice, the various general classes of instruments, the mechanism, timbre, and compass of each separate instrument, and its appropriate use. To this is added the art of combining and contrasting the different masses of tone in the orchestra.

With a thorough mastery of the various branches of knowledge thus briefly hinted at, and with a natural tendency toward melodic and rhythmic expression, the young composer is able to take a fair start in the race toward favor, distinction, or greatness. And will any lower standard of attainment be admissible?

The question arises: To how great an extent ought this study to be pursued by such students as do not desire to become composers, or even virtuosi? To this it is answered: Only in outline. And in all cases the principle holds that "general knowledge precedes special;" so that students who desire ultimately to explore the whole domain of musical science, ought first to study the subject in outline, in order to get a general idea of the true place and rank of each separate department, in the ardent pursuit of any one of which the student is led to forget that there exist others quite as important and equally interesting.

NOTE. An outline work on this whole subject has been prepared, and at some future time will, no doubt, see the light. A minute treatment of the whole subject is to be found in Marx's "Kompositionslehre," 4 vols., and in the works of Gottfried Weber and others. Cherubini's treatise on "Counterpoint and Fugue" is the best in that department. An English translation is published by Novello. Berlioz's Treatise on Orchestration, also published by Novello, gives information belonging to the fifth stage of progress. No treatise in English on Musical Form is known to the writer. A translation of Marx's volume on that subject is in progress.

The Musical Conservatoire at Brussels.

(Report of P. Le Neve Foster, Esq., Secretary of the Society of Arts, London).

In compliance with the instructions given by the Council, I visited Brussels, and placed myself in communication with M. Fétis, the director of the Conservatoire Royal de Musique, and also with M. Cornélis, professor of singing in that establishment, and supported by public funds by vote of the Chambers, and by a subsidy from the town and the province, as well as by fees from foreign pupils. The instruction given is absolutely free to all Belgians of both sexes; foreigners are admitted on payment of an annual fee of £8 sterling. The instruction thus given is only for those intended for the profession, and not for amateurs; but inasmuch as there is no control over the students after they leave the Conservatoire, practically the education is open to all, without distinction.

The branches taught are—1. Solfeggio and reading music; 2. Singing—solo and concerted; 3. The organ; 4. Stringed and wind instruments and the piano-forte; 5. Thorough-bass and accompaniment; 6. Composition; 7. The Italian language and Latin pronunciation; 8. French declamation. There may be, in addition, a class for the plain chant, for acoustics, and for musical aesthetics. A Director, professors, supplementary professors, and répétiteurs have charge of the instruction.

The administration of the institution is under the charge of a Commission of seven members, including the president, all of whom are named by the King. It chooses a vice-president and treasurer from among its own body. The Burgomaster of Brussels is honorary President. The Director and secretary, who is also librarian, are not members. The Commission proposes to the minister, jointly with the Director, all the officers. It regulates all the expenses, the discipline, and interior economy, and, in consultation, the Director fixes the number of répétiteurs and pupils in each class. The Commission meets once a month, and annually settles the budget of expenses with the Director, and presents a report. Once every three months, at least, the members must make an inspection of the classes. Every member who has been absent from the meetings of the commission for six months ceases to belong to it.

The Director is appointed by the King, and can be removed by a ministerial decree. He has the general direction of the studies, methods of study, and the discipline of the classes as regards both professors and pupils. He may attend the deliberations of the Commission, but has no voice in it. He examines and admits or receives pupils, reporting the same to the Commission. He has charge of the furniture, instruments, and of the property of the establishment generally. With him, assisted by the professors of singing and instrumental music, rests the admission or rejection of the candidates.

Candidates for admission as pupils must be able to read and write, and must bring certificates of birth. They must be above seven years old. After 12 they cannot be admitted to the solfeggio classes, unless they can read music. After 15, they are not admitted to an instrumental class unless they show a certain aptitude, and can read music. They can enter the singing classes up to the age of 25, provided they can read music. Those admitted commence their studies the first Monday in October annually. The pupils cannot be absent without leave from the professor, or more than one day in the month without leave from the director, and only for serious reasons. After prolonged absence they are re-examined before re-admission.

The professors and sub-professors are responsible for the conduct of their classes, under the supervision of the Director. Leave of absence may be given them for a fortnight by the Director; for a month by the Commissioner, for beyond that period by the minister, under the advice of the Director and the Commission, but not more than once in the year, without the special authority of the minister. Absent professors are replaced by the sub-professors or répétiteurs. The former receive the salary of the professors during their absence. If the absence is unavoidable for important reasons, the professor only loses half his salary for the time. If absent for a fortnight or for a month with a medical certificate he loses nothing; beyond that time a quarter of his salary is taken for the benefit of his substitute. Any professor absent without leave or illness is fined two days' salary. Prolonged absence is reported to the minister, and visited with dismissal or suspension. Professors named by the Director take part in the practices and public and private performances. The Director chooses the répétiteurs from the most distinguished pupils. They have annual salary, and after two years of approved conduct may succeed to a vacancy as sub-professor. There is an officer termed Superintendent of studies, who is responsible for the order of the studies, and for the maintenance of discipline in the classes. He registers and makes a daily report of the presence or absence of the teachers or pupils, and must be present a quarter-of-an-hour before and during the time of study. He has under him servants who attend to the classes, fill the offices of messenger, porters and orchestra men. He has also the care of the instruments.

The library contains—1. Works on the theory and practice of music, for the use of the classes, 2. Scores and separate parts for the concerts; 3. Books and music for the instruction of the pupils and for reference. The advanced pupils may borrow library books with the permission of the director, the same being registered, and for no longer than a month.

In the month of May the Director commences his examination of all the students in the Conservatoire, in the presence of the professors in charge of each class. He ascertains the progress made in the year, and how far each pupil has advanced in his education. These examinations, which take place daily, last about six weeks. On the result of these examinations, the Director determines the dismissal of those pupils who have done nothing during the year. This, however, is rare, for there is a great amount of emulation in the school among the students. The Director also determines from among the students those who shall be admitted to the competitions. The Director examines all the pupils twice a year, and makes a report to the Commission. Each professor and teacher makes a report of the pupils in his class.

The competitive examinations for prizes take place annually in the last week in July, and first week in August. After receiving the reports from the professors, the director admits the pupils for competition, and those who are to accompany the solos and conduct the classes. The competitions in harmony and solfeggio are conducted with closed doors. Those for instruments and singing, in public. A jury of five or seven members is appointed by the Commission to award the prizes, of which the Director is President. The prizes are given by a majority of votes. In case of an equal number of votes, the Director has a second vote.

The names of the successful candidates are published in the newspapers. Each candidate plays or sings one piece at sight, and one which has been previously studied.

The prizes, of which the value is annually fixed by the Commission, consist of scores and works on the theory and history of music, collections of music for pianoforte, voice and solfeggio; and to the instrumental pupils bow and wind instruments. The prize-holders receive with the prizes a laurel crown and a certificate. The accessits receive a palm. The distribution of prizes takes place if possible in the month after the beginning of the academical year. It is followed by a concert in which the pupils who have obtained the first prizes are permitted to perform solos.

The pupils who obtain the first prizes for their instrumental performances, their singing, for their performance on the organ, or for composition, are artists whose education is considered complete, and their studies finished. The term usually required to turn out an artist of talent complete, comprising a knowledge of composition, is about eight years. Each pupil gets about six hours of teaching in a week.

Concerts are given by the professors and pupils of the Conservatoire. The Commission fix the number with the Director, who arranges the days and the programme, and at the beginning of each academical year he publishes in the school a list of the professors and pupils who are to take part in the orchestra and chorus of the concerts. Tickets for the concerts are sold, and the proceeds distributed amongst the most distinguished scholars.

The Town Councils of the Provincial towns are in the habit of paying the expenses of promising pupils, i.e., of those who obtain the first prizes at Académies des Beaux Arts in those towns, in order to enable them to follow the classes at Brussels or Liège.

There are annually two vacations: from Palm Sunday to the first Sunday after Easter, and from the 15th of August to the 1st of October.

The Director has a private residence in the building of the Conservatoire. The rooms for conducting the teaching of the Conservatoire consist of ten class-rooms and a large room in which the organ is placed. In it also the smaller concerts are given, the larger concerts and the competitive examinations taking place in the Palais Ducal.

The building appropriated to the Conservatoire is of ancient character and forms a quadrangle, with a garden in the centre. It was formerly the residence of a nobleman, and has been purchased either by the Government or the City of Brussels for the use of the Conservatoire. The arms of the former owners may be seen affixed to the building.

ANECDOTE OF "DER FREYSCHÜTZ." A story is told by Hector Berlioz, which is as wildly romantic as if concocted in the Wolf's Glen at midnight. We give it in his own words:—"When Der Freyschütz was performed in Paris, I was young and enthusiastic—oh, enthusiastic à mourir. Weber took my heart by storm. I had never heard such music; it drove me out of myself—it bewitched—it enthralled me. There was then a young medical student in Paris, my bosom friend—his name was Eugene Sue. The world has since known it. What Weber was to me, Weber was to him; we both venerated, we both idolized the great Carl. Night after night were we in the front row of the gallery. To us it was indeed Paradise. We never missed a representation. But tastes differ, mon ami. There was a fellow who came there as regularly as we; but when we applauded he hissed—when we applauded he sneered! The animal hissed and sneered at Carl Von Weber! Was it supportable? No! Three times did I and Sue fall upon him vi et armis, and three times was he rudely ejected from the shrine which he profaned. Eh, bien! mais le temps marche toujours. Our first fervor for Der Freyschütz abated, but not our friendship. One night, years after, Sue came to me; he was then in the Hotel Dieu. 'Guess, my dear friend,' said he, 'who has died in my ward? A man with a strange disease of the brain, producing distortion of the skull.' 'Eh bien! and what then?' 'Why, the man is—' 'Who?' 'The old unbeliever in Der Freyschütz.' Again years passed over, and I had forgotten about the matter. Sue was a great novelist. I had charge of the Grand Opera. I determined to get up Der Freyschütz. The incantation scene was to be specially splendid. It was not until the last moment that I found I wanted a skull. Off I sent to my old friend Sue. The author had not forgotten the doctor, and his small cabinet of medical curiosities was at my service. 'Take that skull,' he said, 'but for heaven's sake be careful of it! Never was there a finer specimen of a rare disease.' So off I went with the relic of mortality. Carefully did I place it in its position, among vampires, and owls, and fiery serpents, and skeleton horses. It was not until the casting of the seven bullets had commenced that a thought flashed upon me. The skull! Gracious powers! it may be—it must be—it is—it is—the skull of the man who hissed Der Freyschütz! I flew around to Sue's box. I told him my thought, and he corroborated it. Marvellous the course of retributive justice! We leaned over the cushion, we gazed at the mute grinning basin of bone, and we said, as with one voice, "This is Der Freyschütz! The music of Carl Von Weber is thundering around you! and now, skull, hiss—hiss—hiss—if you can!"

"L' Africaine" in Berlin.

As regards the cast and execution of the German adaptation, there is much to be said for and against, contrasting both with those of Paris and London. But on one point there can be but one opinion, namely, as to the mise-en-scène. There cannot be the slightest hesitation in stating, that in artistic conception and finish, the "business" of the stage is infinitely superior to the Italian and English versions. It may be said that the managers here had the experience of the past to guide them. Not so however. It is that an entirely new line has been struck out in the action of the story in many portions. Thus, the pantomime in the Council Scene, the quadruple by-play on the different decks of the ship, and the spectacular arrangements of the Indian March were as novel as they were ingenious and animated. Unless he had seen "rows" in a French Chamber of Deputies, in constitutional days, a spectator of the lively discussion in the Portuguese Council during the consideration of the plans of the great navigator, Vasco di Gama, might have concluded that there was exaggeration in the gesture of the artists here; but the effect was admirable of the strong feelings of the antagonistic parties, the animated action giving point to the magnificent concerted piece which the composer has carried on in the debate. In the ship scene, the nautical details were in the main excellent. No doubt when Prussia has a good fleet in the Baltic, supernumeraries will be found more au fait in running up and down the yards; but if the "old salts" were not exactly T. P. Cooke, the general business was unexceptionable. The two cabins of Ines and Don Pedro, the main-deck and the quarter-deck were all separately shown, instead of the really disgraceful jumble at Covent Garden. More than this realization of a ship, was the atmospheric effect of the sunrise in a mist and of the threatening clouds of the storm. The mécs took place in every part of the ship, the Indians seeking for the Europeans in every nook. The alteration in the course of the vessel and the sinking, were cleverly contrived. The call for Herr Daubner, the mechanist, was a well merited compliment to his ingenuity.

M. Paul Taglioni had a special ovation for his arrangement of the procession which ushers in Selika in the fourth act. This scene indeed must be pronounced to be one of the most splendid spectacular triumphs ever witnessed on any stage. The entire action and dancing differ from those of Paris and London. The ballet at Berlin has always been famed. The mimes are admirably trained and the bevy of coryphées and figurantes not to be surpassed anywhere. The March was a continued series of surprises to those who had seen the opera elsewhere. The opening told, as a large mass of Indians rushed in to prostrate themselves before the idol. It would break Harris's heart to see the Priestesses, Brahmins, Jongleurs, Amazons, Warriors, &c. Such gorgeous picturesque costumes; such endless changes; such manoeuvres! The climax was overwhelmingly imposing and enchanting, for after the masses had been formed in close circles round the Queen, they retreated backwards, extending the circles down to the footlights from the rear of the stage, amidst the massive strains of the two bands. The opera was stopped for some minutes until the ballet-master appeared and made his bow at the call of the excited audience.

The Scene Painter, Herr Gropius, senr., was not forgotten, for he was summoned for his beautiful scene of the "Mancenillier" tree; and the master-mind in the mounting of the work—the Harris of Berlin—Herr Hein, the Régisseur, received also at the end of the opera a special ovation.

The Conductor of the Africaine was Herr Dorn. He fully entitled himself to the distinction of a recall, for with the materials at his command, his reading of the score was careful and conscientious. As regards his "cats," it is fortunate he is not within your metropolitan boundaries to be annihilated by the "connoisseurs and critics," at whose "suggestions" the directors of the English Opera Company (Limited) pitched into Costa by implication for the abridgment in the Italian adaptation. Herr Dorn has in fact pursued nearly the same course in pruning as Costa;—that is, he takes out bits here and there from a piece; he suppresses repeats, he excises recitatives, he leaves out items in the middle of a concerted morceau. Dorn is in every way entitled to the elegant epithets which one of your contemporaries has so freely employed. It is not necessary in this missive to enter into a discussion as to the modus operandi of a cutting down.

The simple statement of the fact that the German professor has adapted the same system as the Italian maestro is left to your editorial appreciation. Your correspondent was certainly astounded, when already in the first act he found that the terzetto of Ines, Don Diego and Don Pedro, instead of being omitted altogether as in (Italian), was abbreviated, the passage of the passionate lament of Ines being actually suppressed. Herr Dorn has fallen foul of the third act awfully; the excisions are of every kind—bars here and there, and pieces bodily. After the duo between Vasco and Don Diego short work is made of Meyerbeer's score. The conductor concludes, like Costa, with canonic intervals during the Indian outburst.

It may be interesting to know the duration of the Africaine here. Beginning at six sharp, the curtain fell at ten minutes to eleven; but the entr'actes were long. The first act was over at eight minutes to seven. The second began at eight minutes past seven and terminated at a quarter to eight. At three minutes past eight the Ship act was commenced and concluded at twenty minutes to nine. At nine precisely the fourth act began and ended at ten minutes to ten. At ten minutes past ten the fifth act opened and at twenty (?) minutes to eleven the curtain fell finally on the Africaine. The longest wait was between the third and fourth acts—to remove the ship. Upwards of an hour and a half was taken up with delays between the acts. In justice to the audience of Saturday be it recorded that not a person moved before the opera was ended, and when the bust of Meyerbeer was crowned by Lucca, during which ceremonial the orchestra played the "Morceau d' Unisson," everybody in the house, from the monarch downwards, stood up.

The cast of the opera was as follows:—

Selika.....Pauline Lucca.
Ines.....Mad. Harriers Wipperm.
Anna.....Fräulein Retz.
Don Pedro.....Herr Salomon.
Don Diego.....Herr Krause.
Don Alvar.....Herr Kruger.
The Grand Inquisitor.....Herr Bost.
The Grand Brahmin.....Herr Fricks.
Nelusko.....Herr Betz.
Vasco di Gama.....Herr Wachtel.

The curious in casts can compare the above with Mme. Saxe, Mdle. Battu, MM. Beval, Castelmarty, Warot, Faure, Portehaut, Obin and Naudin (Paris); Wachtel, Atri, Capponi, Lucchesi, Graziani, Herr Schmidt, Tagliasco, Fioretti, and Lucca (Italians at Royal Italian Opera); H. Corri, Dusek, Lyall, A. Cook, Laurence, Patey, C. Adams, Miss Louisa Pyne, Mme. Sherrington, Mrs. A. Cook (English at Royal English Opera).

The general character of the execution here lacks animation. The German conductors like to take their time in everything. They are exact and not impulsive—finished but not elegant. Even the Morceau d' Unisson was dragged inordinately; but it did not fail to rouse the house, and the encore was inevitable. The chorus has been well trained, and the voices are good—those of the women in the ship scene coming out charmingly. The orchestra has not only the disadvantage of being numerically weak in the strings, but these are not balanced against the ordinary complement of wood, brass and percussion. The platform, however, is in a deep hole. Thirty-five stringed instruments against Costa's sixty-four good men and true are formidable odds against Berlin.

The principal vocalists (Lucca, Wipperm, and Wachtel excepted) are not up to the mark. The best, next to the three cited is Herr Betz, the Nelusko, who has a fine voice, which he scarcely knows how to turn to the best account, but is no actor. The effect produced by the chief singers on the house may be best understood by citing the recalls. In the first act, Harriers Wipperm, after the romance; and Wachtel (enthusiastically), after the finale. In the second, Lucca after the Berreuse, Betz after the air, Lucca and Wachtel after the duet, all the artists after the Septuor finale; then Lucca, Wachtel, Wipperm, and Betz, and finally Lucca and Wachtel. In the third act, the machinist had an ovation, as also Herr Betz. In the fourth act, Nelusko was recalled after the adagio in which he resigns Selika; Wachtel after the cavatina; Lucca and Wachtel twice during the duet; and Lucca and Wachtel three separate times after the fall of the curtain. In the last act, the two sopranos had a salutation for their high A's in the duet; the Morceau d' Unisson was rapturously redemanded; and Lucca, after a series of ovations in the final scene, had the crowning glory of the night. It should be noticed that the applause was confined to no particular part of the house. It came from royalty, rank and fashion, as well as from the stalls and upper region; there was no more earnest applause during the night than the King of Prussia. Lucca has carried away the honors. She has gained immensely in declamatory power, and singing in her own language afforded her an advantage of which she most skilfully availed herself. She is indeed a Selika, full of charm, quite equal to the most pathetic portions of the music. The Wachtel of Vienna and of Berlin in German is a very different person from the Wachtel of London in Italian. He has certainly improved greatly in Vasco, and made a greater impression in the love duet than with the two high C's with which he favored the Berliners. (He has a son at Vienna, 20 years of age, who is said to have even a finer voice than his father.)

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Orchestra's correspondent (Jan. 2) gives the following résumé of the past operatic year, premising that it is not all comprised in the one name "L' Africaine." He begins with the Grand Opera:

The year opened at this theatre with the continued success of "Roland;" and with the exception of one or two performances of "La Muette," which served for the réentrée of Mdle. Marie Battu, and an occasional night with "Guillaume Tell," nothing of any importance took place until the 26th April, 1865, when Meyerbeer's posthumous work, L' Africaine, was given for the first time. A bare mention of the fact will suffice here, for enough has already been said in these columns and elsewhere of this immense production. The only other novelty was Le Roi d' Yvetot, a ballet pantomime in one act, by MM. de Massas and Petipa, music by M. Théodore Lebarre; total six acts. The new comers are these: a contralto, Mdle. Bloch, who made her début in the part of Azucena ("Le Trouvère"); M. Delabranche, an aspiring tenorino, who sang Manrico in the same opera; and Mdle. Mauduit, a very fair and dramatic Alice ("Robert le Diable"). The three novices were well received, but I fear there is neither a Stoltz, a Falcon, nor a Duprez to be found among them. Difficulties arose between the management and the members of the chorus on one hand and the orchestra on the other. The former were successful and obtained an increase of salary; the last, notwithstanding a very well-written and moderate request, were sent rather roughly about their business with an intimation from a high authority that if they didn't like it they might—do the other thing, which I suppose means keeping quiet, for that's what they are doing at present.

The first new event of the year at the Opéra Comique was the production of "Le Saphir" (blue), music by M. Felicien David, libretto founded on "All's Well that Ends Well," arranged by MM. Méry Radot and De Leuven. The other new work is M. Bazin's "Voyage en Chine," an account of which I sent you a few days ago, making six acts of entire novelty, to which add seven for important reprises of operas which have not been given for years, "Marie" (Hérold), "Les Porcherons" (Grisar), and "Les Deux Chasseurs et la Laitière" (Duni). The stock attractions have been "Le Pré aux Clercs" (Hérold), "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine" (Halévy), "La Dame Blanche" (Boïeldien), &c. Mdme. Cabel made her réentrée on the 23rd Dec., in Auber's "Ambasadrice," and among the débuts I notice the names of Mdles. Roze, Gontier, Flory, Cadet, Seveste; MM. Falchieri, Leroy, Melchissede, &c.

The Lyrique began the year with "Mireille," in three acts; this opera had a long run, and "Faust" also received its usual share of favor. "L' Aventurier," by M. de St. Georges, music by the Prince Poniatowski, was unfortunate, and died young (26th Jan.) Next came "La Flûte Enchantée" (Mozart's Zauberflöte), an immense success, which ran right through the season, was the opening piece after the recess, and withdrawn but a few days back, to make way for two novelties, to be mentioned in their turn. Verdi's "Macbeth" (May 21st) came like a shadow and so departed. From one-act operas, "Les Mémoires de Fanchette" by the Comte Gabrielli; M. de Hartog's "Mariage de Dom Lope" (a dead failure), "Le Rio Caudale" (Dias de la Pena), and Mendelssohn's charming "Retour" ("Son and Stranger"), were also performed, and the house was closed on June the 1st, and re-opened on Sept. 1st. Shortly after M. Chérouvri's "Rio des Mines" was given, but without success. Violetta ("La Traviata") with the charming Mdle. Nilsen, "Rigoletto," "La Flûte," etc., "Don Pasquale" (for the début of M. Boquin), were the stock works until the end of December, when "Marta" (Flotow) and M. Bartho's "Fiancée de Abydos" were produced with great success: Mdle. Nilsen and Mdme. Carvalho taking the principal soprano parts. This gives a total of eleven operas, containing twenty-five acts, and produced (accounts being taken of the two months' vacation) at the rate of rather more than an opera per month. Très bien, M. Carvalho. We have only to remember that M. Bagier is director of the Italiens, to be sure that the troupe of the Salle Ventadour has not been idle. In January we had the début of M. Verger as Don Carlos in "Ernani." Success. Same month "La Cenerentola" for M<sup>me</sup>. Talvo Bedogni, qui n'a fait que passer. In February "La Sonnambula," with La Patti, Brignoli and Agnesi, drew good houses. An action brought against the management by M<sup>me</sup>. Veuve Scribe, claiming a right to prevent the performance, was arranged à l'amiable. "La Duchessa di San Giuliano" by M. Graffigna, founded on Veronica Cibo, a blood-thirsty production by Guerazzi, was unsuccessful, and was played three times only. On April 11th we had "Crispino e la Comare" by the brothers Ricci. This genuine opera buffo, interpreted by such artists as a Vitali, Zucchini, Agnesi and Mercuriali, was the great success of the season, which ended on the 4th of May. The same opera served for the inauguration of the term 1865-66, and was followed by "Lucresia Borgia" for the retrés of Fraschini, and the débuts of M<sup>lle</sup>. Grossi, a capital contralto, who was well received, and has since advanced in favor by her excellent performance of Azucena ("Il Trovatore"), Pierrot ("Linda"), and Maddalena ("Rigoletto"). Cagnoni's "Don Bucefalo" was given on November 9th, and was a great triumph for Zucchini."

BERLIN. A correspondent of the Springfield Republican writes as follows of Liebig's popular symphony concerts.

"Berlin is preëminently a city for seeing the inside rather than the outside of objects; it is the home of institutions rather than of splendid architecture. One of these institutions is Liebig's symphony concerts. These are very popular with Americans in Berlin, and, in truth, with the best elements of German society here. They are given in large halls in every quarter of the city, as Berlin is now grown so huge that people can hardly think of travelling two or three miles to attend a concert. So Liebig and his band appear on Monday night in one hall, on Tuesday in another, and Wednesday in still another, and so on. The main feature of interest is the fact that classical music, the great symphonies of Beethoven, the great overtures of Mozart and Schumann, are given, and are decidedly liked; nay, I dare go further and say, enjoyed. These concerts are not dress affairs, mere fashionable gatherings for the purpose of showing off magnificent toilettes; they are gatherings of gentlemen and ladies in the simple afternoon dress, who come together for the one acknowledged object of hearing an excellent band play classical music. The price of admission is the ridiculously low sum of seven cents and a half. The people all take their places, in the universal German fashion, around little square tables, and can order beer, coffee, or a hearty supper, if they like. There is not the slightest obligation to do so, and the Americans seldom or ever do. But a German cannot enjoy fine scenery, fine music, or anything fine in nature or art without it be over beer, at least, and as many other good things, such as fried meat and potatoes, coffee, bread and cheese, ham and the like, as his purse can bear. This is one of the most whimsical phases of the German character; and the nation consequently assumes the appearance of a race of perpetual eaters, drinkers and smokers. At every railway station, where a three minutes' stay is made, there is a frantic rush for beer and sausages; at the concert there is no getting on without beer; between the acts at the theatre there are unceasing cries for beer. They do not go quite so far as to put beer tables in the churches, but in the halls where the free-thinkers of the Renan, or as we should say, of the Theodore Parker school, meet on the Sunday, beer drinking is as common as in the concert room.

But I have wandered a little from good Herr Liebig and his concerts. I say good Herr Liebig, for although his name pronounced in the English fashion has rather a wicked sound, yet his life has been a missionary one, in a pure and high sense of the word. Twenty-four years ago he formed the conception and began to act upon it, that in a great city like Berlin, and with the aid of a well-trained band of musicians, it would be possible to educate a public which should enjoy the highest music; a public which should not praise Beethoven, and hear him, notwithstanding, with ennui, but a public composed of the scholarly, professional and fashionable world, which should take great delight in the highest works of genius. I wish Mendelssohn could have lived to see the happy fulfilment of Liebig's plan. His concerts are thronged, and though the price is so small, they remunerate him and his band, although they can never make him a rich man. So while the current of the fashionable world sets towards the opera, Liebig draws around him and educates the real culture of Berlin, and I know not a place where one sits down with so true a sense of comfort, and of feeling that he is in the most appreciative of society, as in one of his concerts. I was at one two evenings ago. The programme embraced Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, and one by Haydn, an overture by Schumann, and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. A classical programme, yet thoroughly enjoyed. The audience is impatient of the slightest disturbance, and woe betide the unlucky man who moves his chair, or moves his foot, or has the indiscretion to cough aloud. A score of hisses instantly silences him. The waiters walk around on tiptoe, catching orders given in the faintest whispers. Between the pieces there is talk and laughter and cheer, but the first movement of Liebig's baton hushes all to silence. Above the heads of the audience the thin smoke clouds gather, increasing in density as the evening advances. Fainter and fainter grow the forms of Liebig and his coadjutors, and when ten o'clock comes, the audience is hid from its own view by the massive grey canopy which rests upon it. But the men enjoy it, and the ladies are used to it, and the musicians expect it, and the Americans must submit to it, and who's to blame? But this is one of the essential features of Liebig's concerts, and Liebig's concerts, smoke included, are one of the nicest institutions of Berlin.

FLORENCE.—A correspondent of the Orchestra writes:

We are full of chamber music. The Guidi party, with Becker to lead, after giving ten matinees, announce four soirées. The Sbolce party, after their first series of six evening quartet concerts, announce a second. Benefit concerts are given by M<sup>lle</sup>. Fanny Jervis, an English pianist of Italian descent on her mother's side, and a very talented performer; Perelli, a first-rate pianist, also gives his grand concert. Two orchestral concerts have lately been given in aid of funds to erect a monument to the illustrious composer Cherubini, a native of this city. Bazzini gives three morning chamber concerts of modern music. A sestet by Brahms was not very successful. A prize quartet by Bazzini was much liked, and pleased me much. In this composition there is less pretension and more effect; in the labored sestet of Brahms there is a total absence of genius—in short, a brilliant poverty of ideas. La Patti has left us, and nothing tempts one to go and hear operas which I have witnessed in Paris and London far better performed.

M<sup>me</sup>. Griè and her family have left the Villa Salviati, and are by this time in London to meet Mario, from Madrid. Pissuti is progressing with his opera, on a subject taken from Shakespeare's plays. There is a subscription going on here to erect a monument at Arezzo to the inventor of the nomenclature of the gamut—Guido d'Arezzo. Several distinguished names are in the list of contributors, headed by the great master of the gamut himself—Rossini.

LONDON.—The six preliminary rehearsals of the Concordia (new society for the performance of neglected old master-works) have passed off with éclat the Society steadily gaining in numbers. The Orchestra says:

Many admirable works have been already resuscitated, and although the "Seasons," introduced for the sake of visitors who could not be expected to feel interested in the drill required by less known compositions, can scarcely be called an "unfamiliar masterpiece" upon the whole, even at the outset enough has been done to prove that the society is thoroughly true to its principles. Amongst the works proposed for the serious business to come, are Mozart's Mass (No. 13) in E flat, Haydn's "Tempest," Graun's "Te Deum," and a Mass by Schumann. We may add that the organization of the society is now complete, a change having been made in the case of Dr. Flowers, who has accepted the post of Curator of Scores, his successor as organist being Mr. Alfred Carden, who appears to be eminently qualified for that important duty.

VIENNA.—Herr von Köchel, the well-known writer on musical subjects, lately delivered a most interesting lecture on the state of music, and the patronage bestowed on it by the rulers of Austria ever since the fifteenth century. The lecture may be termed an illustrated lecture, seeing that Herr von Köchel exhibited portraits of most of the sovereigns and celebrated artists he mentioned in it.

COBURG.—According to a letter from the Abbé Liszt there will be a grand performance of his "Dante Symphony" on the occasion of the opening at Rome, some time this month, of the Dante Picture Gallery, which contains twenty-seven colossal pictures, representing the principal events in the Divina Commedia. There is a probability, also, that the Abbé will attend the next meeting of composers in this town.

MUNICH.—In conformity with the last wishes of her deceased husband, M<sup>ad</sup>. Schnorr von Carolsfeld has accepted a post as teacher of singing in the Conservatory here.

BERLIN.—The Sing-Academie at its first concert this winter performed Sebastian Bach's great Mass in B minor. The singers are said to have brought out all the beauties of this sublime conception. We can readily believe it after hearing them, five years ago, execute perfectly a sixteen-part Mass, by their conductor, Grell, all without accompaniment, a capella, full of elaborate counterpoint, of course, and two hours long!—Herr Ehrlich, who, since von Bülow's secession, has been pronounced the best pianist in Berlin, has commenced a series of concerts. He "literally carried away his audience in a Suite by Handel, and played with unprecedented brio a Caprice by Alkan, a composition much esteemed here by all musicians; besides interpreting like a great musician, as he is, the Sonatas of Beethoven in C minor and in C-sharp minor."

LEIPZIG.—At the tenth Gewandhaus Concert M. Gouvy conducted in person the performance of a new Symphony of his own. According to the Gazette Musicale, of Paris, the Allegro and Minuet, distinguished by much verve of rhythm and elaborate harmony, were much applauded.—Max Bruch's opera Loreley, was performed for the first time at the town theatre, with disputed success. "The verses of the poem (by Emanuel Geibel) are often very beautiful, but the action is barren. As for the score of Bruch, it contains parts which are very remarkable, and the orchestration shows a master hand; but the almost complete absence of melodic inspiration will always be opposed to the real success of the work." We have seen, however, that M<sup>lle</sup>. Tietjens, the foremost London prima donna, fell in love with this work during her recent visit to Germany, and means to have it brought out in London.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 29.—We have seldom enjoyed the pleasure of recording so many genuine concerts, as have taken place here within the short period of three weeks; six, of decidedly artistic value. New York has been favored (?) with more than twice that number of others this month; but your correspondent claims a dispensation from the reporting thereof. First in order as to date, we find the programme of an organ concert, given by Mr. S. WARREN. Mr. Warren is yet a young man, a pupil of Haupt in Berlin; he masters his instrument with ease, certainty, and taste; his facility in the use of the pedals is remarkable. That Mr. Warren aims at the highest, his programme (containing a Toccata, a Sonata, and a Fugue by Bach, things by Mendelssohn, Thiele, &c.) successfully proves. He has selected New York as his place of residence, and will be an acquisition to the city, for the right kind of organ playing and organ music is rarely heard here. We hope to have another speedy opportunity of hearing Mr. Warren.

Here is the programme of the first soirée of Chamber Music, which took place in Dodworth's Hall, on the 10th of January:

Quartet, String, G. No. 1.....Mozart.
Trio, Piano, D. Op. 70, No. 1.....Beethoven.
Sextet, String, B flat, Op. 18.....Brahms.
1. Allegro ma non troppo. 2. Andante, ma moderato.
3. Scherzo, Allegro molto. 4. Rondo, Poco Allegretto e gracioso.
Executants: William Mason, Piano; Theo. Thomas, Violin; S. Morenthal, do; G. Matska, Viola; J. Hess, do; F. Berger, Violoncello; H. Mollenhauer, do.

Of course the great masters Mozart and Beethoven delighted us as ever, with their noble works. The novelty, a Sextet by Brahms, is a work that possesses its good features, together with many defects. While it has some fine thoughts, such as the charming theme with which it commences, we find others that are nothing more than trivial, far-fetched. Brahms never appears true to himself; it seems to us that he willingly avoids what is individual in his own talent, in order to appear original. We seldom enjoy a pure, unalloyed pleasure while listening to his works, on account of this untruthfulness, which will suggest itself to us.

The fourth Symphony Soirée of THEODORE THOMAS took place in Irving Hall on the 13th January. Here is the interesting programme:

- Symphony, C, Op. 80.....Bargiel.
1. Allegro energico. 2. Andante con moto. 3. Menuetto.
4. Allegro Molto.
Sona and Aria, "Ah! perdo.".....Beethoven.
Fantasia, F Minor, Op. 49.....Chopin.
Mme. Parepa.
Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.
Volkland.....
Liederkranz Society. Conductor, Agricol Pauer.
Overture, "Melusine," Op. 32.....Mendelssohn.
Aria, "If guiltless blood," (Susanna).....Handel.
Mme. Parepa.
Fantasia, Op. 80, for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, Beethoven.

Bargiel's Symphony is, in many respects, a meritorious work, especially when we remember that it is his first in this difficult form. The composer, however, does not often step forward in his own individuality; his invention of themes is not always the happiest, and in the working out of his motives he is sometimes tiresome. Yet there are points in the work that command us to respect the talented young composer, such as the Minuet with its fine Trio, and much in the first movement. The Andante is only spoiled by its too uniform and long spun out close, but the last movement is the weakest of all. However, Bargiel has here opened a path to his future instrumental compositions.

We cannot remember to have heard Madame Parepa sing more finely than in this concert; the rest of a few days seemed to have removed the traces of fatigue, so apparent in her voice when singing the preceding weeks at the Academy of Music. In Beethoven's great aria, she displayed her uncommon compass and power to the highest advantage, in spite of the great demand this fatiguing (for ordinary singers) work makes upon the vocal organs. These qualities and her fine steady tone, were also fully appreciated in Handel's dramatic air from "Susanna." When Madame Parepa sings genuine music, she gives us the thoughts of the great masters presented in a large cartoon, as it were; then we find breadth of conception, continuity of power, great bravura; the lady only needs a finer finish in detail, and the breath of poetic passion, which is not, alas! to be acquired, to be a really great singer in the highest sense of the word. Mr. Wolfsohn again proved himself the talented and progressive artist; he added much to the enjoyment of the evening, especially in the pianoforte part of Beethoven's lovely and interesting Fantasia. The concert was altogether one of the finest that we have had here for a long time, and we hope it will not be the last, of so entirely satisfactory a nature, which we may enjoy in the course of Mr. Thomas's soirées.

The second soirée of Chamber Music took place on the 24th. There were three pieces. Spohr's Sextet (in C, op. 140) a very fine work, was played by Messrs. THOMAS, MOSENTHAL, MATZKA, BERGNER, with the assistance of Messrs. J. HESS and H. MÖLLENHAUER. The second movement, Larghetto, is remarkably beautiful. Schumann's Trio (G minor, op. 110) was excellently played by MASON, THOMAS and BERGNER. The great Beethoven Quartet (E flat, op. 74), was well interpreted also.

Madame FANNY RAYMOND RITTER gave a concert in Dodworth's Hall on the evening of the 23rd of January. The following programme was performed:

1. Second Trio—For Pianoforte, Violin and Cello, Op. 80 Schumann.
Messrs. Mills, Thomas and Bergner.
2. a) Aria, "O del mio dolce Ardor," from "Paris and Helen".....Gluck.
b) Arietta, "Lascia ch'io pianga," from "Rinaldo." Handel.
Madame Fanny Raymond Ritter.

3. a) Berceuse.....Chopin.
b) Etude.....
Mr. S. B. Mills.
4. Sonata, ("Kreutzer") for Piano and Violin. Op. 47. Beethoven.
Messrs. Mills and Thomas.
5. a) Invocation.....List.
b) "Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden," from the Liederkreis. Op. 24.....Schumann.
Madame Fanny Raymond Ritter.
6. Variations—Piano et Violoncelle. Op. 17.....Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Mills and Bergner.
7. Irish Melodies—"Love's Young Dream," and "The Minstrel Boy," arranged with accompaniment for Piano, Violin and Violoncello.....Beethoven.
Madame Ritter, Messrs. Mosenthal, Thomas and Bergner.

In Gluck's beautiful aria, as well as in Handel's lovely little arietta, Mme. Raymond Ritter gave evidence of a rich and powerful voice, and warm poetic feeling. The Goethe-Lisztian invocation, "Der du von dem Himmel bist," as well as Schumann's great dramatic song, were very effective, and well suited to the songstress's impassioned style of singing. The charming accompanied Irish melodies made us wish to hear more such arrangements by the old Lion, who, it is known, delighted in them, and worked them over and over again, so much had he fallen in love with his task. Nearly all these vocal selections were introduced for the first time to the public here.

Schumann's fine Trio in F was worthily executed, and in the "Kreutzer Sonata" MILLS and THOMAS played most admirably. Mendelssohn's Variations were also finely played. Mills displayed on this occasion not only his wonderful technical power and fine touch, but also the most intelligent and artistic conception. This was altogether a most delightfully arranged and in every way successful concert.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave us this programme at their third concert, in the Academy of Music, on the 27th.

- Symphony, No. 1, in D, (first time).....Mozart.
Adagio. Allegro. Andante. Finale Presto.
Capriccio Brillante, in E minor, Op. 22.....Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo—with Orchestral accompaniment.
Mr. James M. Wehli.
Overture—"Melusine".....Mendelssohn.
Grand Fantasia of Gounod's "Faust".....J. M. Wehli.
Mr. James M. Wehli.
Fantastic Symphony, "An Episode in the Life of an Artist" (first time).....Berlioz.
1. Largo. 2. Allegro non troppo. 3. Adagio.
4. Allegro non troppo.
Conductor.....Carl Bergmann.

Mozart's fresh, and throughout euphonious Symphony does not consist of four movements, as the programme here says, but only of three; the first, Adagio, is not an independent movement, but only an introduction. Berlioz's fantastic Symphony is a highly interesting work, abounding in fine melodic and harmonic passages, and most genially instrumented. We were sorry that the fifth part was not also performed. This difficult work, the programme of which, by the composer, (See note below), sufficiently explains its plan, was, on the whole, well performed. The pianist Wehli was, as you perceive, the soloist of the evening.

LANCELOT.

NOTE. Berlioz's Composition, "An Episode in the Life of an Artist," consists, in its complete form, of a Fantastic Symphony for Orchestra, and a Lyric Monodrama, entitled "Lelio," which latter is preceded by the former.

In case of the separate performance of the Fantastic Symphony by an Orchestra, which the author approves, a portion only of the five pieces, of which the Symphony consists, can be selected as circumstances may require. In the concert of this evening the first four numbers only will be performed, No. 5 (Dream of a Walpurgisnight) being omitted.

This latter No. is only of particular effect, and especially required when immediately followed by the Monodrama; this not being the case, the "March to Execution" (No. 4) furnishes a more appropriate conclusion to the Symphony.

A young musician, morbidly sensitive, and possessing an ardent imagination, seeks to poison himself with opium in a moment of despairing love. But the narcotic, instead of ending his life, plunges him in a heavy sleep attended by the most singular visions, during which his diseased brain transforms feelings, sentiments and recollections into musical images and ideas. The beloved one seems to have become a melody and a fixed idea, which he hears and finds again everywhere.

1st Part. Reveries, Passions. At first he recalls that sickness of the soul, that vague passion, that causeless joy and melancholy, which he felt before he saw her whom he loves; and then the volcanic love with which she inspires him, its delicious anguish, its jealous fury, its tenderness, its religious consolations.

2nd Part. A Ball. He again encounters the beloved one, at a ball, amid the tumult of a brilliant festival.

3rd Part. In the Country. On a summer evening, he hears two shepherds singing the Ranz des vaches; this pastoral duo, the time, the place, the light rustling of leaves softly agitated by the wind, the hope he has lately begun to entertain, everything combines to soothe his heart into a state of unusual tranquillity, and to give a more cheerful coloring to his fancies: but she appears again, his heart contracts, sorrowful presentiments agitate it—ah, if she should deceive him!—One of the shepherds again commences his simple song, but the other does not answer. The sun sinks—a distant roll of thunder—solitude—silence.

4th Part. The March to Execution. He dreams that he has killed the woman that he loves, that he is condemned to death, and conducted to the place of execution. The procession advances to the sound of a march that is now sombre and fierce, then brilliant yet solemn, and in which the dull and noise of heavy footsteps succeeds, without any transition, to the most noisy shouts. At the end the fixed idea re-appears for a moment, like a last thought of love—interrupted by the fatal stroke.

BRIDGETON, N. J., JAN. 20.—Music in America owes a great deal to the large body of respectable German artists who have settled among us as teachers and instrumental performers. Wherever they come they bring a certain amount of good music in their wake, for they are resolute and unyielding in presenting the works of good composers to their audiences and pupils. We were struck with this fact the other evening, after being present at an excellent concert given in this place by Professor AGTHE, a Berlin artist, formerly of Bethlehem, Pa., who settled in Bridgeton this autumn. The programme was as follows:

1. Premier Trio. Violin, Violoncello and Piano. Reissiger.
2. Lucia di Lammermoor. Piano Solo.....Prudent.
3. Introduzione et alla Polacca. Violoncello and Piano. Chopin.
4. "In die Ferne." Song with Violin and Piano ac. Kalliwoda.
5. Duo, for Piano, Sur les Huguenots.....Wolff.
6. Trio. Violin, Violoncello and Piano.....Reissiger.
7. "Thoughts of Home." Song.....Gumbert.
8. "Hirtentied." Shepherd's Song. Violin Solo.....David.
9. Cavatine, from Norma.....Bellini.
10. Sinfonia, No. 2, Duo for Piano.....Beethoven.

A resident of the town rather discouragingly asked Mr. Agthe a day or so before the concert, if he expected much of an audience; "for," said he, "the people do not comprehend such music." "Then they must be educated up to the comprehension," was Mr. Agthe's brave reply. But "the people" showed an understanding and appreciation for which they had not received credit. The hall was well filled, and, with the exception of some persons who were as deficient in taste and breeding as information, the audience listened to the music with respect, and many times displayed a surprising degree of intelligent pleasure.

The Reissiger Trios were played with fidelity and smoothness; a little coldly to be sure, which last arose from the want of intelligent sympathy on the part of the audience; but the executants were in earnest, and thus commanded the attention of the unformed. The Prudent piano solo, and the accompaniment to the Chopin Polacca, indeed all Professor PALING's work during the evening, was creditably performed. Messrs. Agthe and Paling belong to the Clementi school of pianists.

Mr. Agthe's Violoncello part of the Chopin Polacca was very interesting. The Violoncello is his instrument, although he is also an able executant on the Piano, and is likewise a conscientious and excellent teacher. He accompanied Mr. Paling in the two four-hand pieces,—the Wolff Huguenots duo, and the 2nd Symphony of Beethoven,—and his clear touch, good time, and smooth fingering must have been of service to his pupils, many of whom were present.

Mr. HERMAN ALLEN, of Philadelphia, was the violinist of the evening, and played the "Hirtentied" of David as well as a damp evening and a poor hall would allow him to do; but those of us who have heard this fine artist under more favorable circumstances, knew how to sympathize with his dissatisfaction, and appreciate his clever execution.

The hall in which the concert was held, is as poor an audience room as can possibly be found, for the echo of every rude whisper, ill-bred giggle, and misplaced witticism can be heard as plainly as the performances on the platform. Madame Dressler, the vocalist of the concert, must have felt this painfully. This lady sang "In die Ferne," of Kalliwoda most agreeably, and was encored in "Thoughts of Home." Her voice is clear and pure, and the management of it showed a good style and much culture. This was shown in the Allegro of "Casta Diva," which she ex-executed in a smooth and finished manner. But at times a silly titter of some ignorant persons present could be heard after a well executed cadenza, which must have caused no little annoyance to this agreeable singer. In a better constructed hall the indecorous conduct of such unfortunate persons would not wound the feelings of a respectable artist, or offend the ears of the better instructed portion of the audience.

The concert on the whole was a success, and we sincerely hope Professor Agthe may be induced to continue his good work. If he will have the courage to give two or three more such musical entertainments we are sure he will be well repaid for his labor; not financially, we fear, but as an artist he will feel the satisfaction of doing good service in the cause of that Art which he and all of us love so dearly.

Concerts.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT. The violent snow storm which raged with all its fury up to the hour of the concert on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 25th, did not deter the great majority of the subscribers, and many other music-lovers. Indeed the Music Hall was better filled than at the first concert,—a signal proof of the genuine enthusiasm which these feasts of nothing but pure music have awakened. There was the same tone of refinement, the same sympathetic feeling, the same still, attentive listening, and the same murmur of true satisfaction, in the company. It was an atmosphere of Art, and each one felt that it was good to be there. The programme was as follows:

- 1 Overture to "Coriolanus,".....Beethoven.
- 2 Pianoforte Concerto, in B flat (Op. 72).....Beethoven.
- 3 Double Chorus, for Male Voices, from "Antigone.".....Otto Dresel.
- 4 Double Chorus, for Male Voices, from "Antigone.".....Mendelssohn.

(From the Greek of Sophocles).

Strophe I.

Fair Semele's high-born son—
Thou many-named one,
Thou who callest thy father the thunderer Jove,
Object of beautiful Italia's love:
Thou who crownest what Ceres bestoweth on all,—
To thee now we call!
Hear us, Bacchus, in Thebe, thy Bacchant's home,
Where the bright Iameneus, rolling her waters,
Unites the Dragon's sons and daughters.

Antistrophe I.

On thy mount's double-crested heights,
Thy votive flame ascending,
With Corycian nymphs attending,
Grace thy mystic rites.
While pure Castalia laves the ground.
Thy lofty Nysian summit sings,
Ivy-crowned, thy praise.
Vine and tree
Warble to thee;
Thy votive trains chant thy lays,
Thy sacred chorus raises,
And Thebe's fanes resound thy praises.

Strophe II.

Above all the rest,
Thebe thou hast guarded and blest.
She was its pride, who clasping the Thunderer, died,
And now, seeking its last repose,
We pray thee to come and heal its woes.
O, hither bend!
From thy Parnassian heights descend,
Or from over Euboea's billows,
Hear us, Bacchus!

Antistrophe II.

Thou, whose power inspires
All our torch-lit, star-vieling choirs,
Guide our dance and lead our song,
Son of Jove, forever young!
Come with mirth and revelry.
Bring thy Naxian nymphs with thee;
Come, and let them, bounding before us,
Chime and time the tipsy chorus.
To praise thee, adore thee, great Iacchus!
Hear us, Bacchus!

- 4 Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven.
- 5 Choruses, for Male Voices.
a) "The Huntsman's Farewell," with four horns and trombone.....Mendelssohn.
- b) "Abendlied".....Weber.
- c) "Lützow's Wild Hunt".....Weber.
- 6 Overture, "The Fair Melusine".....Mendelssohn.

The orchestra was somewhat increased in the string department, there being ten first and ten second violins; and, as none of the above compositions, save the "Antigone" chorus, bring any trombones or extra horns in play, the strings had certainly their fair preponderance. The good effects of careful rehearsal are more and more apparent; there was not only life and spirit, but unusual fineness, smoothness, delicacy in the tone pictures. Indeed this was remarkable, to a degree which few had dared to expect, in a work so difficult to render as the "Melusine" overture, where bits of melody from one and another instrument, of different color, one answering another, or one completing the phrase which another has begun, are so subtly interwoven and must steal in so unobtrusively and yet so unmistakably and clearly. Rarely have we had the romantic beauty of that picture breathed so poetically upon the canvass; though we confess the figure is rather too strong and would leave no further perfection to be desired, which was not quite the case here. Readers of Mendelssohn's Letters will remember his own account of the origin of this overture; he had seen a play in a theatre founded on Tieck's Mährchen of the "Schöne Melusine," preceded by an overture which did not please him; so he went home and wrote one himself just to satisfy his own artistic sense of fitness; and how marvellously he succeeded!

The Overture to "Coriolanus" (the German Collin's not Shakespeare's), but music worthy to go with Shakespeare, might have had a little more fire and lightning-like vividness; was it not a very trifle short of fast enough? and were those impatient strong chords crisp and short enough? Those chords should strike sparks out. The overture, short as it is, is one of the greatest masterworks in this form, so concentrated and full of passion, like the Egmont overture, and even more remarkable; and how touchingly lovely the melodic theme relieving and humanizing the wild stormy picture! In general, however, it was about the best rendering we have yet had here of it.

The fourth Symphony, warmest and loveliest of Beethoven's, was never played in Boston so clearly, delicately and smoothly, as we fancy. In the Adagio, the instruments, even the tympani which have to take the sobbing figure in their turn, were for once in tune. There may be different notions about tempo, but never in this city have we so heartily enjoyed this Symphony. The violins, violas, &c., ran along like crackling electric sparks in the extremely rapid movement of the Finale, which is the very ecstasy of joy.

Need we tell how admirably Mr. DRESSEL played the E-flat Concerto, the most inspired of all the compositions of the kind? He has played it in that hall before now, twice; the first time was in honor of President Lincoln's Emancipation proclamation, when the heroic temper of the music, as well as its tender and profound humanity, its pure ideal aspiration, were felt by all. This time the piece had the advantage of much better accompaniment, although still it might require a coarser player not to be sometimes covered up by so powerful an orchestra. In all that pertains to precision, absolute unity of tempo, vital emphasis and accent, light and shade (what a beautiful example of the decrescendo!), and, in a word, thoroughly poetic conception and rendering, the piano-forte part left nothing to be desired; whether there might have been more of strength, without more than a corresponding loss in these finer qualities, is the only question.

The novel feature of the concert was the chorus singing by male voices. The success was fair under the circumstances. It was an improvised choir of some sixty gentlemen, mostly amateurs who had never sung on any public stage before, composed of members of the Harvard Musical Association (which gives the concerts), of Mr. Parker's Club, and a few Cambridge students, reinforced by members of the Handel & Haydn Society. It had proved almost impossible to find hours for rehearsal which all could attend at once. In the smaller pieces, part-songs, too, there was accidentally a short supply of copies, and one of these pieces, the "Abendlied," had only been tried over once, having been interposed as an after-thought between the other two pieces to break the uniformity of key. By a queer fatality this piece got started in the wrong key! The other two, however, sounded quite well, though practice (above all, committing to memory) would have made it more perfect. The glorious "Antigone" chorus was exceedingly effective and altogether enjoyed. So rich and musical a mass of tone has seldom been heard among us, and so refined withal; it was a new sensation; one or two high tenors were a little too prominent in their irrepressible ardor, but this is easily toned down, and was an error on the right side. The quartet of soli was excellent. One could not but wish that such vocal material as we had here might be consolidated into a permanent choir. (That "Bacchus" chorus, with others from the "Antigone" music, will be sung again at a future concert.) The organization and training of the chorus is in the sure hands of Mr. B. J. LANG, a member of the Association, who conducted orchestra and chorus with ability, and who, like Mr. Dresel, is giving his powers freely and without stint to the carrying out of the artistic idea of these concerts.

The THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT will take place next Thursday afternoon, with a programme quite as unique and as rich as the two that have preceded. A Haydn Symphony, the charming one in B flat, opens the feast, and the shortest and the happiest one of Beethoven, No. 8, in F, closes it,—offering an interesting contrast. Another Beethoven Concerto, that in C minor, will be played, by Mr. LANG, who will also play a brilliant Polonaise by Weber, as arranged, with orchestra, by Liszt. An overture by Cherubini, to "Anacreon," new to our public, opens the second part.

CARL ROSA.—The complimentary concert given to this young artist by the Harvard Musical Association on Monday evening, Jan. 22, was an occasion of rare interest in its modest way. A more enjoyable Chamber Concert was never given in the Chickering room. It was completely filled, and by the very people who make one feel at home with good music. Everybody was delighted with the playing and the singing, with the selections, with the company and the occasion. It was a success, resulting, we are glad to say, in a substantial benefit to the young violinist who had done us such signal service in the first Symphony Concert. The programme was this:

1. Sonata, F major for Piano and Violin.....Beethoven.
2. Songs.....Robert Franz.
"Die Lotosblume." (Op. 35.)—"Hör ich ein Vögelchen." (Op. 35.)—"Nachtgesang." (Op. 35.)
3. Abendlied, arranged for Violin by Joachim Schumann.
4. Phantasiestück, for Violin and Piano.....Weber.
5. Chaconne, for Violin.....J. S. Bach.
(With Mendelssohn's Piano Accompaniment.)

6. Songs:.....Robert Franz.
 "Dem Schnee, dem Regen." (Op. 33.)—Schlummerlied." (Op. 1.)—"Willkommen mein Wald." (Op. 21.)
 7. Grand Sonata, A major, for Piano and Violin. Beethoven.

It had been intended to close with a Trio, opening with the "Kreutzer" Sonata; but in the difficulty of procuring a violoncellist, another Sonata Duo was placed first, and the "Kreutzer" transferred to the end. The pianist was OTTO DRESEL, whose fingers rested not during the entire programme, nor his brain either. Physically ill and weak at the time, he volunteered with his whole heart and will and skill to make the concert a true expression of the musical and moral sympathy which the subscribers felt toward Carl Rosa. We do not believe that either of these Sonatas was ever heard in such perfection in this town before; certainly not the glorious old "Kreutzer;" for it was the coöperation of two first-class artists who inspired one another all along. Rosa's wonderful tone, his firm, manly bearing, his poetic shading, were very palpable in that small room. He played "vom ganzem Herzen aus." In the lovely Adorned by Schumann, the cantabile of his strings was human, but without alloy, no taint of sentimentality. The Phantasistück is a daring, passionate conceit, brought out with vigor by both players. But the great revelation of the violin was the Chaconne by Bach, which filled the place and filled the listener to the exclusion of all other thoughts. So grand a composition, growing on with such resistless logical unfolding, broader and deeper with each variation, when so played, possesses every fibre of one's sentiment being while it lasts, and does not quit its hold for long afterwards. Strangely too, while it is so soundly Bach-ian, it is full of virtuosity, revelling in modern freedom of effect, one of the most brilliant of concert pieces. In both senses, Rosa's rendering was the nearest approach we have yet heard to Joachim.

An invaluable contribution to the charm of the Concert was Mr. KREISSMANN's singing of the Franz songs. He, too, was there with his whole heart to give musical God-speed to the young brother artist, to whom, on the other hand, these songs were for the most part a fresh and beautiful experience. Mr. Kreissmann has been singing these and others during the season past in various quiet concerts purely to help on the cause of Art; he has sung even when he was ill, generously risking his voice, so sensitive an organ, rather than disappoint an audience; and if at any time, for literal truth's sake, ashamed of representing everything in rose color, we have alluded to his being not in his best voice, it was but the recognition of an accident and no disparagement of his always artistic and poetic interpretation of the finest song creations of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Mozart and Beethoven. This time the singer seemed to do his utmost; he was plainly determined to sing well, and did sing admirably, in the last piece particularly bringing out splendid tones. The finely contrasted pieces quite inspired the audience.

Carl Rosa, with Mme. Parepa, and company, is already on the ocean-way to England, where he will again be near Joachim, and will doubtless play in the Monday Popular Concerts. Then he will betake himself to his native Germany, and devote some months to earnest practice, for which a concert tour in this country affords poor opportunity. He is under engagement with Mr. Bateman to come back with the rest next Fall, when he will surely be most welcome.

ITALIAN OPERA. We do not see why L'Africaine needed to come across the ocean. Could it not find decent burial in Paris? Was it not burying itself as fast as possible under its own great Ship? Surely no one can have intelligently studied the excitement about this opera abroad, have read the criticisms, the eulogiums, have remarked to what sort of audience it appealed, without reading everywhere between the lines the confession that it was all factitious, a work of advertising and Eclat, that god whom Meyerbeer unfortunately served until his Art became demoralized, and his creative genius (which he undoubtedly did once have, when he wrote Robert for instance) lost its freshness and its well-springs dried up by too much courting of the hot sun of immediate notoriety and favor. If any one has not read enough of foreign talk about the Africaine, let him peruse the account of its symptomatic production in Berlin, which we have copied on another page expressly for his benefit. And let him ask himself what is the fair presumption as to the intrinsic musical and lyric value of a work, when the composer has to come down to ship-building and such excess of melodramatic pageant on the stage, that all the eulogistic critics must expend columns upon that where they give ten lines to the music? A great composer must be far gone when he condescends to such means. It must be that he distrusted his own music; the conscious inspiration was not in it. For twenty years, intermittently, he had been altering and patching, studying out effects with painful calculation, keeping back the doubtful thing while the more sure thing, each child with which he was well pleased, went straight before the world, and here is the posthumous result in the shape of an opera, which is two-thirds melo-dramatic spectacle, while the musical third is frittered into little bits of effect, without natural flow and continuity of thought, constantly starting some new motive only to disappoint you and relapse right back into orchestral noise and glitter; now you have murky passages of reed and brass tones down in the lowest depths of the orchestra, as far from beautiful as they are strange and apparently unmeaning; now, and that frequently, the ending of a musical sentence with an explosion, short and sharp, of brass fortissimo, why—no man can tell, unless it be to wake a drowsy audience; then again we have sweet aerial strains of violin tremolo in alt and flutes quavering in parts, euphonious and pleasant for the moment, till you find how Wagnerish, and Gounod-ish and altogether modern fashionable, with some ingenious variation, it is. Indeed, through three acts at least, it seems to us to be only ingenuity and to lack the sincerity of Art. Of course one may listen to the orchestra and pick out many a charming bit, enjoy such and such combinations as original and rare, or be lifted for a moment by something grandiose; but far oftener he is crushed down and left dull and unedified.

We have not room for detail. We admit that the last two acts had to us much more of the natural flow and charm of music, especially the last, and its famous "unison" prelude is certainly impressive. We cannot help suspecting that, after all, the real opera lies in these two last acts; that Meyerbeer at first pleased himself with the idea of a musical picture of that voluptuous, intoxicating, Hindoo, South sea island life, and that all the former part, the Portuguese inquisitors, Vasco di Gama, &c., was tacked on as an after-thought to make out a plot and fill a colossal canvas. For in the last acts there is something like spontaneity, as if the musician enjoyed his own work; but in the others none, except occasionally.

The "Africaine" was performed here three nights. We think the enormous crowd on the first night, in spite of all the applause, were bored; there was no musical enthusiasm; all looked patiently dull and heavy. We could not help wishing that an experiment might be tried; that in the middle of it there might be given a single scene by Mozart, or by Weber, or even anything as hacknied as Lucrezia or Norma, any flowing, natural music: should we not have seen all those faces lit up with a wonderful refreshment, think you?

The second time the crowd was less immoderately large, and the work was probably more enjoyed, because then it was natural to give more attention to its details, and because it was sung and acted with a great deal of spirit. Indeed Mme. ZUCCH, whose voice has never seemed to us as refined as it is strong and enduring, won great respect by her dramatic, truthful, self-forgetting impersonation and singing of the part of Selika, while Sig. Mazzoleni's robust tenor carried through the exacting strains of Vasco triumphantly, though his voice is of coarse quality and his action of the common-place heroic order. Signorina BOSISIO has a fresh, delicate beauty of voice, in harmony with her person, and sang sweetly and well for the most part, though not always equal to the music. BELLINI, glorious baritone, made a perfect Nelusko.

The third time (the subscription season being over and the galvanized fever spent) there was a small house; then we confess that we enjoyed it most, because we expected less and could find a curious pleasure in studying out details, especially in the excellent wood department of the orchestra, near which we were fortunately placed.

The little buffo piece by the brothers Ricci, Crispino e la Comare, was shrewdly made to follow the Africaine. It was a perfect relief to laugh so. This buffo vein, even in its common-places, is the most genuine and genial part of modern Italian music. In this case there was no slightest approach, to be sure, to the music of the "Barber"; but it was light, graceful, naturally flowing music; music which never disturbs you and sometimes catches a delighted recognition, while it buoys up and bears along the nice fun on the stage right pleasantly. BELLINI's Cobbler was as exquisitely funny as his African was stern and grand the night before. Miss KELLOGG was charming as the cobbler's young wife, and Sig. DUBREUIL, as the doctor, had the true comic unction and the good style of singing, which makes his small voice go far. The trio of doctors kept the whole house roaring.

GERMAN OPERA.—Mr. Grover has improved the week with some very acceptable performances of his German troupe, now reinforced by the return of Herr HIMMER. So far Robert le Diable has been the great night, Mme. ROTTER's Alice being an inspired and splendid effort, while HIMMER, HABELMANN and HERMANN all did their best to make the whole thing good, and with rare success. A new soprano, Mlle. NADDI, a French lady, made her debut in the part of Isabella, and sang the difficult music in a manner highly creditable.—But our room is exhausted. Frey-schütz and Fidelio were to follow, and this afternoon a Faust matinée for a finale.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—Last Wednesday's Concert was a very fine one. The orchestra, which now numbers six good first violins, and a first bassoon, which it sadly lacked last year, played Beethoven's 4th Symphony and the Oberon overture so that they were greatly relished. The Bridal Procession piece from Lohengrin, a good Strauss waltz, &c., found willing ears.

The preceding (third) Concert gave Mendelssohn's Overture to the "Return from Abroad," Gade's Symphony in B flat, Beethoven's Turkish March, &c.

Mr. DAUM will play at the Quintette Club Concert on Tuesday evening next, instead of the first, as originally intended. He has entirely recovered from the effect of his late illness, and will give during the next two months two Musical Soirées, at one of which he will produce Hummel's grand Septet.

DRAMATIC READINGS.—Miss Fanny R. Edmunds, of Boston, has just given a series of public readings in Newport, R.I., much to the pleasure of her hearers. She came to Newport an entire stranger, and had to encounter the indifference with which such readings are apt to be received. Yet after her regular course had ended, she was detained by request of her hearers to read Hamlet; and again at the desire of the school committee, to give a special reading for the public school-teachers. She has a most agreeable voice, and a manner dignified and free from stage-tricks, and a thorough dramatic nature, which throws itself without effort into a great variety of parts, both tragic and comic. Public readings are, as a general rule, so uninteresting that it is a pleasure to bear testimony to the uncommon merits of one like Miss Edmunds. Her address is to the care of Charles Edmunds, Esq., 32 Congress street, Boston.

T. W. H.

MY DEAR DWIGHT. You will recognize the initials appended to the short paragraph I send you, clipped from the "Commonwealth," and do not require me to tell you that so competent a critic is not likely to praise lightly or carelessly.

I am among the very few in Boston who have heard Miss Edmunds. Her dramatic power, her control over a very sweet and womanly voice, her insight into the deepest meaning of what she reads, should and will give her the very highest rank among public readers.

We have had so many bad and indifferent readers bidding, of late years, for popular favor, that our public has a right to some guarantees before subscribing to any new aspirant for favor or fame, and I do not fear the responsibility of most heartily recommending Miss Edmunds to the attention of the men and women of culture and taste in Boston, should she presently give us a chance to hear her. A.

SEEING THE ELEPHANT.—The following (which is literally true, our friend assures us) is one of the many amusing incidents of the late skilfully manufactured operatic fever.

"MR DEAR DWIGHT,—I had last evening quite an amusing experience of the acquisition of musical pleasure under difficulties. My son, a lad of sixteen, having purchased a supernumerary's right to appear in the grand spectacle of "L'Africaine," reached the Theatre's rear door in due season for qualification. He was at once carried into a subterranean apartment under the stage, where he and his companions were requested to black their faces, necks and hands, so as to appear later as Africans. Finally they issued, duly colored and equipped, and, as you may imagine, in a comical humor. "Don't hit against me, Charlie," said my son's next companion, "for our shields will rattle like two coal skuttles." A few moments on the stage finished their work, when they claimed to go into the house; but neither their services nor their payment at the rear door entitling them to any such privilege, they were told that they could stay where they were, retire to the underground dressing room, or go home. They remained, but were much abused, in language more forcible than elegant, for being in everybody's way. My boy reached home very dirty, very tired, and fully convinced that he had to his heart's content seen the operatic elephant, and that his first experience as supernumerary for Grover's Grand ("unequaled in the world") Opera, would suffice.

"This account, as related with an expression of disappointment, caused such a titillation with me, who had awaited my son's coming long past midnight, that I decided that I had perhaps enjoyed L'Africaine quite as much as some who were at the theatre. If any of your readers possess and enjoy a keen sense of the ridiculous, then this may serve to bring a smile as they read of this youth's first entrée."

ERNST PERABO.—This gifted young musician and pianist, of whose studies in Leipzig and the high recognition he has won there we have from time to time made mention, returned to this country a few weeks since, and the lovers of classical piano-playing in Boston will soon have an opportunity to hear him. Meanwhile he has been visiting his parents in Ohio, and has given several concerts in Cleveland and other Western cities, exciting a rare interest. A German paper in Cleveland, speaking of one of his concerts at Brainard's hall, says: "In the playing of Ernst Perabo it is all music; there is no mere striving for effect, as his very selection of concert pieces shows. In cleanness, elegance, and wonderfully fine piano, it vividly reminded us of the playing of Mendelssohn. And then his modesty wins the hearts of his audience at the outset. We feel that we have to do here with a disciple of Art, one who forgets himself in the Art-works which he has to reproduce."

A correspondent of the Western Musical World writes thus of Perabo:

Having learned to know him intimately in Leipzig, during his course at the Conservatory, we admired him as a matter of course for his rare talent and exquisite playing, while our wonder was continually excited by his astonishing memory and remarkably infallible ear. But much as we admired these gifts, when we witnessed their exercise, they were, in our estimation, as in that of all who knew him intimately, ly, the smallest part of his excellence as an artist. His entire devotion to the true and the beautiful in art, his reverence for the great masterworks, entirely exclude from his performance that self-consciousness which too often, with other artists, forces the hearer, who would gladly lose himself in the work, to a division of his attention between the work and the performer, and lend an indescribable charm to his playing, and, indeed, to the whole man. We shall never forget the youthful, modest face which greeted us when we first arrived, "a stranger in a strange land," at the Conservatory.

Little should we have conjectured, at first sight, if his fame had not already reached us, that his rare powers as an artist placed him on an elevation where not even the most ambitious in that large school of art thought of pretending to equal him.

May he find in this land of his adoption, where flourish and technical display have won too much applause, friends who know how to value true art and a genuine artist. J. F. M.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—The first musical soirée of Mr. JAMES M. TRACY took place on the 22nd ult. Mr. Tracy played Beethoven's piano-forte Sonata, op. 26, (that with the variations and funeral march); a Paraphrase on the Trovatore, by Liszt; Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, op. 14; Henselt's "If I were a bird"; Chopin's Polonaise in E flat (op. 22), and a Fantasia by Herz. Schubert's "Serenade", Rossini's "Una voce", and Cherubini's Ave Maria were sung by Mrs. Shelley. The tone of concert programmes in the interior seems to be improving.

WORCESTER, MASS.—An original Mass by a young native composer was the main attraction of a concert lately, which appears to have excited great interest. "Stella", of the Palladium, shall be our reporter, and we hope her glowing impressions will be confirmed:

Mechanics Hall has seldom been the scene of a more interesting musical event than on the evening of the 23d inst., the occasion of the second public performance of Mr. Stearns's Mass in A. The composer had spared no pains nor expense to give the work the best possible performance, and a large and appreciative audience, many from adjoining and even distant towns, rewarded his efforts. Previous to the Mass, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, performed several selections, two of them of especial excellence, viz: the first movement from Mozart's Quintet in E flat, No. 5, played with delicacy and almost perfect skill; and an Andante and Rondo from a Clarinet Quintet by Weber, in which Mr. Ryan fairly surpassed himself. It was a rare performance, and, it is hoped, recalled regretfully the fact that the Club has not lately been induced to make frequent visits to Worcester as in days gone by.

The chorus singers selected for the Mass had been well chosen. Every voice told, and the parts were well balanced. Moreover, the rehearsals had been frequent and faithful. Very pleasant it was to notice that each singer made the work his own for the time; and all sang as if heart and soul were with the young composer and his music—no small compliment to the innate merit of the work which could voluntarily command such interest. The Quintette Club gave the accompaniments, with the assistance of Kleiser's trumpet. Mr. Allen's Organ playing lent depth and power to the whole, at times imparting such breadth and richness of tone as to seemingly treble the orchestral force. The performance of the choruses was highly satisfactory, but the same could not be said, in justice, of the solos, which, although sung conscientiously and with taste and feeling, failed to produce the desired effect. Several exceptions there were to be sure, but very few of the voices were able to bear the contrast with a chorus so strong and full, and accompaniments so brilliant and telling.

The Mass bears repetition; indeed it is rich in material for study. Very fine is the working up of some of its choruses; as for instance the "Amen," with its fugue treatment, and the magnificent "Sanctus," which was rendered on Tuesday evening with thrilling effect. The "Et Incarnatus" is finely conceived, as all must have felt who heard the quartet sing the other evening by sympathetic, well-trained voices. Fragments of the "Gloria," the "Agnus Dei," and "Dona Nobis" were hummed and whistled in the streets, and drummed out of pianos for months after the first performance of the Mass, and yet these melodies are as artistic as they are original, and as far as possible removed from the clap-trap which seizes the popular ear for a time, to be soon condemned as worthless.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Out of my soul's great sadness. (Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen). R. Franz. 30

A charming gem-let from Heine, translated by Mr. Dwight. The music is perfect. Key of F and D minor.

His coming. (Er ist gekommen). R. Franz. 30

The words are by Rückert, and are full of feeling, as is the music, marks of expression quite filling up the spaces of the page. Key of F minor, ending in A flat major. Both this and the one above are good for Mezzo Soprano as well as Soprano voices, as they do not rise above the staff.

Shylie Bawn. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 30

One of the best Irish songs.

Pious orgies. Song. "Judas Maccabaeus." 30

Come, ever smiling Liberty. Duet. " 30

Two sterling good pieces from the great oratorio, the second, (duet for 1st and 2nd sopranos) being easy as well as brilliant.

Whip-poor-will. Song. Wm. J. Wetmore, M. D. 30

A pretty air, bringing in notes supposed to be those of the Whip-poor-will.

I forget the gay world. Song. Arr. for Guitar. T. B. Bishop. 30

A well-known, charming melody, now put within the reach of those who "strike the guitar, lightly."

I no longer am Annetta. (Io non sono piu' l'Annetta). "Crispino e la Comare." 60

Happy day, whose dawning. (Non ha gioia in tal momento.) "Crispino e la Comare." 40

"Crispino" has taken its place among the decidedly favorite comic operas; and the first song is one of its most taking melodies. It is that in which the cobbler's wife begins to realize that she is to be a rich woman, and forms, in imagination, a bright picture of the dashing career in store, with her coach and four in the country, her gondola in Venice, &c. The second song has more feeling than comedy in it. It is that in which Crispino, who has seemed to be dying, revives, and is welcomed to consciousness by his wife and friends.

Instrumental.

Debatten Waltzes. Gung'l. 60

The German dance-music composers seem long ago to have got out of names, and to have invented a new set with the most outre titles that were to be procured. The "Debate waltzes" have the crisp, hard, metallic ring which belongs to the best ball room melodies, and bid fair to be very popular.

Leaves and blossoms. (Blätter und Blüthen). Ten characteristic pieces for Piano. F. Spindler. No. 3. Song of Love. (Liebeslied). 30

This neat and expressive little thing, which is also easy, belongs to a set composed, and dedicated to his four sons by Spindler. They will be found to be graceful and satisfying pieces.

La Maison d'Or. Petites fantasies faciles. No. 1. La Traviata. H. Alberti. 25

Like the above, a pretty set for learners, but in a style a little more brilliant. Quite easy.

Village swallows. (Dorfschwalben aus Oesterreich). J. Strauss. 60

Brilliant waltzes, dedicated to the author of an Austrian novel, with the above title.

The last rose of summer. Impromptu brilliante. J. Bellak. 35

One of Bellak's characteristic easy and pretty arrangements. Capital for learners. Easy.

Lily of the Valley. Mazurka. S. Smith. 75

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The Old Cathedral Organist.

'Tis forty years ago since first
I climbed these dusty, winding stairs,
To play the Dean in; how I spurned
Beneath my feet all meaner cares,
When first I leant, my cheek on fire,
And looked down blushing at the choir!

Handel and Haydn, and Mozart—
I thought they watched me as I played;
While Palestrina's stern, sad face
Seemed in the twilight to upbraid;
Pale fingers moved upon the keys—
The ghost hand of past centuries.

Behind my oaken battlement
Above the door I used to lean,
And watch, in puffing crimson hood,
Come stately sailing in the Dean:
On this, the organ, breathing low,
Began to murmur soft and slow.

I used to shut my eyes and hear
The solemn prophecy and psalm Rise up like incense; and I loved
Before the prayer the lull and calm,
Till like a stream that bursts its banks,
Broke forth brave Purcell's "Oh give thanks."

I knew those thirteen hundred pipes
And thirty stops, as blind men do
The voices of the friends they love,
The bird's song, and the thunder, too;
And the fierce diapason's roar,
Like storms upon a rocky shore.

And now to-day I yield me up
The dusky seat, my old loved throne,
Unto another; and no more
Shall come here in the dusk alone,
Or in the early matin hour,
To hear my old friend's voice of power.

And yet methinks, that centuries hence,
Lying beneath the chancel floor,
In that dark nook I shall delight
To hear the anthem's swell once more,
And to myself shall quietly smile
When music floods the vaulted aisle.

Or, mocking gravely at some hand
Less skilful than my own was once,
In my snug nest I'll lie, and mark
The blunders of the foolish dance;
But to myself the secret keep,
And turn me round again to sleep.

The "Moonlight" Sonata.

This immortal composition was published by Beethoven under the title of "Sonata quasi una Fantasia," and dedicated to "Damigella Contessa Giulietta Guicciardi." Among musicians it is known as the C-sharp minor Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1. Amateurs love to call it "Moonlight Sonata," which name it received—as Prof. Marx says in his Life of Beethoven—from the happy Austrians, guided early by the story of the composer's tender partiality for the above Juliet Guicciardi. The fame of the work rests, as is well-known, on the first movement. Beethoven has written Scherzos and Finales equally spirited and characteristic with those contained in this Sonata; but that Adagio stands unmatched in its grand simplicity. The means employed are most simple, the effect wonderful. As the story goes—which Marx and similar authorities have endorsed—the Sonata presents an episode from the composer's own history. It was written as a last adieu to the object of his attachment, when he saw himself disappointed and found it necessary to uproot this tenderly cherished, but ill-requited love.

Otto Jahn is supposed to have exploded the story, to the infinite regret of all tender, romantic souls. He says: "The graceful Rondo in G major (op. 51, No. 2) was originally dedicated to the Countess Giulietta Guicciardi, who, at Beethoven's desire, waived her right to the dedication in favor of the Countess Henriette Lichnowsky; as compensation, he dedicated to her the C-sharp minor Sonata (op. 27, No. 1). We are all aware what importance both the Sonata and dedication obtained after it was known that B. was bound to Giulietta Guicciardi by the most tender partiality; knowing this, let any one compare the Rondo with the Sonata."*

Still, whether Jahn is right or not, he shall not disturb us. Such stories are welcome, not because they are true, but because they are significant. What do we care, whether the emotions embodied in this inimitable work were real or imagined? The story, then, is the best commentary on it. The appellation "Moonlight Sonata," likewise, is quite characteristic, at least with reference to the first movement. One is, indeed, reminded of the quiet weaving and working of the good moon, as she glides pensively through the blue heavens, the friend and confidant of all over-flowing hearts, who stand in need of sympathy and consolation. But we will not attempt to describe the Adagio, that night-piece, that song of sighs and tears. Play it over and over again, my dear readers; you who are fortunate enough to understand the master's language, who have ears to hear. To the rest it will forever remain a puzzle. They will go to hear it, attracted by the fame of the piece, shake their heads over it, and marvel how some people can make so much ado about nothing. Play it over alone, or with, perhaps, a few sympathizing and appreciating friends as listeners, late in the evening, at a time when all is solitude and repose around you. In this way the movement is most likely to appear with all its characteristic expression. Remember the master's injunction: "Si deve suonare tutto questo pezzo delicatissimamente e senza sordino," and in addition, "sempre pianissimo." (The entire piece should be played very delicately, continually very soft and without dampers, that is, with Pedal). After a short prelude, in which the bass wearily and heavily descends a few steps down the scale, accompanied by a figure of triplets, the canto enters at the close of the 5th measure. Interesting and novel is what Prof. Marx says here: "We rarely hear it executed but with the hand falling equally strong on the keys, so that such of the notes of the accompaniment as are struck together with the melody make the latter appear as though it were played in octaves. Nothing corresponds less with the expression of this tender, solitary song. The melody must be represented with a delicate finish, but so as to stand out prominently by itself, and note after note be treated according to its peculiar character. The triplets of the accompaniment should be completely separated from the melody, and flow along subordinate to it; they should in connection with the bass form the sensible, unobtrusive accompaniment to the melody, as if song and accompaniment were performed by two different players. In this way alone the canto will come out in perfect purity, and justice be done to the bass, which afterwards becomes so significant; and we also can follow the ingenious development of the triplets in the middle and at the close of the movement."

The question arises:—Can this have been Beethoven's intention? And again: Are not the pale grey tints—if we may say 'so—of this Adagio, and its mysterious, languid and melancholy character, in a great measure owing to the canto moving in octaves, as it appears when the melodic note and the first note of the accompanying triplets are touched together equally loud? We, therefore, do not subscribe to Marx's manner. Still, let the intelligent reader try it, and observe the effect; which will be best attained by playing both the triplets and bass, for once, with the left hand, so that the right may have full command over the melody. Thus triplets and melody may throughout be kept completely apart, and made to sound as if executed by two different performers. There are three remarkable passages in this movement, suggestive of intense agony and mental pain, if treated rightly. The first happens in the 16th and 18th measures from the beginning, as also in the 16th and 18th measures from the end. In all cases, after the first piercing cry, the bass quickly comes up and retires, as if to allay the grief. The second appears with the 37th measure, a motive of three grave tones, repeated three times, every time more feebly. How suggestive are these simple notes of the last dying wail of a broken heart!

The third passage, equally expressive is to be found at the end of the 7th and 5th measures before the close. The delivery of these three passages, more than any others, will prove the true interpreter of Beethoven.

(Conclusion next time).

The Last Days of Mozart.

AN OLD STORY NEWLY TOLD.*

Adieu! "The hour strikes! Farewell! We shall meet again!"

* From Nohl's collection of "Mozart's Letters," as translated by Lady Wallace. Reprinted by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, New York.

These words, taken from the grand trio of the "Flauto Magico," are the last written words of Mozart which have been preserved, or are known to exist. His wife soon returned to Vienna, but she was not destined long to enjoy the society of her husband. While working with eager zeal and haste at the completion of "Titus" when in Prague, Mozart, who so delighted in being with his friends, and was always so cheerful in that city, lived chiefly in seclusion. He looked pale, took medicine, and on taking leave of his friends told them, with tears in his eyes, that they should never meet again. On returning to Vienna, he worked incessantly at the completion of the "Flauto Magico"; and the various airs composed at that time indicate how grave was his strain of thought, and how exclusively devoted to high and lofty subjects. Not only did he imagine that his reputation had been damaged in Prague, where, being accustomed to the "Entführung," "Figaro," and "Don Giovanni," they did not receive "Titus" with such inordinate enthusiasm as his previous works, but there was a peculiar circumstance which tended to solemnize his mood, and still further to elevate his soul beyond the things of daily life, than had been the case with him for years. Thoughts of death incessantly haunted him. It is quite easy to comprehend how the delicate organization of an artist who works with such a strain on his thoughts as Mozart had done from his youth upwards, and more especially since his stay in Vienna, should gradually begin to lose its elasticity, and at last press heavily on the whole nervous system of such a man. Nissen relates, no doubt on Constanze's authority, that Mozart, years before his decease, was harassed by thoughts of death.

Recently, too, a strange incident had occurred. The Requiem was ordered under such ambiguous circumstances that Mozart considered it to be a mysterious warning of his own death. A tall messenger, dressed in sombre gray, asked him, without naming the person who sent the commission, whether he would undertake to write a mass for the dead, and when it would be finished. Mozart accepted the order, and was eagerly engaged in the work, but owing to the composition of "Titus," he was obliged to set off in haste to Prague, when the singular gray messenger suddenly appeared in the same mysterious way beside the carriage, at the moment when Mozart and his wife were setting off, and pulling Constanze's dress, he inquired about the fulfilment of Mozart's promises. We indeed now know that this man dressed in gray was Leutgeb, the servant of Count Walsegg, who had spread such mystery over the affair, hoping himself to pass for the author of the work he wished to be composed in honor of the obsequies of his recently deceased wife. Mozart, however, who knew nothing of this, gave himself up entirely to the power of his imagination, and became more and more fascinated, not only by the sublime nature of his composition, but by the ideas engendered by the mystical requisition.

We learned from his own words how much he was absorbed in this his last composition. He constantly persevered in writing long after his dinner-hour, and even beyond the time for the opera. His friends assert that in those autumn weeks, whenever they saw him, he was most deeply engaged, sitting working hard at his writing-table, and he even declined giving lessons to a lady, the acquaintance of his particular friend Jacquin. He wrote the greater part of the work in the garden of his pupil Frau von Trattner, in the Laimgrube. As soon, however, as a number of his opera was finished, he sang it through at home with his friends, playing the instrumental part on the piano. The moment Constanze returned from Baden, she saw with alarm that her husband's health was beginning to decline, and, in the hope of diverting his mind, she one day drove with him to the Prater. But Mozart, who for some months past had been passing his time chiefly in quiet and thought, soon became very melancholy. He began to speak of death, and when his wife strove to dissuade him from such gloomy thoughts, he said, with tears in his eyes, "No, no! my presentiments are too strong; I feel

I cannot last long: no doubt some one has given me poison. I cannot get rid of this thought." Constanze, alarmed to the utmost, immediately called in their intimate friend and physician, Dr. Closset, who at once prescribed a complete cessation of the strain of work as absolutely necessary. Mozart had been hitherto day and night brooding over the completion of the Requiem, and not unfrequently fallen back in his chair in a swoon. He no longer sought to deny his conviction that he was writing the Requiem for himself, and could not be persuaded to give up this idea, constantly recurring to the singular appearance of the person who gave him the order; and when those around him endeavored to make him banish such thoughts, he remained silent—but unconvinced.

The short rest from his labors which Constanze effected, invigorated so much the failing health of the invalid maestro, that soon afterwards he again asked for his score, and in addition wrote at this very time a Masonic cantata, "Das Lob der Freundschaft," which he conducted himself on the 15th of November, at a festival of the Masonic Lodge to which he belonged. Soon, however, the renewed strain of work brought on a return of his illness. Towards the end of this month he came one evening into the "Silberne Schlange" in the Kärnthner Strasse, which he was in the habit of frequenting; he looked very pale, and shivered violently; so after staying only a few minutes he offered his wine to the landlord, Joseph Deiner, with whom he often conversed, saying, "Drink this, and call on me to-morrow: winter is come, and we require fire-wood." But when Deiner went there next day he found Mozart in bed, and the maid told him that her master had become so much worse during the night, that they had been obliged to send for the doctor. When Mozart heard Deiner's voice, he sent for him, and said in a feeble voice, "Joseph, we can do nothing to-day but submit to doctors and apothecaries."

From that day he never left his bed. His hands and feet soon began to swell, and violent sickness came on. His faithful nurse, besides Constanze, was her young sister Sophie, who afterwards became Frau Haibel. To her we owe an account of these last weeks, of which she gives us the most graphic description. She wrote it in the year 1825, at the request of her brother-in-law Nissen; and with it we shall bring this work to a close.

"When Mozart was taken ill, not knowing how serious the attack was, we made him a wadded dressing-gown, that when he rose he might be well defended from cold. We visited him constantly; he seemed to take great pleasure in the dressing-gown. I went every day to town to see him [he lived at that time in the Rauhenstein Gasse], and one Saturday when I was there Mozart said to me, 'Now, dear Sophie, tell your mamma that I am going on very well, and that I shall be able to pay her a visit during the octave of her name day [St. Cecilia, November 22] to congratulate her.' Who could be happier than I was at bringing such joyful news to my mother,—news which indeed she could scarcely have expected? I therefore hurried to tranquillize her, as he really did seem to me better and more cheerful.*

* The performances of the "Flauto Magico" continued interruptedly, and were as successful as ever. Mozart felt the deepest interest in the triumph of the work, with which he had in a manner closed his life, before linking himself with heaven. In the evenings, at the time of the performance, he was in the habit of placing his watch beside him, and following the various scenes in spirit. "Now the first act is over; now is the time for the great 'Queen of Night!'" And the very day before his death he said to Constanze, "Oh! that I could only once hear my 'Flauto Magico!'" humming. In a scarcely audible voice, the "Bird-catcher," Capellmeister Roer, who was sitting at his bed, went to the piano and sang the air, which cheered Mozart. But his spirit was still more enraptured by the Requiem, that testament of his life, with which he intended to close his account with heaven. His great object was to be able to complete this work, and in fact he did so in every material point. In it he expressed, in never-dying powerful tones, his consciousness of guilt and of reconciliation with heaven; and though some portions are only sketches which another has filled up, still their substance undoubtedly emanates from the genuine soul of Mozart. He felt that he could now calmly draw near the judgment-seat of the Almighty. In the innermost depths of his heart he was conscious of his human frailty, and expressed the deep penitence of his heart in chords such as no mortal ear had ever yet heard. It was a great consolation to him to remember (this he expressly

"The next day was Sunday. I was still young, and, I own, vain, and fond of being gayly dressed, but still I never liked when I wore any finery to go on foot from the suburbs [they lived auf der Wieden] to the town, and to drive there cost money; so I said to our good mother, 'Dear mamma, Mozart was so well yesterday that I shall not go to see him to-day; no doubt he is even better to-day, and one day more or less can make no great difference;' on which she said, 'Make me a cup of coffee, and then I will tell you what to do.' She seemed rather disposed to leave me at home. So I went into the kitchen. The fire was out, so I struck a light to make it up again: but Mozart was never out of my thoughts. My coffee was ready, and the light still burning. I now fixed my eyes steadily on my candle, and thought 'I should like to know how Mozart is,' and as I was thinking of this and gazing at the light, it suddenly went out as completely as if it had never been burning; not a spark was to be seen lingering in the thick wick, and I am quite positive that nowhere was there the slightest current of air. I could not help shuddering; so I ran to my mother and told her about it. She said, 'Well, dress quickly, and go to the town, but bring me back word immediately how he is; be sure you don't stay long.'

"I made all the haste I could. Good God! how shocked I was when my sister, almost in desperation, and yet striving to control her grief, hurried to meet me, saying, 'Thank God! Sophie, you are come. He was so bad during the night, that I scarcely expected him to live till daybreak. Stay with me to-day, I beg, for if he has another such attack he must die this night. Go to him, and see how he is.' I tried to compose myself, and went up to his bedside, when he instantly exclaimed, 'Oh! my dear Sophie, it is well that you are come, and you must stay to-night; you must see me die.' I strove to control my feelings, and to dissuade him from such thoughts; but to all I could say he only replied, 'I have the taste of death on my tongue, I smell the grave; and who can comfort my Constanze if you don't stay here?' 'Yes, dear Mozart, but I must first go to my mother to say that you wish me to remain with you to-day, or she will think some misfortune has happened.' 'Yes, do so then, but come back soon.'

"Good heavens! what were my feelings! My poor sister followed me to the door, begging me for God's sake to go to the priests at St. Peter's, and ask one of them to call as if by chance. This I accordingly did, but they hesitated for some time, and I had great difficulty in persuading one of these unchristian fathers to do as I wished. I then went with all speed to my mother, so anxiously expecting me. It was by this time quite dark. How shocked my poor mother was! I persuaded her to go for the night to the eldest daughter of the late Hofer, and ran back as quick as I could to my inconsolable sister.

"I found Süßmayr [a pupil of Mozart's] sitting by Mozart's bed. The well-known Requiem was lying on the coverlet, and Mozart was explaining to Süßmayr the mode in which he wished him to complete it after his death.† He further charged his wife to keep his death secret until she had informed Albrechtsberger of it, for the situation [that of assistant at the Stephan Church] ought to be his before God and the world. Closset, the doctor, was long sought in told his wife) that the Lord to whom he had drawn near in humble and childlike faith, had suffered and died for him, and would look on him in love and compassion. The tones of the Requiem were so heartfelt and true, that they fully display the earnestness of these convictions.

While working at the Requiem, which he frequently did on his sick-bed, when a number was finished, he caused it to be sung, taking the alt himself in his delicate falsetto. The day before his death he desired the score to be brought to him in bed, (it was two o'clock in the afternoon,) and sang his part; Benedict Shack (for whom he had written the part of Tamino) took the soprano, his brother-in-law, Hofer, the tenor, and Gerl (the singer of Sarrastro) the bass. They had got through the various parts, to the first bars of the Lacrimosa, when Mozart suddenly burst into tears and laid aside the score. The delicate organs of his bodily frame were already fast decaying, so much so, that even his cherished canary was obliged to be taken out of the room, because the invalid could no longer bear its singing.

† So certain did he now feel that he was dying, that, while looking once more through the Requiem, with tears in his eyes, he said, "Did I not always say that I was writing it for myself?"

vain, and was at length found in the theatre, but he waited till the end of the piece. He then came and ordered cold applications on Mozart's burning head, which gave him such a shock that he died without recovering consciousness.†

"The last movement of his lips was an endeavor to indicate where the kettledrums should be used in his Requiem. I think I still hear the sound.

"Müller came immediately from the Cabinet of Arts, and took a plaster cast of the pale dead face.* No words of mine, my dear brother, can describe to you the boundless despair with which his faithful wife threw herself on her knees, imploring the support of the Almighty. She could not be induced to leave the body, in spite of my fervent entreaties. If her agony of grief could have been aggravated, it would have been so by the crowds who, on the day following this dreadful night, passed the house weeping and lamenting Mozart."

† His death took place on the 5th December, 1791, about one o'clock in the morning.

* Singularly enough, nothing has ever been heard of this death-mask. Might it not yet be found somewhere in Vienna?

Beethoven's "Ruinen von Athen."*

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

The Ruins of Athens is a dramatic work, in style and form resembling the Masque, of which the golden days of English dramatic literature furnish so many examples, and no less in style and form than in the circumstances, if not the place of its production. The Masque, to judge from example—for I am not aware that any rules of this species of composition have been otherwise preserved—the Masque, was a work comprising dramatic action, poetry, music, pageantry, and more or less of pictorial and mechanical decoration; the subject was always drawn from the occasion in honor of which the Masque was produced, and it was always treated allegorically or, at least, invested with the machinery of the classical mythology. The performance of this species of entertainment took not place in public, but at the court, or at the private residence of whatever noble family required its composition, and it was not uncommon for the members of such family or other aristocratic and even royal amateurs to take part in, if not entirely to sustain, the representation; and there rarely occurred a birthday, or a marriage, or a victory, or any occasion of rejoicing that either was, or was thought to be, of sufficient importance in the state, but the performance of a Masque, composed on purpose, formed part of the celebration.

The custom of having these dramatic allegories to celebrate state occasions has been much more steadily brought down to our own age in Germany than here, for we have in the works of the best approved modern poets of that country very many specimens of this class of writing.

The work under consideration classes among these. It was written for the opening of the theatre in Pesth, the poem by Kotzebue, and the music by Beethoven.

It was first brought to England by Mendelssohn in 1844, when he conducted for the greater part of the season the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, at one of which the most effective portions of this very interesting resuscitation were performed. As a pièce de circonstance the interest of the Ruins of Athens, of course, passed away with the occasion for which it was composed; as a dramatic work, by reason of its purely occasional character, it can never have had any interest; as a work of Beethoven, therefore, it can now only interest the world, and by this highest test it can now only be judged.

The subject of the Masque, so far as I can gather from report, and from Mr. W. Bartholomew's version (which is an adaptation rather than a translation, designed to meet a ready appreciation in England by the substitution of some entirely local matter for other, that being out of our knowledge, was supposed to be beyond our sympathy) the subject or argument, so far as I can gather from such uncertain authorities, is more or less as follows.

Minerva has been since the golden age of Grecian art, the glorious epoch of Grecian liberty, for some or other important offence against the Olympian tribunal, the particulars of which I am unable to furnish, fettered with chains of heaven-wrought adamant by the omnipotent thunderer within a rock impenetrable alike to the aspirations of man and to the intelligence of the goddess, a rock through which neither his spirit of inquiry could approach, nor her wisdom diffuse itself upon the world. The period of vengeance is past; Jove relents, and the captive deity is enfranchised. The first steps of her freedom naturally lead Minerva to the scene of her ancient greatness. She finds Athens, her Athens, her especially beloved and most carefully cherished city, in ruins, the descendants of her fostered people enslaved to a barbarous and fanatic race; the trophies of her former splendor, the wrecks of that art which is the example and the regret of all time, appropriated to the most degrading purposes of vulgar householdry; and the frenzied worshippers of a faith that knows not the divine presence in its most marvellous manifestation, the intellect of man. Here is no longer the home of wisdom and the arts; so the liberated goddess proceeds to Pesth, where she establishes anew her temple in the new theatre, and presides over a triumphal procession in honor of the emperor, its patron, under whose auspices the golden age is to prevail again.

In the English version, which was performed entire at the Princess's Theatre some seven or eight years ago, to the best of my recollection, the Royal Exchange with the statue of Wellington was substituted for the new theatre at Pesth, and Shakespeare with a pageant of the principal characters from all his plays was substituted for the Emperor of Austria,—modifications admirably adapted to the commercial character and the blind vain glory that so eminently mark the British nation, and at the same time interfering in no respect with such particulars as it was within the province of Beethoven's music to illustrate.

The merit of the music is very unequal. There are some pieces in the work that add a radiance to the brightest glory with which the immortal composer is crowned; there are others that bear no indication of the hand of Beethoven, but only his name on the title-page. * * *

The Overture commences with a portion of the opening symphony of the Duet which forms one of the most prominent features of the dramatic music; but the Overture breaks off precisely where the interest of the Duet begins. After this, we have another short fragment which is taken from the triumphal Chorus; this calls forth little admiration when given with the context that alone can make it intelligible; as it appears here, it is wholly without interest. This much constitutes what may be called the Introduction; the Allegro, which is the principal movement, is of the slightest possible pretension. * * *

The first Chorus, "Daughter of high throned Jove," calls for little comment. A digression from the original key of E flat, in C major, for an interludial symphony has an effect that can only be described as whimsical—the master may be supposed to have found himself, as the examination of the sequel will still further illustrate, uncomfortably fettered in the society of Gods and Goddesses, and he seems to have sought in this digression, and sought in vain, a safety valve for his imagination.

The next piece is the very beautiful Duet, to which allusion has been made, "Faultless, yet hated." This is of a wholly different character from what has preceded and gives scope for the warmest, the sincerest expressions of unqualified admiration. It is the lament of two Greek slaves for the fallen condition of their native land, whose fertile soil they are compelled to cultivate, although they cannot enjoy its fruits. The rugged, broken character of the opening bars, suggests the feeling of despair with which a sensitive heart must collapse within itself, at sight of the desecration of all that is most beautiful in art, of all that is most worshipful in nature, at the degradation of humanity itself, which, at the time of Kotzebue and Beethoven, polluted the ground where Socrates and Phidias taught their deathless lesson to the world. This subsides into an expression of plaintive sadness, conveyed in a long, continuous, well-developed, clearly defined melody, of most touching pathos. Every phrase of this exquisite little movement calls forth an exclamation of delight, and its general effect sinks deep in the memory, to leave an impression there that accumulating experience cannot qualify, that time cannot efface. To single out a point for especial eulogy from a surface of even loveliness, is as if to signalize the bluest spot in the expanse of heaven; yet, should we know where those we love abide, that portion of the impenetrable azure which we believe to cover them, will surely be to us the brightest; and thus if some portion of a work of art appeal more particularly than the rest to our individual sympathy, such portion will ever be prominent in its effect upon our feelings, while our judgment pronounces the merit of the whole to be equal. Such prominence, to my personal rather than to my critical appreciation, has the beautiful cadence commencing from a chord of the fundamental seventh upon A, where the responsive sighing of the two voices indicates the expression which nothing could more perfectly, more touchingly embody than the passage before us.† One naturally wonders how it can be that a piece so evidently written with the whole heart of the composer, and appealing direct from thence to the kindred feeling of all who hear it, should be so little known as still remains the Duet under notice; not to speak of the still-growing appreciation of the author; not to speak of the homage that is due to a great man of rendering the justice of our attention to all his works, to consider this Duet apart from Beethoven, and to regard it for its own particular merits alone, I cannot conceive why it is not in the possession of every one whose taste inclines to the higher, the intellectual style of music, and in constant requisition wherever such music is performed.

The following piece, the Chorus of Dervishes, is indeed better known; and its wonderfully graphic effect I believe widely appreciated. Here we have a party of the fanatic devotees of the Moslem faith chanting their wild song of adoration, accompanied with the frantic dance that is said to form a part of the ceremonial of their worship. Music presents nothing more strikingly characteristic than the uncouth melody that marks this truly extraordinary composition, and even this is more powerfully colored by the perfectly original and quite individual accompaniment that is maintained throughout. I have never been in the land of the Crescent, and I know little of El Islam; but through the medium of that treasury of imagination, the Thousand and One Nights' Entertainments. * * *

With minds thus prepared, let us listen to the marvellous creation of Beethoven, and I cannot but suppose that it will present a realization of the wildest ideality, so essentially local in its character, and so obviously a portrait in its local coloring, as to give us the certainty that if it be not true to the subject it illustrates, the subject cannot be true to itself, since nothing can be natural but only what is here portrayed. The chant of the Dervishes consists of a most entirely singular melody, which is once repeated with the same words and then, after an equally individual symphony, that fully carries out the feeling of the vocal strain, resumed with some slight modifications to accommodate the extended metre of the verse, and prolonged with more than reduplicated power; and this second strophe, with the instrumental interlude, is also given twice,—then without coda and with only a few concluding bars, for the orchestra, the movement closes. The voices, tenors and basses only, sing in unison throughout, and the string instruments play ceaselessly in unison with them, save that in the accompaniment every crotchet is divided into a triplet of quavers, and there is no harmony throughout, in the interludial symphonies, (wherein the only, and these, though transient, very striking modulations from the original key of E minor occur) but only the peculiar counterpoint of the brass instruments, the limited scale of which necessitates the employment of the most strange and unusual combinations with the notes of the Choral Chant—hence arises a beauty out of the so-called imperfection of the natural capacity of the horn and trumpet, which the misnamed improvements of valves and keys, and piston, and what not, tend to annihilate, and thus to destroy all the individuality of character of those most prominent instruments, and so to nullify the very existence of orchestral coloring. The Chorus commences at a pianissimo, which gradually rises with the furious zeal of the singers to the utmost power of the voices and instruments, when, for the first time, what—for the want of another technical definition—I have described as the counterpoint of the brass instruments, is introduced, and their fanatic fury reaches its climacteric, when on the high F the exclamation, "Great Prophet, hail!" is given with a preternatural ecstasy of fervor; the delirium that is here most forcibly depicted, gradually subsides, and the decrescendo that brings the movement to its conclusion, presents the exhaustion that is consequent upon such an exertion of all the mental and physical energies. Any, the greatest dramatic composer, might envy Beethoven such a subject for the exercise of one of his highest, most important qualities; but it is impossible to conceive the existence of such a genius as would not emulate in vain such a treatment of it as this, in which art supplants nature, or truth has so completely invested fiction with her own image, that we find the real and the ideal blent into one, and that one everything that can be imagined of perfection.

The Turkish March, that next follows, illustrates another phase of the oriental character with no less vividly picturesque and truly dramatic effect, than the preceding piece; but epithets have been exhausted in the description of the Dervishes' Chorus, and even admiration stands still, to rest from her unwonted excitement, after experiencing the effect of that remarkable movement. I can only say that, if this March be not national in its character, so eminently characteristic is it, and so full of all essentials that constitute nationality in music, nature should pay her debt to art that has so truthfully idealized her. * * *

A technical point that will always be prominent in its effect, is the anticipation of the key of B flat, with the full force of the orchestra, at each recurrence to the subject after the momentary digression to G major; and whoever hears the movement with attention, or examines it with care, will find still much more matter to repay his pains.

The Triumphal March and Chorus, "Twine ye a Garland," of which a fragment is introduced in the Overture, has been long known in London. Here we pass again from the true poetry of life to the bombast of allegory, and the music becomes mouthy, inflated, bathetic accordingly. In Mr. Bartholomew's version, this is the place where the pageant of Shakespeare's characters passes in procession, the accompaniment of which is a strain of music in the grandiose style, many times repeated, but always with additional, or, at least, varied instrumentation. The idea of a passing procession is well enough embodied, more or less, after the manner of the Chorus in Judas Maccabæus, "See the conquering Hero," but by no means so successfully.

The Chorus (in G), "Susceptible Hearts," is a most lovely stream of song, in which the smooth, flowing effect of the beautiful vocal part-writing is fully equalled by the exquisitely continuous, rhythmical melody, that is always obvious throughout. This again, is a piece that is perfectly available for separate performance, and that can never be efficiently performed without charming all who hear it. * * *

The remaining pieces, the Air for bass with Chorus, "Deign, great Apollo," and the final Chorus, "Hail, mighty Master!" carry out the feeling, or if you will, the want of it, that is embodied in the Overture and the opening Chorus. Such music is made, not created; and not educed by the divine fire of heaven, may be truly said to smell of the lamp.—London Mus. World, 1852.

Von Flotow.

[A Biographical Sketch from the Paris Correspondence of the Evening Gazette.]

He was born at the Chateau de Rentendorf in 1812. His family estate is in the Duchy of Mecklenburg Schwerin. After the battle of Waterloo restored Europe once more to the paths of peace, young von Flotow's father resigned his commission in the Prussian army, and devoted himself to the education of his children. His eldest son gave at an early period of life indications of great musical talent, which his mother—an accomplished musician—happily fostered. He "graduated" at college in his sixteenth year, and persuaded his family to allow him to reside some time in Paris in order to continue his musical education. He came to Paris and studied under the guidance of Mons. Reicha, a composer of some reputation in his day, but whose image has faded away from almost all of our memories. While he was engaged in his studies his father bounced into his room, and was half angry to find that he was not already a great composer. Hadn't he been studying for twenty years! General von Flotow had taken the precaution before quitting Germany to provide himself with letters of introduction to Mons. de Saint Georges, the well-known dramatic author. As soon as he discovered his son was not famous, he went with him to Mons. de Saint Georges' residence. After the customary salutations were exchanged, Gen. von Flotow asked: "Will you do me a favor? My son wishes to become a famous composer. Please be good enough to tell me is such a thing possible?" Mons. de Saint Georges replied: "Certainly." "Then pray tell me how long will it take my son to prove he has talents?" "General, that question is not so easily answered. I should say some five or six years." "We'll call it six years, Mons. de Saint Georges; I'll allow him money enough to live on for six years. If at the expiration of this period of time he has not made himself a name I'll allow him no more money; for I have no idea of supporting a young fellow in idleness in Paris. May I ask you to be so good as to be my son's guardian during these six years?" Mons. de Saint Georges, before answering this question, requested young von Flotow to sit at the piano and play some music. Finding the young man the possessor of talents, he said: "I consent to be his guardian; we will try to make something of him." The very day the sixth year expired, Gen. von Flotow wrote to his son this letter:

"When you receive this note the last delay I granted you will have expired. As I am determined not to encourage your follies, I write you to order you to return home at once. My banker has given orders to his Paris correspondent to pay you money enough for your expenses home, but not one centime more."

The young man showed the letter to Mons. de Saint Georges and asked him what he should do. Mons. de Saint Georges advised him to remain. He asked: "But how can I remain at Paris? I have no money." "Earn your own livelihood." "I never earned a cent in my life and don't know how to set about it." "Follow the example of poor artists and give music lessons."

He followed Mons. de Saint Georges' advice and gave music lessons. The latter introduced him to families who required a music master, and the young composer managed to live, although the paternal purse was closed to him. Soon afterwards he gave a one-act opera at the Marquis de Belissen's Chateau de Royaumont. It was played by amateurs with great success, which was sustained the following winter when the opera was played in Paris at the Hotel Castellane. In 1838 he brought out an opera in three acts, Le Duc de Guise, at the Theatre de la Renaissance. The "book" was Mons. Alex. Dumas' Henri III. altered to suit with the exigencies of the lyric stage. The performance was organized by the Princess Czartoryska for the benefit of the Poles; the characters were filled by amateurs of the highest rank and fashion (duchesses and princesses of the Faubourg St. Germain filled the parts of choristers, and when the curtain rose on Henri III.'s court there were $2,000,000 of diamonds to be seen on the performers' persons) foremost among whom shone Mlle. de La Grange, whom you have since seen exerting her talents to repair the loss of her fortune; $6000 were taken in at the door. The opera was eminently successful. Gen. von Flotow, convinced by his son's success in earning his own livelihood when thrown on his own resources, and by the favor with which the opera was received, that his heir was no idle fellow, restored his allowance.

He next wrote an opera comique, L'Esclave de Camdena, whose book Mons. de Saint Georges wrote. It was played in 1843. His next appearance was at Hamburg where he brought out Sradella, an opera, which is still in vogue in Germany. In the midst of the early success of this work he had the misfortune to lose both his parents. He came now into possession of a handsome estate, and henceforward he spent a portion of his time at the Chateau de Rentendorf, and the remaining portion here. Mons. de Saint Georges wrote in 1842 (at the request of the manager of the Grand Opera) a ballet entitled Lady Henrietta, suggested to him, it is said, by an adventure which befel two ladies of his family, who had disguised themselves and mingled with servants at a fair. The music of this ballet was confided to three composers. The first act was given to Herr von Flotow, the second to Mons. Burgmüller, the third to Mons. Deldeve. The ballet had enormous success. Herr von Flotow was so well pleased with the plot of the ballet he begged Mons. de Saint Georges to make it the "book" of an opera. The dramatic writer cheerfully complied with the request, wrote, transformed the plot into a book of an opera, and Herr von Flotow wrote Martha. It was played for the first time at Vienna where it was received with enthusiasm. It has since been played everywhere.

Herr von Flotow married at Vienna in 1849, and had the misfortune to lose his wife the following year. His grief seemed for a time a sort of phrensy. He would hear of no consolation. He tore up his engagements with managers, retired to the Chateau de Rentendorf, lived in absolute solitude, and although his three act opera Indra was written he refused to allow it to be played. Indra did not see the foot-lights until 1852. It was received with success, and the merits of the composer were now so evident the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin appointed him the superintendent of his theatre. Herr von Flotow accepted the place with the ambition and hope of making that stage play the same part in the musical history of Germany which the Weimar stage played in its dramatic history. Court intrigues, actresses' rivalries, and those thousand-and-one incidents of theatrical life—each insignificant in itself, but like those Lilliputian threads which bound Gulliver, able together to arrest the strongest will. Herr von Flotow resigned in disgust, re-married and took up his abode at Vienna. He visited Paris frequently and maintained a cordial friendship with Mons. de Saint Georges, with whom he frequently worked. They have at this moment a two act opera, Zilda, at the Opera Comique, which was actually in rehearsal until Mlle. Marimon's departure from this theatre. SPIRIDION.

ORATORIO. The Sacred Harmonic Society have performed recently Israel in Egypt, the Messiah and Samson. Haydn's Seasons was announced for Feb.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. These classical entertainments are more popular than ever. The eighth season commenced Jan. 15th, with a programme wholly of Beethoven, as follows:

Quartet, in E flat, No. 10, Op. 74, strings. .... Beethoven.
Lieder-kreis. .... Beethoven.
Sonata, in D, Op. 10, No. 3, Pianoforte alone. .... Beethoven.
Serenade, in D major, Op. 8, for Violin, Viola and Violoncello. .... Beethoven.
Song, "Adelaide". .... Beethoven.
Sonata in A, Op. 12, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violin. .... Beethoven.

Conductor, Mr. Benedict.

The Quartet and Serenade were played by Herren Straus and Ries, Mr. H. Webb, and M. Paque, the latter "always welcome" in the unavoidable absence of Sig. Piatti, who is "starring" on the Continent. The pianist was Mr. Franklin Taylor, of whom the Times says:

He played the sonata so admirably that he infected every hearer with his own enthusiasm, and was loudly called for at the conclusion of his performance. What most pleased us in Mr. Taylor was an entire absence of pretension, which gave to his invariably correct execution a double charm; and what most showed him to be possessed of real musical feeling was that among the four movements of which the sonata consists his reading of the grand adagio was best of all. His reception at the Monday Popular Concerts was just as frank and just as legitimate as that which, early last season, accompanied his performance of a concerto by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, at the Crystal Palace Concerts. After the sonata in D, Op. 10, the sonata in A, Op. 12,—second of the set of three inscribed to the famous Italian composer, Antonio Salieri, who endeavored to make Beethoven understand dramatic music from the then Italian point of view (not that of Cherubini, be it understood)—was mere child's play; and so well was this genial and vigorous piece executed by Mr. Taylor and Herr Strauss that it was a pity the whole audience had not remained to hear it.

The only singer was Mr. Sims Reeves; but Mr. Sims Reeves singing his very best, and in such splendid pieces, too, as the "Liederkreis" ("Circle" of six songs, the words by Jettles), and the incomparable "Adelaide," leaves nothing to wish at a concert of genuine music. Such was the case on Monday, when our great tenor threw his whole heart into the two songs, and enchanted his audience beyond measure. It is scarcely requisite to add that "Adelaide" was enthusiastically "encored"—so enthusiastically that, late as it came in the evening, the singer could not courteously decline the honor. Both the "Liederkreis" and "Adelaide" were accompanied to perfection by Mr. Benedict—in this especial art without a rival.

At the second concert, Mr. Charles Halle played a Sonata in D by Mozart, to which the Times thinks his biographer Jahn renders but scant justice, adding:

The opening allegro, in spite of its recalling, at the outset, one of the preludes from J. S. Bach's most familiar work, is vigorous and masterly; the theme of the adagio clearly suggested that of one of the most remarkable slow movements in the early sonatas of Beethoven; and by the final rondo allegretto the same Beethoven was also more or less inspired. Mr. Chappell styles this sonata of Mozart "No. 21"—upon what authority is not stated;—nevertheless, we are willing to give him the credit of having studied, with the requisite diligence, the Chronologische Verzeichniss of Herr Ludwig von Köchel—now beyond comparison the best authority. At all events the sonata in D is one of those in which the wonderful neatness and precision of Mr. Halle's execution are displayed to most conspicuous advantage; and for that reason if for no other, the frequenters of the Monday Popular Concerts were delighted to hear it played by the eminent German "virtuoso," for the sixth time, at these excellent entertainments.

But in addition to the always welcome appearance of Mr. Halle, the concert last night was remarkable by the 14th performance of Beethoven's—in its way inimitable—Septet, for violin, viola, violoncello, clarinet, "French horn," bassoon, and double bass, played as perfectly as could be wished by MM. Straus, H. Webb, Paque, Lazarus, C. Harper, Winterbottom and Reynolds, and applauded, as never fails to be the case, enthusiastically, movement after movement. The Septet is one of those inspirations that, no matter how staid and conventional the forms, are perennially fresh. By the side of this extraordinary production of Beethoven's early time may appropriately be placed Haydn's delightful quartet in G, the first of a set of six, "Op. 76." This had never previously been introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts; and the sensation it created should be a formidable argument against those who would urge the director to depart from the plan with which he wisely set out, and his adherence to which has been the real secret of his almost unparalleled success. Mr. Chappell's intention was evidently to make the general public familiar with those masterpieces of art with which the great composers have enriched the repertory of the "Chamber"—to do, in short, for the many what the old Philharmonic Concerts contemplated doing for the few, in the direction of orchestral music, and what the Sacred Harmonic Society had done for the many in that of oratorio.

The singer was Miss Robertine Henderson, whose progress is so marked and serious that first-rate things may be reasonably expected of her.

The final piece of the concert was a "duo concertante," in name—a regular sonata in fact (in G minor Op. 95)—for pianoforte and violin, the composition of Spohr, for which all the excellent playing of Mr. Hallé and Herr Straus could not succeed in awaking any great degree of interest. So thoroughly "dry" a sonata has rarely been produced.

COLOGNE. The correspondent of the Orchestra writes, under date of Jan. 21st:

Our last subscription concert in the Gürzenich Saale on the 16th instant was in every respect one of the most interesting and successful of the present season. The programme was as follows: 1st part, overture to "Chevy Chase," (historical ballad) by Macfarren, a MS. performed for the first time; 2nd, Concertante for two violins by L. Spohr; 3rd, aria from "Jessonda," Spohr; 4th, the symphony No. 8 of Beethoven. Second part: 5th, "Scenen aus der Frithjof-Sage," von Essias Tegner, für Männerchor, Solostimmen und Orchester, by Max Bruch, for the first time in Cologne. The overture of Macfarren's is decidedly one of his best productions, uniting masterly modulations and scoring with melodic fluency; it met with the most enthusiastic and decided success.

F. Hiller being unwell, the music director Weber conducted the orchestra; and the Symphony of Beethoven as well as the other orchestral pieces of the programme went under his bâton with the spirit, unity of intention, and nuances to which we are accustomed, the orchestra here being beautifully drilled through many years of practice. Weber is the leader of the Cologne Männergesangverein, which you must remember produced a great sensation in London a few years ago. The second part of the programme, exclusively filled by Bruch's cantata, conducted by the composer, was the most interesting number of the concert. Its story is one of the Norwegian myths.

The subject of the cantata is a very common one, but it affords many dramatic points and the verses are elevated and flowing. The music of Frithjof is of the purest inspiration; and from its cosmopolitan character, like every chef d'œuvre, it will certainly extend itself rapidly. The part of Frithjof, written for baritone, is the most beautiful of the work. The recitatives, some declamati and some cantabile, are first-rate, the modulations being always according to the meaning of the words. The choruses are magnificent, and Scene III., "Frithjofs Rache—Tempelbrand—Fluch," is a real chef d'œuvre. In this scene the solo of Frithjof is in melody and dramatic expression as fine music as any composed. A small quartet solo for male voices in Scene IV., is a real masterpiece. Scene V., "Ingeborgs Klage," a soprano solo, is perhaps not so highly dramatic as the solos of Frithjof, but it possesses the charming Innigkeit so peculiar to German music, that which the French call sentiment intime. The chorus andante maestoso at the end is grand and nobly crowns the work. The instrumentation of the Frithjof is thoroughly effective, giving to different parts their proper character, without abusing (according to modern tendency) the contrast of timbres. Perhaps I should object to the introduction of harps in the last song of Frithjof, this instrument being in all the work the characteristic color of Ingeborg's part. The music is beautifully written for the voices, a peculiarity very rare to be met with among modern composers. Herr Stikmann sang the part of Frithjof remarkably well, with the exception of a little shrieking in some passages which required rather force of expression than force of lungs. Frl. Rempel, a concert-singer of Cologne, has a very fine soprano voice, but not having sufficiently learnt its mechanism, the attack of her high notes is not sure, making you feel uneasy on hearing her sing. She has no style, no feeling, and is very monotonous. The part of Ingeborg requires a much better artiste than Frl. Rempel. The horns were very uncertain, and the quartet solos poor. The orchestra under the bâton of the composer went extremely well. The success of the "Frithjof" was as genuine as immense. Bruch was applauded and recalled several times.

PARIS. From the Musical World's correspondence, Jan. 17 and 23, we glean a few items of musical intelligence.

The production of Mercadante's Leonora at the Italiens has shed no new lustre on the Neapolitan maestro.

M. Bagier, who is eternally committing blunders, of course chose one of the weakest operas of the composer, and has disappointed nobody in the selection. The story—although there is some difference of opinion on this head among the critics—is taken from Burger's ballad "Hurrah! les morts vont vite;" or, more properly, from a piece founded on the ballad, and brought out at the Porte-Saint-Martin in 1844, written by MM. Cogniard frères. The cast gives Mlle. Vitali as Leonora; Signor Fraschini as Guillaume, the young hussar and lover of Leonora; Signor Delle-Sedie as the General, father of Guillaume; Signor Scalese as Sergeant Strelitz; and Signor Agnesi as the old doctor, father of Leonora. I shall not fatigue you or your readers with a description of the plot, which employs a bit of Romeo and Juliet, a bit of Lucia di Lammermoor, and a bit of one or two other pieces besides. M. Bagier may run Leonora a few nights, but undoubtedly it will be in the teeth of a positive failure. It may be called a succès d'estime for Mercadante; but for the theatre, I repeat, it is a positive failure. Adelina Patti has arrived and made her entré on Monday in Linda di Chamouni. Her reception was in the extreme degree enthusiastic, and her performance as finished and touching as ever.

There has been a "terrible to do" at the Grand Opera. Madame Gueymard-Lanters, who had been cast for Donna Elvira in Don Juan, about to be put in rehearsal, loudly protested against this desecration of her talents, and vowed that she would play no comprimaria part. In vain several thinking people assured her that Elvira in Don Giovanni was no second-rate part, and that it requires a good singer to do the music justice, and that, moreover, to sing any part well in any of Mozart's operas would make a glory to the artist. The clever, but I fear, ignorant cantatrice, was only persuaded when the director brought her a copy of the original cast of Don Juan at the Opera, and showed her the name of Madame Dorus Gras appended to Donna Elvira. Whereupon Madame Gueymard-Lanters thought fit to condescend to honor Mozart.

Talking of Don Giovanni, there seems to be quite a Mozart fever just now raging in the principal lyric theatres of Paris. Don Giovanni is at this moment being rehearsed at the Italiens, at the Grand Opera, and Theatre-Lyrique. At M. Carvalho's theatre, in which a very earnest attempt has been made to domiciliate Mozart, the characters are to be thus distributed: Donna Anna, Mlle. de Maësen; Donna Elvira, Mlle. Nilsson; Zerlina, Madame Miolan-Carvalho; Don Giovanni, M. Troy; Don Ottavio, M. Michot; Masetto, M. Lutz; the Commendatore, M. Depassio; and Leporello, M. Bataille, who has been engaged expressly.

As a special bit of news I may mention that Gluck's Armida is to be brought out at the Theatre-Lyrique with Madame Charton-Demeur in the principal character.

As has almost invariably been the wont of my predecessors, I herewith furnish you with the programme of the current Popular Concert of Classical Music. The fifth of the second series was given on Sunday at the Cirque Napoleon, the selection as follows:—Overture, Il Flauto Magico—Mozart; Symphony in B flat, No. 4—Beethoven; Overture, the Prophète—Meyerbeer; Andante and Minuet from Symphony in E flat—Mozart; Overture, Der Freischütz—Weber.

Musical Correspondence.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., FEB. 1.—Mr. MORGAN recently gave a concert upon the organ in the Central Church. The programme contained the D-major Fugue of Bach; Theme and Variations by Hesse; the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Tell" Overtures; "Harmonious Blacksmith;" Finale to the C-minor Symphony, and one or two transcriptions. That of the air "By the sad sea waves," was particularly well received.

On the afternoon of the 22nd ult., Mr. JAMES M.

TRACY gave a Soirée at the new music rooms of Barnes and Brother in Corinthian Hall Building. He was assisted by Mrs. Kate Bennett Shelley, vocalist. The Piano-Forte selections were from Liszt, Mendelssohn, Henselt, Chopin and Herz, beside the A-flat Sonata, (op. 26) of Beethoven. The performance lacked in effectiveness, owing to the use of a square piano and the crowded state of the room. Mrs. Shelley sang Schubert's Serenade and an Ave Maria by Cherubini, substituting a ballad for the "Una voce" of the programme.

Mr. Tracy deserves and receives credit for this effort; but he should have better facilities in the matter of room and piano, if in future the attendance is to be as large as on this occasion. He is organist at Grace Church, in the choir of which Mrs. S. is soprano.

Boston has recently laid us under tribute (!) by sending us a "minstrel" company. The Parepa concerts and Mr. Morgan were patronized by a few hundred people. But Corinthian Hall could not contain the throng rushing to witness the buffoonery of the "minstrels." As many went away unable to gain admission, as listened to Parepa on the first night here. Be it to the discredit of public taste; yet Rochester is by no means alone in this glory, we are sorry to say.

Church music in Rochester presents the usual phases of chorus choirs, quartets and congregational singing. Of the former I may mention the Central, (Pres.) Penfield, organist; Warner, leader. The Brick (Pres.) Kalbfleisch, organist; Munson, leader. The Second Baptist, Black leader, Mrs. Beardsley, organist. Plymouth (Cong.) Williams, organist and leader. At St. Peter's (O. S. Pres.) there is to be witnessed a very successful union of quartet and congregational styles; Belden (non-professional), organist. Third Pres. congregation is led by a precentor; Kempe (non-professional), organist. The Episcopal churches have quartets, except Christ Church, where the mode is congregational. Mr. Morra is organist at St. Patrick's. At the First Baptist is a fair semi-choir of eight, with Mr. Wilkins of the University as organist and leader. He would do ample justice to a more capacious instrument. There is a Soprano there, Miss Benson, who would not suffer in a comparison with some in occupancy of "first" positions even in Boston. She lacks only opportunity to become a fine Oratorio singer, I think. Away from the sphere of Oratorio influence, young singers have frequently nothing but execution as an ideal to aspire to. Oratorio circles of influence do not necessarily originate artists, but they ripen them. Were it otherwise, Boston would not be dependent upon the rest of the world for soloists for its great Messiah and Elijah occasions. Why would it not "pay" artistically for your Handel and Haydn Society to take under its fostering care such rising talent, wherever found? T. B. A.

CINCINNATI, FEB. 2.—We are having a lively musical season this winter. Our home Societies and musicians are industrious and progressing, and from abroad we have had the Parepa troupe, and three Opera troupes, viz.: the Susini-Ghioni, Grover's German Opera and Gran's Italian troupe. The first named operatic company was the poorest we have had here of late. The German troupe was not as complete as last winter, and as they opened their season in this city, they seemed not to be prepared yet to give us some of the finest operas on their repertoire, such as "Fidelio," "The Jewess" and "Robert." Yet they gave us some pleasing representations, and foremost among them the charming "Dame Blanche," with Habelmann in the principal character; which opera, however, is but poorly appreciated by our public at large, who seem only pleased when they can listen to some tearing Italian passion, or a sweet sentimental strain. Upon a great part of the sparkling and beautiful music in the "Dame Blanche" the elegant young ladies and gentlemen seem to look as if it were below their dignity to pay it any attention. They are really to be pitied.

Grau's troupe gave us "Faust," "Saffo," "Favorita," "Trovatore," and four times what our wise local reporters rather appropriately called "dress rehearsals" of the "Africaine." Would they had given us something better, both in music and performance! Yet we were glad to hear this novelty, which certainly is entertaining in spite of its length. I received the impression that there is but little of original, yet a good deal of pleasing music in it. On the whole, it seems not so strained and far fetched, as much of Meyerbeer's music in his other operas. Death may have prevented him from changing and filing as much in it, as he delighted to do with former operas, much to their detriment, I apprehend. In "Faust," the Margaret of Mlle. Boschetti, a French lady, was rather interesting; it was a French and not a German Margaret. Her lover did not seem to inspire her as much as the jewels he gave her; but the latter called out all her spirits. She expressed her delight over them with real passion, not that sickly sentimental Italian one, nor the pretty, superficial delight of Miss Kellogg, but natural, French fire, and showed a good deal of originality. Mad. Gazzaniga as "Saffo" was very fine, but did not succeed in making anything of that stupid opera, which but for the Duetto and Finale of the second act would hardly live. The two Tenors of the troupe are about on a level with Signor Irre and the other rather indifferent Italian singers that Europe has spared to us during the last years.

Our resident artists, Messrs. KUNKEL and HAHN, have given three very pleasant Chamber Concerts. They are progressing. A recent correspondent of yours bestows upon Mr. Kunkel exaggerated and uncalled for praise, which might have the tendency to spoil him, but he no doubt has a great deal of talent, and improves not only in execution, but, what is better, in expression. His touch is still rather hard, but more elastic than it used to be. He interprets best the modern composers, Thalberg, Liszt, Gottschalk, etc., and also pretty well Schumann, Rubinstein, etc. If he as yet succeeds less well with Beethoven and Mozart, he seems at least to study them faithfully.

The "Cecilia Society" have given as yet but one concert this winter. The programme embraced very interesting compositions, such as "The Night," by Schumann, and "The Flight into Egypt" by Berlioz. Beethoven's Mass in C was well rendered, with a good deal of light and shade, although introducing perhaps a little too much of modern exaggeration.

The "Harmonic Society" have given two concerts to large and growing audiences, the first part made up of selections from "The Messiah," the second part giving us the beautiful "Kyrie a capella," by Robert Franz, Beethoven's "Recalled at sea," and Mendelssohn's charming cantata, "Hear my prayer." The Society is prosperous, and they talk about building in a few years a Music Hall with a large Organ. If they were Chicago people instead of Cincinnatians, they would probably add, "an Organ that will surpass the Boston great Organ."

Review of Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The third Chamber Concert (Wednesday evening, Feb. 7) was inferior in interest to none ever given by the Club, and made it hard to resign oneself to the fact that only one more of the series remains. The opening piece was Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat (No. 2, Op. 87), one of the most all alive and wholesome, as well as finely imaginative and original of all Mendelssohn's larger Chamber works. The theme of the Allegro vivace leaps forth at one vigorous bound, like a sealed spring suddenly released to native sunshine; and those purling triplets that succeed it, rapidly repeating themselves in an undertone, only make the joy more palpable: the second theme is equally felicitous and very piquant, and the working up of all more than fulfils expectation. The Andante scherzando, so quaintly ballad-like—Romanza it might be called—is an unforgettable old favorite, inimitable in its way; the Adagio one of the tenderest and purest he has written; and the rapid Finale fully answers the promise of the opening movement. It was capitally played.

The Fantasia, which preludes to the piano Sonata No. 1 of Mozart, in C minor, was very neatly and tastefully played by Mr. HERMANN DAUM, who dares to be partial to Mozart, even in his piano music, and even in these days of craving for effect, and we sincerely praise him for it. Between the larger works of the evening, this Fantasia was sweetly and calmly refreshing; we could have listened to the Sonata also with a good will. We thought him hardly so happy in his rendering of Schumann. That Adagio and Allegro for piano and violoncello, op. 70, in A flat, were highly interesting and characteristic, and on the whole well presented.

Then, for a finale, came the great work of the evening and the season, the fifteenth Quartet of Beethoven (A minor, op. 132), which made so deep an impression in the first concert, and a still deeper this time. It seems to us about the most satisfactory achievement of the Club thus far in quartet playing, and they may well take courage from it; indeed we think the opening of the season with this Quartet has proved a sort of a revival in the Quintette Club and in its audience. Mr. SCHULTZE, the leading violinist, has played with more than his old spirit, truth and fineness this winter; and a better cellist than Wulf Fries it would be very hard to find. We still shrink from the formidable task of trying to point out the beauties of this wonderful masterpiece of Beethoven's last years (composed in 1825). We only plead for further hearing, and trust it will stand on the repertoire of the Quintette Club (not on the shelf) until we shall all know it well. Very sure we are, that no work has been more deeply or more generally enjoyed in these concerts for some years.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT. The afternoon of Thursday, Feb. 8, was stormy, quite as much so, though unique in kind, as the days of the two preceding concerts. Verily, the Symphony Concerts thus far have fallen on the three worst days and worst moods of this capricious winter. Yet the audience has been faithful and has each time gained in numbers. This is certainly encouraging;—it were hardly possible that it should gain in character; the truest musical "sphere" and sympathy (consistent with such numbers) possible to Boston, may be felt at these concerts. The programme this time was altogether choice as before, and yet individual and unique in the principle on which it was made up. This will be found to be the case with each of the six programmes. It was as follows:

- 1 Symphony, in B flat. . . . . Haydn.
Largo. Allegro vivace. — Adagio. — Minuetto. — Presto.
- 2 Piano-forte Concerto, in C minor. Op. 87). . . Beethoven.
Allegro, with Cadenza by Moscheles.
B. J. Lang.

- 3 Overture to "Anacreon," (first time), . . . . . Cherubini.
- 4 Polonaise, for Piano-forte, in E major, (first time) Weber.
Transcribed, with Orchestra, by Liszt.
B. J. Lang.
- 5 Symphony, in F, No. 8. . . . . Beethoven.
Allegro vivace. — Allegretto scherzando. — Minuetto. — Allegro vivace.

For the first concert the G-minor Symphony of Mozart was chosen, as a sort of model symphony and good point of departure whence to survey a variety of representative specimens. In the second, Beethoven came in, if only because he could no longer be kept back; for Beethoven is always and rightly the first thought of when we speak of Symphony; his art the most in unison with the great humanitarian thoughts and aspirations of this age; his nine Symphonies, so far as we can yet know, unsurpassable; therefore he claims, as we have said before, the lion's share in the six concerts.

But shall "Father Haydn" be left out? He has not been so often heard of late here as to lose his freshness; nothing can be more clear, more . . . ant and full of charm than that Symphony in B flat; and if more is wanting to meet the full demand of each one among only six such concerts, more natural or more interesting than to contrast this genial work of an older, not a perishable, fashion, in the same programme, with the shortest, lightest, liveliest of the Symphonies of Beethoven, and that, too, a product of the master's ripest art, the record of some happier hour, some visitation of the sweetest sunshine amid the thickening shadows of his earnest, deeply brooding, solitary, sad existence?

The Symphony by Haydn was played remarkably well, by a band better balanced and trained to truer unity than has been reached before; all went smooth and clear; all was euphonious and alive with music; and it was keenly relished; many found it only too short. The broad and noble introduction, the almost Mozart-like loveliness of the Adagio, and the exquisite vivacity of the quick movements, all so pure in form, so neatly and felicitously rounded, each new thought or variation springing so naturally from the last and so consistent with the whole, betrayed the master who can never be entirely superseded, one who will always be good company among the greatest. Beethoven's No. 8, unfortunately, did not secure so good a hearing, nor such satisfactory rendering in all parts, and therefore the comparison was somewhat balked; else its grace would have been found at least equal to that of Haydn, its life richer and deeper and tingling with far more intensity of joy, such as belongs to far more capacity of discontent and suffering, far more ideality; the whole thing more imaginative, original, Shakspearian, so to speak. But it came last—the true place to put it, as being really the liveliest thing in the programme, and as offsetting the other Symphony—and that last was made later by the encore of the preceding piece, so different in character as to somewhat spoil the mood in which such a work should be listened to. Then too, a portion of the Orchestra had to withdraw to fulfil an engagement out of town; and many of the audience had to leave before it was over, lingering to hear every note which the relentless rail-road bell allowed them, and so (unwillingly, we doubt not, in most cases) disturbing those who remained;—only the unmusical nature of some few betrayed itself in the manner of the going out, the letting doors swing loudly to, &c. Such general uneasiness was sympathetic, disturbing alike hearer and performer, and so the delicious Symphony went not so well as it might have done, although the witching Allegretto and the Finale especially, in spite of these drawbacks, were abundantly rewarding to the willing ear.

Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" made a capital hit. It is old, to be sure; used to figure much in London concerts many years ago; is still often played in Berlin and other German cities; but it is never too late to make acquaintance with so good a thing. Indeed Cherubini's works are altogether too little known here. Was he not one of the very few musicians whose approbation Beethoven cared for when he wrote the Mass in D? Nine noble overtures live, out of many he has written; and three or four of his entire operas will yet, we trust, claim here the admiration which they have long enjoyed in France and Germany and England. His opera "Anacreon, ou l'Amour fugitif," was produced at the Grand Opera in Paris in 1803, a few years after the Medea, his grandest, and Les deux Journées, which to this day keeps the stage in Germany as one of the most popular of all operas under the title of Der Wasserträger. "Anacreon" failed at the Grand Opera, was signally and scandalously hissed and hooted down, we read, partly because the book was bad, but more because of the fashion of the day in Paris being altogether for the sentimental sweet Italian melody, and against the nobler Cherubini sort of Italian, which it decried as German music. But in Vienna and other parts of Germany its beauties were warmly recognized, although he was hardly felt to have struck just the Anacreontic key. But the overture has always been admired. Not a great overture, compared with those of Beethoven or Weber; ontranked too by his own overtures to Medea and the Wasserträger and Les Abencerrages; yet it is genial in spirit, large in form, kindling and growing with a fine enthusiasm, a captivating charm that rivets your attention to the end. Those opening chords, to be sure, are rather formal and old-fashioned; they sound well, but say little, and simply make a dignified conventional beginning; they carry you back even farther than the beginning of the century, and beyond Mozart's time. The little phrases of oboe, flute, bassoon, too, which next answer by turns to the reiterated challenge of the two notes of the horn, seem a little empty and trivial, and yet they excite expectation; but when the Allegro theme sets in, when you come to the gist of the matter, it opens rich with poetry and beauty—intrinsic beauty, and not mere effect. This was perhaps even happier in the rendering than the Haydn Symphony, and it was welcomed as a real acquisition to our concerts.—Mr. ZERRAHN has labored faithfully in the rehearsal of his orchestra, entering into it with unflagging enthusiasm, and must feel rewarded by the improvement shown in each successive concert.

The piano playing by Mr. LANG was the theme of general admiration. The Allegro of the C-minor Concerto—one of the earlier and one of the best of Beethoven's—was rendered with true feeling, force and delicacy, the outline never lost or blurred, the light and shade good, and the whole euphonious, filling the great hall well,—for which the remarkably fine Chickering piano, combining rare power and beauty of tone, must take its share of credit. Mr. Lang has an excellent touch for making the piano do justice to itself in a large place. We can hardly quite forgive him for cutting us off with only a single movement of a Beethoven concerto. The long Cadenza by Moscheles, working up the themes of the piece with an ingenious but loyal fancy, gave good play to his virtuosity. Still more so that Lisztian transcription of the beautiful and brilliant Polonaise in E by Weber. Liszt had borrowed an introduction for it from the other Polonaise of Weber (in E flat), embellished and brightened the whole thing, bright as it was before, with his peculiar arts, and reinforced it with strangely beautiful orchestral accompaniment, verging on the grotesque at times in the latter part, where not only the silvery ring of the triangle, but clashing cymbals and bass drum intervened, the former sympathetically, the latter heavily and coarsely—but the dose might (with more rehearsal) have been administered more sparingly. Mr. Lang played his part wonderfully well, with finished elegance and ease, keeping up the swift and shining movement without the slightest break or faltering, and overdoing nothing. The band were not so well up in their parts; in one instance important instruments were unwittingly or wisely silent; and this was really the motive and justification for accepting the encore of the delighted audience: namely, the desire to make it go better the second time, which it did—all but the aforesaid instruments of percussion. Repetitions are against the principle and spirit, as well as the convenience of these concerts. One thing cannot be repeated without injury to what comes after. It was this encore that so nearly spoiled the Symphony; first, because it was, more than any piece yet entering into these programmes, a show piece (though a very interesting one), and so dissipated the calm, collected mood for the reception of better things; and secondly, because it robbed those who had to depart punctually of just the ten minutes they would fain have given to full hearing of the Symphony.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The last two Wednesday Afternoon Concerts have drawn large audiences. On the 7th the principal feature was the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, which suffered from the absence of the first bassoon about as much as any composition could; but otherwise it was in the main well played and enjoyed. The overtures to Zinetta and Tannhäuser opened and closed the concert in the widest contrast of manner. The Strauss Waltz, "Morgenblätter," pricked up the quick ears of the young people with a very pleasurable sensation; no wonder that they asked for its repetition in a second concert. The even, rich contralto of Mrs. J. S. CARY, and her chaste, unaffected, truly artistic way of singing are always welcome, sing what she may. But the selections might have been much better. That scene by Gounod, "Star of Bethlehem," is tame and commonplace in melody, and owes what impression it did make to its sensuous orchestration: while the ingenious variation of the already altogether florid "Una voce" from Il Barbiere, to suit it to her voice, by no means left the sparkling melody essentially what Rossini meant by it. It was clever on the part of the arranger and faultlessly executed by the singer, but we would fain have heard her sing something more in her own vein and her own range originally. That voice is for songs of deeper, finer import.

Last Wednesday Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony was played, and we were glad to have the Union thus supplement the six "Symphony Concerts," which cannot find room for all the composers that deserve to be represented in this form and therefore give the preference to the less familiar among the best things. Auber's pretty overture to "La Sirène" opened the concert, and the Turkish March from one of Mozart's Piano Sonatas, instrumented by Mr. RYAN, closed it. But the novelty and point of curiosity this time was the famous Overture by Berlioz, "Les Francs Juges," in which he has undertaken to depict the terror and the mystery of that secret tribunal of the middle ages, called in Germany the Vehmgericht, which was a sort of people's Inquisition, darkly and swiftly executing a rude sort of justice in those turbulent times when the "powers that be" were too often the very robbers to be dealt with. (Every reader of Scott's "Anne of Geierstein" or Goethe's "Götz von Berlichingen," knows how effectively its scenes could be pressed into the service of romance, and will need no better "programme" to this startling tone-picture of the French composer, who is nothing if he cannot try his hand in new effects of strongest color and new instrumental combinations.)

The opening is certainly impressive and the thing grows with real positiveness of purpose. You can imagine the prisoner led in blind-folded, his horror when he sees the awful preparations of the court, the sinking of his heart at the relentless "No!" of his judges, solemnly and terribly conveyed by those blasts of trombones, ophicleid, &c., and there is much of logical and interesting working up of themes, as well as coloring. But long before the end it seemed to have become senseless and insufferable noise. We felt as if it were the rankest materialism of Art, materialism without the charm of aught naive, spontaneous or honest. Still we can endure the noise again, for the sake of more closely noting its original points, particularly of instrumentation. We hope it will be repeated some day so that it may be better known.

GERMAN OPERA. Mr. Grover's supplementary week did some things which in a measure atoned for the stale repetitions, the heavy novelties, the many imperfections, and the humbug of the fevered season of Italian and German Opera, whereby pockets and patience had been so severely taxed. For instance, we shall always remember with pleasure little Mme. ROTTER's earnest impersonation of the beautiful part of Alice in Robert; she sang and acted admirably, equal to every climax; like Jenny Lind, her clear, true voice has to make its way through a certain film, and there is a charm in that very triumph of soul over matter; in spirit, too, it reminded us a little of the Lind. Then the return of HIMMER, whose tenor had not apparently its full power, though his style and action are always refined and truthful, and he was all himself in voice too in the last scene; and the exquisite music of HABELMANN's voice in Raimbault; and the excellent debut of Mlle. NADDI as the Princess, all made it a very enjoyable performance. Only HERMANN was not up to the part of Bertram, and seemed unable to step outside of his own Mephisto.—But as the jailer in Fidelio he appeared at his best; few better impersonations have we ever seen or heard upon our lyric stage. Fidelio was the opera of course; the house fuller than at other times, and with the best listeners. Imperfect as it was in some respects, the orchestra especially, it made a more profound impression than ever. Mme. JOHANNSEN was admirable; so was HIMMER, so far as power of voice allowed,—in art, in feeling, nothing wanting. The whole thing was vastly improved by Mme. ROTTER's charming Marcellina; and HABELMANN was still the picturesque and musical Jacquinot. There were tears in some eyes there that night, and it will be a memorable one to many.

When the Company return, we trust to have FREDERICI back, and to have not only Fidelio again, but also William Tell and Mozart's Figaro and Seraglio,—and why not Cherubini's Wasserträger?

CONCERTS COMING. The fourth SYMPHONY CONCERT, Thursday afternoon, March 1, when Schumann will be the central figure, represented in his C-major Symphony (necessarily substituted for the one before announced in D-minor), and his "Genevieve" overture, both new to our public. Mr. HUGO LEONHARD will be the pianist and play Beethoven's Concerto in G. There will also be Cherubini's overture to the "Wasserträger"; and the chorus of male voices will take part again, singing three noble choruses from the "Antigone" music (including the "Bacchus" chorus again), and the Dervish chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (described on another page), followed by the Turkish March from the same. Certainly a unique selection.

The last MENDELSSOHN QUARTETTE Concert comes March 6th, with Mr. LANG as pianist.

CINCINNATI. Some of the leading friends of music in this city seem to have hit upon the right principle on which to found a permanent provision for concerts of the highest order—the same principle, essentially, on which the Harvard Musical Association of Boston are working in their so far successful experiment of "Symphony Concerts," namely: that of organizing the audience for the best kind of music.—Speaking of the last concert of the Harmonic Society, Jan. 30th, at Mozart Hall, the Cincinnati Commercial states:

Before the commencement of the concert of this Society, its President, Mr. L. C. Hopkins, stepped forward and announced that the design was to make the Society permanent. He hoped that the citizens of Cincinnati who desired to see music flourish here would come forward at once and become associate members. In the event of one thousand members being added, at five dollars each, he assured the audience that the Society would have a base upon which it could build up a reputation that, in a few years, would give to Cincinnati a splendid musical hall, with a fine organ, such as the wants of the musical taste of Cincinnati called for and would have.

Mr. Hopkins's announcement and remarks received an approval from the audience such as, we feel assured, contained more than mere courtesy called forth, and we hope to see, on Monday evening next, which was announced for the next rehearsal of the Society, at the Wesleyan Female College Chapel, a substantial manifestation of the public spirit we know to exist in our midst, and which only lacks the fitting opportunity to develop.

The concert last evening was attended by an audience composed almost exclusively of ladies and gentlemen known for culture and good taste in every thing pertaining to art, and was, besides, one of the largest that has attended any concert this season; but, like all such audiences, was rather chary of its applause, because judicious in judgment.

The programme consisted, in the first part, of copious selections from Handel's Messiah; in the second part, of the fine Kyrie (a capella) by Robert Franz; a Quartet from Gounod's Faust (violin, 'cello, piano and cabinet organ); and Mendelssohn's Cantata: "Hear my Prayer." The writer above quoted praises particularly the singing of the chorus: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," and of the Franz Kyrie, and the soprano airs as sung by Mrs. Dexter, and concludes his notice by alluding to the clever manner "in which the President checked the vulgar habit some people had of leaving the audience before the entertainment is concluded. Before the cantata was rendered, he came forward and announced that those who wished to leave the house before the entertainment was concluded, had then an opportunity to do so. No one stirred, and that magnificent composition was given with splendid effect."

OXFORD, O. We have before us the programme of a concert of choice music last week at the Oxford Female College, under the direction of the earnest music-teacher of that institution. Five years ago, nothing better than "negro minstrelsy" found audience in that region. Now, we understand, they can count with certainty upon quite a numerous and appreciative assemblage in response to a modest invitation like this:

A few friends, lovers of classic music, are expected to meet in the Parlor of the Oxford Female College, on Thursday evening, February 8, at 7 o'clock precisely, when the following will be the programme:

1. Essay on Beethoven. Prof. D. Swing, of Miami University.
2. Sixth Symphony (Pastoral) Op. 68. L. v. Beethoven. Performed by Miss Annie Collins and Karl Mers.
3. Adelaide—Song. L. v. Beethoven. Sung by Miss Mary T. Hall.
4. Seventh Grand Symphony Op. 92. L. v. Beethoven. Performed by Miss Annie Morris and Karl Mers.

The entertainment is given for the benefit of these pupils, as an encouragement and reward for diligence in the study of Classic Music. Your company is respectfully solicited.

KARL MERS,
Music Teacher at the Oxford Female College.

ST. LOUIS. The third concert for the season (thirty-seventh since the beginning) of the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Herr SOBOLLEWSKI, occurred on the 4th of January. The first part was mainly occupied by one of the four parts of Haydn's "Seasons," namely the Winter, preceded by the Stradella overture of Flotow, and followed by a Violin Concerto of De Beriot. Part Second opened with Felicien David's Symphony-Ode, "The Desert" (first part)—in strange contrast with the fresh and genial Haydn! Then followed: "Casta Diva;" "Leonora" overture, No. 4, Beethoven; and a Quartet and Chorus from "William Tell."

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y. The third "Society Classical," at Cottage Hall Seminary, Dec. 21st, showed a high aim in many of the selections, which were as follows:

1. Overture. Hebrides—Piano. Mendelssohn. The Misses Duncan, H. Tompkins, North and Barculo.
2. Chorus. Hope. Rossini. The Senior Singing Class. (String accompaniment arranged by Mr. Apelles.)
3. Grand Quartet. Opus 47. Schumann. a. Allegro, ma non troppo; b. Scherzo; c. Andante Cantabile; d. Finale Vivace. Piano—The Misses Paige and Villet. Strings—Messrs. Apelles, Pralow and Meiswinker.
4. Song—Frühlingsschönen. Kalliwoda. Miss Paige. (With Violin obligato, by Mr. Apelles.)
5. Terzetto. Chorus. La Vivandiere. Gabuzzi. The Junior Singing Class.
6. Sehnsucht. Dno. Piano. Jungmann. The Misses Burgess and Williamson.
7. Bolero, from the Crown Diamonds. Auber. The Misses Paige and Davies.
8. Grand Quatuor. C. M. Von Weber. a. Allegro; b. Adagio ma non troppo; c. Menuetto Allegro; d. Finale presto. Piano—The Misses Arnold, Chamberlin and L. Phelps. String—Messrs. Apelles, Pralow and Meiswinker.
9. Trio a Canone. Esopiro. Concone. The Misses Davies, Stillman and Keep.

A BOSTON ORGANIST IN BERLIN. We translate the following from a Berlin paper,—the only reasonable sounding report among the many which have found currency here. (If we had really sent a future Bach or Beethoven over to Germany to study and develop his genius, we should probably hear nothing of him for some time to come).

"Herr EUG. THAYER, organist from Boston (North America), gave a concert before an invited circle of listeners in the Parochial Kirche, and played with good delivery and sure technique the well-known Pastorale (F major), the Choral Vorspiel: "Ich ruf zu Dir," and the F-major Toccata, of Seb. Bach; an Organ Concerto (B-flat major) by Handel; a Sonata in D minor of his own composition; and the Chromatic Fantasia (A minor) by L. Thiele. Herr Thayer counts among a succession of noteworthy, assiduous organ virtuosos, who, drawn hither by the fame of our HAUPT, have acquired their development mostly under his guidance, and now, gladly welcomed in their native land, know how to make the art of organ-playing highly valued there. Already well advanced and achieving something solid as an organ-player, the concert-giver does not seem to us to take an equal rank in composition. The Sonata which he produced neither breathed a churchlike spirit, nor could one give it credit for any particularly interesting ("ansprechend") quality; but themes essentially commonplace, with a partly far-fetched manner of registration, alternated with often uncouth contrasts in modulation, without achieving any particular effect. We remember to have heard like sounding works by English and Swiss organ composers, perhaps because such a direction of taste is subscribed to in those countries. In Germany, BACH is the standard, and well for him who makes him his model! May Herr Thayer, putting in the background his desire to achieve something important also in the field of composition, become for his home a representative of Bach! That he can, with continued studies and with such clever talent, successfully aspire to that, stands within reasonable expectation after what we have heard him do."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Adamastor, Monarch of the pathless deep. (Adamastor, rè del onde profonde). "L'Africaine." 40
The song of Nelusko, in the scene on board ship. Full of fire and strength.

The two grenadiers. (Die Grenadiere). Song. Reissiger. 40

The poem is one of Heine's strange productions. Two of Napoleon's soldiers, returning to France, hear of the capture of the Emperor. One declares that he can live no longer, and requests to be buried in the soil of his native land; declaring, that if his Emperor, at a future time, should ride over his grave, he will rise from the dead, and fight for him as of old.

Flag of Columbia. Song & Cho. W. A. Powell. 30
Very spirited and patriotic.

Hail, blessed Mary. (Jungfrau Maria). "Stradella." 40
A prayer or salutation from the above named opera. Fine music.

Get out of Mexico. S'ng & Cho. J. P. Webster. 35
A song of the times, to be sung while it is fresh.

Daughter of Kings. (Figlia dei re). "L'Africaine." 60
Another of the impassioned songs of the fiery Nelusko. It is found in the prison scene, where Selika interferes to save the life of Vasco, who is about to be slain by his slave.

Blessed be the Lord. Quartet. L. H. Southard. 40
One more of an excellent series.

Instrumental.

Adieu. Andante pour piano. L. Dussek. 60
Altogether a charming piece, in easy flowing style, and capable of much expression.

Tenting on the old camp ground. With brilliant variations. By C. Grobe, Op. 1580. 60

"L'Africaine." Beyer's "Repertoire." 40
Contains a few of the favorite airs of the new opera, well arranged in "Repertoire" style.

Polonaise. E flat major, Op. 22. Chopin. 1.50
It is difficult to describe such elaborate pieces, but lovers of the great composer only need the announcement of the appearance of one of his pieces to "come, see, and" play it.

Sparkling Diamonds. C. Arini. 30
Il Bacis waltz, simplified. 30
Chant du Berger. 30
Bonnie Blue Flag. 30
Three little pieces with charming melodies, and fitted for those, (and great is their number), who cannot play difficult music.

Duncan Galop. W. Nunns. 30

Butterfly Schottische. J. Liberti. 30

Crispino Galop. J. S. Knight. 40

Crispino Waltz. " " 40

Mr. Knight has a fine talent of discovering the brilliant and "dance-able" qualities of new opera music. The above are well selected and well arranged, and it is hard to see why such pieces should not stand in the same rank with Labitzky and Strauss music.

Prince Imperial Galop. Coote. 30
Very bright and easy.

"L'Africaine." Boquet of Melodies. Beyer. 60
A number of the striking melodies, arranged in a different way from those in the "Repertoire."

Schumann's Four Symphonies.

[We translate the following passages from WASIELEWSKI's "Biography of ROBERT SCHUMANN," partly with reference to the Symphony Concert of this week.]

With the year 1841 Schumann (then in his thirty-first year) entered a new phase of development as a creative musician; he returned to instrumental music, but in a different sense from that in which he had left it. That is to say: hitherto, with the exception of a few works belonging to the Sonata form, he betrays always in a marked manner an effort to shape himself anew in respect to form; but now, in taking hold of the symphonic element, his decided and enduring adhesion to the great traditional forms of instrumental music is equally remarkable. This re-action is quite explainable; such an earnestly striving mind as Schumann could not have been satisfied with such successes as he had thus far had in the domain of instrumental music, measured by the exertions they had cost him. Already in the year 1839 he writes to H. Dorn: "... and then there remain only Symphonies for me to publish and make heard. I often feel that I would like to crush the piano-forte; it grows too confined for my thoughts. Now it is true I have as yet but little practice in orchestral composition; still I think that I shall master it."

But it is not alone in his dissatisfaction with the results attained in the path which he had formerly struck into, that we are to seek the explanation of his sudden conversion to the conventional forms. Schumann had recognized the fact, that, in order to be able to create with freedom, one must first acquire a mastery of form. In this connection he writes, later, to L. Meinardus: "If one would create in free forms, one must first be master of the strict forms which hold good for all times." And here we might perceive the influence of Mendelssohn,—perhaps this master's only influence upon Schumann; for that kindred elements in both come now and then to light, is to be taken only as a consequence of their being contemporary;—the same phenomenon may be remarked more or less in all the other creative minds who lived at the same time. Essentially Mendelssohn was and always remained Mendelssohn-ish, and Schumann Schumann-ish.

It was natural that an artist nature like Mendelssohn's should be imposing to Schumann and should stimulate him to emulation; for precisely that, which was partly wanting to himself, that with which he had incessantly wrestled for nine long years, he found as the leading characteristic in Mendelssohn in the fullest measure: formal perfection. Very naturally, therefore, Schumann, contrary to his original view, sought at last to acquire a mastery of the formal part of musical creation in the same way in which Mendelssohn, like all the other masters of the art, had found it, namely by adhering to the masterworks of the past. How surprisingly he at once succeeded in this, is proved by the first artistic deed he undertook in this sense; it was the B-flat Symphony, Op. 38. (Performed for the first time, together with Op. 52, at a concert of Clara Schumann, at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, on the 6th of December, 1841). With this begins in Schumann's career as a composer a series of instrumental works of various kinds, which in their masterly keeping for the most part belong unquestionably to the most valuable and satisfactory compositions which he has written. After the B-flat Symphony there followed, of similar compositions, in the course of the year 1841, the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," in E major (Op. 52); furthermore the Symphony in D minor, which was completed so far as the instrumentation was concerned in the latter part of 1851 and published as Op. 120—here again we see the dominant persistency in a definite artistic activity—and finally the sketch for a Symphony in C minor, which however is left unfinished. Schumann wanted at a later period to work it out, but he could not, as he expressed it, find himself at home any longer in the sketch. . . .

While planting himself upon the study of the masterworks in this kind, especially those of Beethoven, Schumann has conceived and treated the Symphonic form in his own spirit. Accordingly the tenor of these works of his is thoroughly Schumann-ish; and what lends them a higher artistic worth is the circumstance, that this tenor, this ideal part in them is brought into essential unison with the traditional form. You scarcely notice even those infringements and excrescences, which one so often meets with in the first creative period. Another thing demands an even more unconditional recognition, and that is the surprising dexterity with which Schumann at once handled the orchestral instruments, whose natures could have been but little known to him. To be sure we find single details which betray a want of the most accurate acquaintance with the technique, of the wind instruments especially; but these unevennesses vanish in the whole, and one cannot complain here about too difficult or desperate tasks for the executant. The tone-color produced by Schumann's instrumentation is not everywhere entirely beautiful; he did not in the same degree, possess that primary feeling for euphony which forms a specific peculiarity with the greatest masters of the past, and which in Mozart, for example, compels the greatest admiration. Yet it shows itself continually characteristic. You feel, that in this regard the effect that was intended is always reached.

By the symphonic works just mentioned, as well as by those which belong to a later period, Schumann solved the problem, which he himself did not for a long time believe possible, of creating something individual and significant in an Art-form already fully developed to the highest point. How wavering he was in his views about it, is shown among other things by his remark, repeated at a later period, that there was nothing left one to do in the Sonata and the Overture forms. Nevertheless he wrote two Sonatas and several Overtures in the last years of his life.

[Passing over now what Wasielewski says of the important compositions in other kinds which next occupied Schumann, (three Quartets, piano Quintet, "Paradise and the Peri," &c.) we come to the year 1845. In the mean time he had removed from Leipzig to Dresden, and during this time his chronic tendency to disease of the brain had grown upon him painfully.]

It is not clear when Schumann turned his energies anew to musical labors in Dresden. His list of compositions contains merely the following notices:

"1845 (Dresden). Many contrapuntal works. —Four Fugues for the piano-forte (Op. 72).—Studies for the Pedal Piano, 1st set (Op. 56).—6 Fugues on the name B, A, C, H, for Organ (Op. 60).—Sketches for the Pedal Piano (Op. 58).—Intermezzo and Rondo, Finale as conclusion to my Fantasia for piano—appeared as Concerto (Op. 54).—Symphony for Orchestra, in C major, sketched."

Here again we see the persistency in one-sided artistic creation; but in this case, as the majority of the works just named belong to the strict style, it is quite obvious that Schumann was striving after a freer mastery of form than he had yet been able to command. It was as it were the preparation for the greater creative onsets which he was presently to undertake.

Finally, the C-major Symphony, Op. 61, in its origin the third, completed in the year 1846, may be regarded as a happy continuation and advance upon the symphonic labors undertaken in 1841.

It is riper, manlier, more vigorous, more deeply combined than those were, and especially by far more orchestral in its whole keeping as well as in detail. The introduction to the first movement, "Sostenuto assai," was originally designed for something else, and already composed when Schumann conceived the plan of writing this Symphony. (Its first public performance occurred in a Gewandhaus Concert, Nov. 5, 1846). According to Schumann's own statement, the conception of this Symphony falls within the first period of his sickness. He says: "I sketched it while I was yet suffering very much physically; indeed I may say, it was the resistance of the spirit that here plainly influenced me, and through which I sought to fight down my morbid condition. The first movement is full of this conflict and in its character very moody and refractory."

The Symphony in E-flat major, Op. 97, in five movements, was sketched and instrumented between Nov. 2 and Dec. 9 of the year 1850. It passes for the third Symphony, though in the order of origin it is the fourth. It may be called, in the most peculiar sense of the word, the "Rhine" Symphony; for Schumann, according to his own statements, received the first impulse to it on beholding the Cologne Cathedral; and in part also the solemnities, which occurred at that time, of the elevation of the Archbishop of Cologne, von Geissel, to the rank of Cardinal, had their influence upon the work while it was in progress. To this latter circumstance the Symphony owes directly the insertion of a fifth movement, which is not customary in point of form, namely the fourth in the order of succession, originally superscribed: "In the character of an accompaniment to a solemn ceremony." On the publication of the work Schumann erased this superscription, which he had put on for the sake of easier understanding; he said: One must not show the people his heart; a more general impression of a work of Art is better for them; then at least they will make no false comparisons." In regard to the character of the other movements he added: "Popular elements had to be prominent, and I believe I have succeeded," which applies at least to two of the movements (the second and the fifth), so plain and (in a good sense, so far as the thing was possible for Schumann) popular is their style.

For the rest, the E-flat Symphony as a tone-creation stands on the whole in the same rank with the other orchestral works of Schumann, and there is no reason for putting it at all in the background, unless we take for a criterion the observation that with all masters, even the greatest, one work is always finer than another, which after all, is adducing nothing decisive against the artistic importance of the product of the mind in question. The real question is, whether it is a real work of Art, and if this question, as in the present case, must be answered in the affirmative, we know enough. Thus the E-flat Symphony, considered by itself, shows: richness of invention, originality, freshness of feeling, truth of expression, felicitous combination, and above all masterly handling of the material,—qualities, in one word, which make its artistic worth indubitable.

The Symphony in D-minor, already composed in the year 1841, but laid aside, and only worked out and completed in respect to instrumentation near the end of 1851, and then published as the fourth (op. 120), was really in its origin the second. It shares all the excellences of the best works which fall within the middle creative period of Schumann. Indeed, it almost seems as if, in power, compactness, clearness of conception, it held a very conspicuous place among all the master's greater works. It consists of four movements, organized after the model of the master-works in this kind, but passing immediately into one another; to which arrangement Schumann was perhaps induced through the short, uncarried-out Romanza (in the usual place of the slow movement), if not by his striving after a greater rounding off of form. The instrumental alterations, by which Schumann improved his manuscript, relate merely to the wind instruments. The stringed quartet was retained as originally written. Moreover one instrument, which was to have played a part according to the first draught of the Romanza, the guitar, was left out, because Schumann thought that its effect, as compared with the usual orchestral instruments, might be a doubtful one.

The second movement, Allegretto, appears as a kind of intruder between the first and the last movement. Pretty as this Minuet is, it bears no affinity to the general character of the Sonata.

It is impossible to follow the illusion, or better, the poetical idea, with this piece in your way. Strange, that Prof. Marx, with his deep knowledge and apprehension of Beethoven should not see this, but attempt to establish an inner connection between this intermezzo and the other movements. In passing from his beautiful description of the Adagio over to the Minuet he says: "That was the song of resignation. Now follows the separation (Allegretto). 'Oh, remember me!'—'I remember thee! Farewell! farewell!' abruptly thrown out, but steeped in tears unto the last 'forever!' What images of blissful moments, now passed! what shadows of a dark future then flit across the soul of the resigned, in the Trio,—who can interpret it?" Elterlein calls this Allegretto a make-up piece, a true hors d'œuvre, and supposes that some one else put it in. This is going a little too far, but we may derive a hint from the fact that Beethoven, according to Schindler, in later years seriously entertained the idea of expelling from several of his Sonatas the Minuets or Scherzos altogether, in order, as he said, to attain greater unity. Besides, most of the Sonatas composed after the C-sharp minor,—and they belong to the best—contain no Scherzo. We are, therefore, bold enough—with all due reverence for the genius of the incomparable tone-poet—to propose to skip the Allegretto, and, after the last sounds of the Adagio have died away, immediately attack the closing Presto agitato.

This movement forms an admirable counterpart to the Adagio, and it seems, indeed, as though both had been composed one after the other, and the Allegretto been put in finally between them. The same idea, the same picture, may be traced in both, steadily developed. While the first movement depicts the sorrows of a mind resigned to an awful fate, the finale suggests the determination to rise and bravely fight the battle.

"I will seize Fate by the throat; surely, it shall not prostrate me entirely," writes the author in a letter dated November 16th, 1801, when the dreadful fact had to be acknowledged, that the demon of deafness was digging deeper and deeper into his ear, bent upon totally destroying that organ so necessary for the musician. "I will seize Fate by the throat,"—this is the best motto for the illustration of the present movement. How suggestive of this iron resolution not to submit, but rather fight furies and demons, are those two mighty strokes, which every time finish the first motive, as with terrible velocity it rushes from below up to its climax (measures 1 and 2, and so forth)! But alas! though we have the power and determination to defy a persecuting fate, who can help deploring the inexorable necessity? This is indicated by the second subject, beginning with the 21st measure. But, the regret soon assumes a kind of playful humor, an attempt to smile through tears (m. 25); however, the determination to battle on soon prevails; stroke after stroke falls, giving evidence of a terrible earnestness. Suddenly, a strange chord, powerfully struck, appears, as if to say: stop (m. 33)! and a stream of notes comes nimbly running out, ending with a merry trill. Another: stop! and the same stream of sounds, but this time in a lower region, in order to run up all the higher, striking and flashing about, till the tumult comes to a close by the appearance of a third motive (m. 43). This figure is remarkable for its unsteadiness; it runs irresolutely to and fro; it questions and replies; one is reminded of the sport and laughter of fiends, as they chase each other through their infernal haunts. A fourth motive of a somewhat proud, dignified character enters (m. 57, 58, 59), but soon breaks off, leaving the accompanying figure of sixteenths—which originated in the beginning with the principal motive—alone to close, the first part. However, there is no actual close since the figure, without pausing, connects, the first time with the commencement of the movement, the second time with the second part. The repeat of the first part, with reference to the progressive idea of the work, is as improper and out of place here, as was the Allegretto above, as before mentioned. Every sensible musician must feel this. Accordingly, we go right on.

Of the many beauties in the second part we will only mention the organ point, or pedal bass, which for grace and symmetry is unsurpassed (from m. 23 to 37 incl. in the 2d part). One is reminded of a lull in the gigantic struggle; of a mind weary and exhausted, having succeeded, for once, in escaping from the dark shadows that surround it, enjoying a moment's repose, rocked and cradled by the remembrance of former, happier days; or of Faust, in the scene where Mephistopheles holds the weary, life-tired man under the spell of a magic sleep, and shows him the image of the fair Margaret. After the last chord of this charming interlude has expired, the third part begins, and the struggle is renewed.

Finally, we will call attention to the brilliant coda, beginning with the 41st measure before the close. Observe how (m. 37 and 36) the masses of sound are piled one upon the other in rapid succession, until a fermata puts a stop to the flood! The same process is repeated immediately after. A still more powerful climax we find in the quasi cadenza, commencing with the 24th measure; a true manifestation of rage and fury; one torrent of notes following another, the sounds flying about in wild haste, until calmed by a fermata on the minor ninth. The trill crowning this fermata ends in a short, but expressive cadenza, which grows quickly both slower and lower, till it becomes congealed to Adagio with the key-note, C-sharp, for its close. This note, from here to the end of the movement, steadily maintains its ground in the bass, and at last joins the right hand in the dashing chord-passage which fitly closes the whole work.

On the 29th of March next, it will be 39 years since the remains of the restless, hard-trying composer found eternal peace in one of the cemeteries near Vienna. A year after the burial, on the same day, a plain monument was erected over the grave, with the simple inscription: BEETHOVEN, while a funeral choir sang:

"Du, dem nie im Leben
Ruhstätt ward und Heerd und Haus
Nun nun im stillen
Grabe, nun im Tode aus!"

"Thou to whom was granted
Neither rest, nor home, nor hearth,
Rest now in thy quiet
Grave beneath the tranquil earth!"

Since that time the fame and appreciation of the great tone-poet have increased to an extent almost without a precedent in the annals of music and literature. It is said that in his native country more of Beethoven's music is sold than of all the rest of the composers, great and small, together; while other countries apparently strive not to remain far behind Germany. And so it should be and must necessarily be. Much of it will doubtless be forgotten as time rolls on, but pieces like the present Sonata, and its great rival in F-minor (op. 57), will continue to charm coming generations. Not that the musical world cannot afford to let such compositions die, but the works themselves, by their innate power and vitality, will demand to live. It is the spirit that liveth. Our Sonata, to which these lines are devoted, is eminently a spiritual composition. There is nothing about it which in the least tickles the senses; but plain and grand, with just so much of body as is necessary for its expression, this music affects us like the eternal voices of nature, a mere combination of sounds to the thick-eared and hard-hearted, but full of deep meaning to the tender, susceptible, poetic mind.

Italian Language.

[MR. DWIGHT.—The following suggestions formed part of an article written some years ago in Italy for one of our magazines, and intended for the use of travellers and sojourners in that country. By mischance it met with an untimely fate, being swamped in the waves of the Atlantic. I have done the best with my memory to fish up that portion of it devoted to the language, thinking it might possibly be of service to those of our musical public who devote themselves to Italian vocal music—not many I fear, in spite of the general verdict in Europe in favor of Italian as the language best suited for musical expression.—F. S.]

The usual outfit for an Italian campaign, with those desirous of acquiring the language, consists of a dictionary and grammar, the Divina Commedia, and Manzoni's Promessi Sposi. These are studied as we study Greek and Latin at school. At the first resting place a master is procured, who must, as a sine qua non, be a proficient in English. He, good easy man, falls quietly into the route marked out for him. His successors in the other towns do the same. Venice, Florence, Rome, Naples, are successively visited. The little library is diligently thumbed by night and by day. The doctor pockets his fees; but the patient is incapable of moving his legs. Day by day he is borne about by couriers, valets de place, et id genus omne. They order his meals, his movements, his whole day. He acts but at their beck. At the shop, the theatre, the church, the gallery, their dark shadow is brooding over him. They deplete him vigorously—directly for themselves, vicariously for the legion to whose lion they play the jackal. He loses daily. He thinks with regret of his home. There, at least, he was a man, totus, teres atque rotundus. Here he is Sindbad, with the old man of the sea upon his shoulders; Prometheus, with the vulture at his maw. He is incapable of a word in self-defence. He calls on Dante, but he heeds him not; Manzoni, but he is deaf to his entreaties; and the end of all the bright hopes with which he entered Italy is that he is put on board a steamer at Naples, and booked, like a bale of goods, for Marseilles.

The course of study referred to above is well enough when the student is desirous of making himself acquainted with the Italian language, as well written as spoken; and is indispensable to the laborer in the fields of Italian literature. With either object in view, the works of the great Tuscan who was the first to write in the living tongue, and the pure classical language of Manzoni's romance, (which though a very dull book, must be allowed to bear the palm in modern Italian literature) are to be treasured. But sound them to their utmost depth; be able to understand every line, and to render it into the choicest vernacular—if this is all, you are not better fitted than before to order a beefsteak, or engage lodgings, or hold your own among the throng of harpies that will be let loose upon you when you first set foot in an Italian seaport. A foreigner, whose knowledge of English is confined to Chaucer and Sir Thomas Browne, would find similar difficulty in a crowd of New York hackney-coachmen at the battery, or in the coffee-room of a London hotel.

The problem for the traveller in a foreign country to solve is this: How am I in the shortest possible time to render myself independent of others' aid in making known my wants and in understanding what is said to me? The solution I offer, after some experience and observation, is the following:

Be content to be superficial till you have time to be profound.

Procure an Ollendorf's grammar and go through it as quickly as you can; if in company with one or more friends, so much the better.

Learn by heart a vocabulary and phrase-book.

Read books of the most simple, colloquial style; such for instance, as the translation of The Arabian Nights, published at Naples.

At the same time engage, as teacher, a native. If he does not know English, all the better. The advantage you lose by leaving some things unexplained for a time, will be much more than counterbalanced by the necessity of making each other's meaning intelligible in the master's language. It is not sufficient for him to engage never to recur to his knowledge of English. The temptation is too great; and, what is more, our race, though not wanting in boldness in other respects, are the veriest cowards in the face of ridicule, and will never fight well in a foreign language until fairly cornered.

Loss no time with your teacher in translating into English, for you can do that as well by yourself.

Read his language by alternate paragraphs with him, for the benefit of his accent; observing very minutely the pronunciation of every syllable, and try your best to imitate him.

Take care to remind him, from time to time, of the necessity of correcting you; for, whatever his politeness may lead him to say (and an Italian's, especially a Florentine's, will lead him a great way) the instances of persons speaking a foreign language with a perfect accent are exceedingly rare, and only exist at all among those in whom the favorable circumstances combine of a beginning during childhood, a long foreign residence, and more than all a gift of the powers of observation and imitation.

A portion of the hour should be devoted to conversation, in which you should take the lion's share; relating your experiences, giving an epitome of what you may have read, rehearsing your old stock of Joe Millers, &c. The rest may be usefully employed in translating from some simple book in English or other language. If the master is ignorant of the language, it is for you to make the meaning clear to him; and the task is a very useful one. In the same manner, prepare in writing, between the lessons, some translations from the same volume, for inspection and correction.

I do not pretend to offer these suggestions as being very original. They commend themselves to common sense, and doubtless have been practised on. Yet it is fair to conclude that there must exist some great defect in the mode usually adopted for acquiring the power of speaking Italian, when it is so very rare to find any one, even among those who have devoted themselves most conscientiously to the task, who pronounces correctly the simplest vocalic sounds. Why teachers do not address themselves at once, from the beginning, to the vices that pervade notoriously all English Italian, I can only suggest an explanation for by supposing that they consider a certain amount of foreign accent a stern necessity, and do not distinguish between those defects which are all but insuperable by our organs, and those which require only philosophy and attention to master.

When one of English race, past the age of childhood, is called on to articulate an entirely new sound, such as the French u or the German gutturals, there is an excuse for want of success; and we should extend the same to foreigners who fail in mastering our th. But, when required to articulate sounds with which we are familiar in our language, though under different circumstances and in new positions, we have not this excuse; and the fault lies either with the master who does not apply himself assiduously to the correction of errors attributable to no natural defect of the organs, or, if he have done his duty, there must be gross negligence on the part of the pupil. But let who must shoulder the blame, the fact remains that, of all mere travellers in Italy whose vernacular is English, few pronounce a polysyllable without committing errors, which, me judice, are capable of being corrected by a lecture of five minutes' duration.

The leading difference between the pronunciation of the English and Italian, as well as all languages derived from the Latin, lies in this, that while we slur over the vowels of the unaccented syllables, the others allow the vowels always their full individual sound. There is some analogy to the English system of pronunciation in the German, where e unaccented is given the go-by, and i often gives little trouble to the organs of speech by allowing itself the short sound of the English i in pin. The name of Schiller, for instance, is pronounced by his countrymen much the same as by ourselves, while the Italians call him Sheellair. It is this approach to the abandon, the laissez aller of English pronunciation that makes the German, in spite of its many great difficulties, more easy to be attained in perfection by an English tongue than the Italian, French or Spanish.

But, to confine ourselves to the first, the English student cannot too early and too strongly impress it upon his mind, that there is, in Italian, no approach whatever to this English fashion of slurring the vowels. The whole genius of its pronunciation is diametrically opposite. We generally slur the vowels excepting in accented syllables,—the Italians give them their value without reference to accent. Let us descend a little to particulars, and examine what this value is.

The sound of a is broad as in father, unless followed by two or more consonants, or a final consonant, when it has the sound sometimes given in New England to man, and which "The Autocrat" has remarked as in satisfaction; as panno, dal. Our short sound of a in fat does not exist in Italian; and the slurred sound we give it, when unaccented, as in metal, Isabella, resembling a in tub, is equally foreign to Italian organs.

Here the English tyro may as well stop in limine, and make up his mind to a complete innovation in his habits of pronunciation. In the sound of broad a no difficulty can exist, as it is one of the first he ever uttered; he is only not accustomed to the sound in any but accented syllables. He will probably pronounce the a in Milano and Napoli correctly (unless he should be wrecked on the Scylla of the short sound of a in fat) because it is accented; but it will be a miracle indeed if Charybdis allows him to be equally successful in Messina and Palermo. An Italian, not used to this treatment of vowels, does not see the reason for so different a pronunciation of the same letter. The reason is plain to us, but it ceases to be an excuse when the rule has been pointed out. Although the broad sound of a unaccented is unusual in English, it does sometimes occur, and the student may find analogy to Italian pronunciation in the words, Sartorius, crowbar, and grandfather. Let him give the Italian broad a always at least as much of its true sound as he vouchsafes to its English sister in these words (omitting of course the roll of the r when it does not follow the vowel) and he will find, to give an example, a wide difference between our Ravenna and the Italians'. He does not say Sarto- torius, nor crowbur, nor (if he pronounces correctly) grandfather. Why should he say Ruvvenn?

The most usual sound of E is like the English a in fate. As we have noticed above, this sound in English is usually slurred, when in an unaccented syllable, into the short sound of u; therefore, take care to preserve the pure sound in povero, venerabile, &c. This is more difficult in the final e, unaccented, because more unusual in English. But it is a difficulty that requires only attention to master. It is a leading vice in English Italian, the giving to the final e the sound of final y in English. Thus, tutte queste cose becomes tooty queesty coey. An aid to the proper pronunciation of these final syllables may be found in the words, popinjay, castaway, birthday, in which the alphabetic sound of a is preserved, though unaccented.

Before two or more consonants, or a final consonant, e has the sound of our e in met; as cento, del, per. It must preserve the same sound before r, though it is a very common error to give it the sound of the English a in pare, which in fact is the combination of two vocalic sounds; thus, pa-ur. The Italian er is simply the sound of e in met, followed by the roll of the r. There is another sound of e which may be called the open sound, as the first-mentioned is the shut sound and the second a mean between the two. This occurs frequently at the end of words, and then it usually has the grave accent, the only one used in Italian; as à, mercè, also the numeral tre, universally tray in an English mouth. The sound approximates to the English a in fat.

I has the sound of our double e, subject only to a slight modification when followed by two consonants or a final consonant. This sound may be considered the pons asinorum of Italian pronunciation for the Anglo-Saxon student. Let him once get thoroughly impressed with the truth that i is always pronounced like our ee, and act up to it, and he will then have reached a point whence he can contemplate with calm complacency the great herd of travellers below, who,—in spite of their conscientious labors; their hours of reading, writing, and talking; their dictionaries and grammars; their Dantes and Manzonis—have never yet learned the plain, simple fact that the sound of i in pin does not exist in Italian. Every teacher of Italian ought to put this in golden letters on the walls of his room. He should imitate Mr. Wiseman in Evenings at Home, and write:—What man has done, man may (not) do: and, whilst he admits the right of his pupils to pronounce the vowels in English in the manner required by that language, he should impress on them daily that they have no right to introduce foreign sounds into Italian.

As I said before, the sound of i in Italian is like ee in English, and it keeps this sound, whether at the beginning, in the middle, or at the end of a word. It is always ee, ee, ee.* And yet how many English tongues pronounce it so? Who does not answer, when asked what he is reading in Italian, "the Promessy Spousy of Manzony?" Who does not visit the galleries of the Uffizy and the Pitty? Who does not bank with Fenzy? Who does not receive his scudfy from Mr. H. at Rome? As I said of the pronunciation of a, the difficulty cannot exist in the sound itself, for we have it in our own language. It is only that we are not accustomed to it in unaccented syllables. We make this sound in demon and deviate, but should find it awkward to pronounce defend and delight with a long e. We do not grudge the sound in carina, spari, because the stress is on the i; but how many do as much by femmina and Napoli? Yet the latter, to an Italian ear, have equal claim with the former. Rossini is probably at a loss to know why he always loses one of his i's with the English, and Donizetti both of his. The reason I think I have made clear enough, but I am not so sanguine as to believe they will ever be called anything but Rosseony and Donnyzetty. Neither is it of importance that they should, when spoken of in English. It would savor of pedantry to give foreign proper names their true pronunciation when talking our own language. They serve, however, a very good purpose as examples.

This vicious pronunciation of the i is most apparent in the terminations of words, and as many Italian names end in i, and a great majority of proper names, it is probably a fault made more frequently than any other. We are not without examples in English of this sound of final ee, when unaccented: e. g., pedigree, azletrie. There is a proper name too, Deebee. No one pronounces the last syllable like the last in baby; and yet though all Italian names ending in i (and they are legion) have an equal right to this sound of ee, from English tongues they get only that of English final y. Those of the English race whose names end in y, such as Spooney, Merry, &c., must have been used, from the first day they set foot in Italy, to hear themselves called Spoonee, Merree by the various hotel keepers, valets, &c.; and, as we have a proverbial right to be taught by our enemies, these gentlemen have less excuse for not imitating this sound, and, gathering good Italian from bad English, addressing their hosts in return as Signoree Laddree, Noiiosee, &c.

O has several sounds, running from the shut o, which has almost the sound of our double o, to the open sound in the English not. This we never have in English, unless when the o is followed by a consonant. Therefore it has a certain difficulty for us in Italian when final or followed by a vowel. Still, we have the sound. Thus, it is easy to pronounce poi correctly by imagining consonants between the vowels. Polly, pronounced without the l's, for instance, comes very near the Italian poi. It is only custom that can guide the foreigner to a correct use of the various sounds of o. But the final ò accented has always the open sound, as furò, andò; and many monosyllables, as cìò, nò. The last is generally pronounced by foreigners like the English no; but its true sound is very different. It is like the sound of not without the t. If you wish to give an emphatic negative, try the two pronunciations on some important, and judge of the comparative weight.

U has the sound of our oo in boot and foot, and is the most constant of the vowels in its pronunciation.

(Conclusion in our next).

Mozart's Funeral.

(Extract from Nohl's Life of Mozart).

When the doctor arrived late at night, he told Süßmayr confidentially that all hope was at an end. Toward's midnight Mozart started up, his eyes fixed; his head then gently sank back, and he seemed to fall asleep; at one o'clock in the morning he was dead.

His death, after following him step by step through life, causes a shock for the moment; but he had so long been prepared for the event, that it forms only a fitting close for his pure and admirable life, and thus should give rise to no depressing feelings. Mozart had finished his course; whether inflammation of the brain, according to one physician, or fever, or water on the chest, according to others, his illness was only the slight impetus given to the stone precipitated from the summit of some lofty tower, which falls by the force of its own weight. The powers of Mozart's life were exhausted, and if this cause had not proved fatal, some other would soon have done so.

Very little information is to be gathered as to subsequent events. Mozart died on the 5th of December, 1791. His faithful servant early the same morning performed the last offices for his dead master. The corpse was clothed in the black dress of the Masonic Brotherhood, and laid on a bier which was placed in his study beside his piano. He, who had so often brought forth living tones from this small instrument, was now still and silent. Constanze, who was very ill and quite broken-hearted, stretched herself on her husband's bed, in the hope of being attacked by the same malady, and dying with him. Baron von Swieten endeavored to console her, and succeeded at last in prevailing on her to leave the house of mourning, to stay with some kind friends. He then took charge of the interment. The circumstances of the widow being so straitened, (the whole inheritance consisting of sixty florins in cash, and the collection of books and music, valued at twenty-three florins, forty-one kreutzers,) Von Swieten strove to regulate the funeral as economically as possible. It never seemed to occur to the rich man, who had so often profited by Mozart's artistic powers, the aristocratic patron, who had reaped so much pleasure from the charming society of the deceased, that it might well have been his privilege to undertake not only the management, but the cost of a funeral for the great artist.

On the afternoon of the following day, the benediction was pronounced over the corpse in the Church of St. Stephen. This ceremony took place in the Chapel of the Cross, where the pulpit of St. Capistrano now stands, (a monument erected to him). It was a rough, stormy December day, with alternate showers of snow and rain, when Mozart's body was carried out of the cathedral. The few friends whose warm enthusiasm for the maestro overcame their dread of the weather, stood round the coffin sheltered by umbrellas. They then followed it along the "Grosse Schulerstrasse." But they too, at the Stuben Gasse, forsook the procession, which proceeded to the churchyard of St. Marx. Thus it occurred that not a single friend among the numbers on whom he had conferred so much enjoyment during his life, now stood beside his grave. His worldly position was neither high nor brilliant, which alone insures worldly honors to the dead. He who had lived so much for others, was not even permitted to possess a grave of his own. Out of economy, a place had been purchased for him in a spot common to many, in which usually from fifteen to twenty coffins were deposited, and regularly exhumed every ten years to make room for others.

His faithful servant, whose best services attended him to the last, was present at the benediction of his master's remains. Von Swieten and Salieri were also there. Süßmayr, the good and true Abt Stadler, Capellmeister Röser, and the violoncellist Orsler, even followed the bier. Schikaneder, Stadler (the clarinet-player), and many others, who during the master's life had contrived to keep up a close intimacy with him, now held themselves aloof, and it was his attached servant alone who thought of asking Constanze whether a cross should not be erected over the grave. Her reply was, that this was sure to be done, concluding that the parish where the benediction took place would also supply a cross. But subsequently, when she recovered, and her first burst of grief being over, she visited the churchyard with her friends, there was a new section there who could not point out the grave! All research was vain, and no efforts have, even to this day, discovered the spot where Mozart lies.

But let us turn our eyes from this picture, which is not that of Mozart to us. His true image is that of light and life, not gloomy visions. He shared the fate of mortality with the most insignificant of mortals,—nay, even less was his: his obsequies were attended by no worldly pomp; not even one sympathizing friend was there, and his last resting-place is unknown. But few share with him the mighty prerogative, that his renown does not depend on such things,—that it has shed its radiance over the wide world, like the light diffused by the blessed sun. Not without just cause do we employ this image,—for light is indeed reflected with singular brightness from his life and from his works. The existence of few men has been so luminous as that of Mozart. He passed through the ranks of the earthborn like a god of light from whose head emanate brilliant rays, everywhere disseminating gladness, light and warmth. Others may have enjoyed a far greater portion of earthly happiness, though his path had its brightness too, but his was a far purer bliss. Even in the first bloom of his youth soaring above all earthly pleasures and pains, he thus early drew near the brighter light.

Constanze did not long suffer from her burden of sorrow and care; for though there were slanderers enough ready to exaggerate the debts of the deceased master into vast proportions, the Emperor himself heard the truth from the widow, and, with a noble sense of justice, granted her at once a small pension. He also interested himself in a concert that Constanze gave at his instigation, and in so generous a manner, that she was enabled at once to pay all her husband's debts, which amounted to 3000 gulden. (about 3000.) Soon afterwards concerts were given in various places, in order apparently to compensate the widow for the neglect shown to the deceased maestro. But her anxieties were not entirely relieved till the year 1809, when she married the Danish councillor Nissen, who undertook the education of her two sons. From this period, too, the memory of her lamented husband (whom all the world had in the mean time learned to revere as one of the greatest musicians) was renovated more vividly in her heart, inspiring a feeling of pride which hitherto in the remembrance of the incapacity of the great man to provide an adequate subsistence for his family had in some degree subsided. She therefore now began to think that it would be well worth while to furnish the particulars of his life for posterity. Nissen industriously collected every reliable information which could contribute to form faithful outlines for a portrait of the maestro, and a glorious likeness emerged from the chaos of false or distorted traditions.

He was a man whose mission in this world seems to have been entirely fulfilled, to whom it was given to link together the godlike with humanity, the mortal with the immortal,—a man whose footprints not all the storms of time can ever efface,—a man who, amid all his lofty aims, esteemed the loftiest of all to be the elevation of humanity.

Music Abroad.

Switzerland.

The Cologne correspondent of the Orchestra (Jan. 30) writes:

Cologne is certainly well situated for a musical correspondent. In a few hours he can run over to Amsterdam, Brussels, Zurich, Berlin, or Leipzig. As every year at this time a musical "Fest," is held at Basle for the benefit of Kapellmeister Ernst Reiter, I determined to miss a quartet Soirée in Cologne, and go to Switzerland, thinking perhaps a few words about the state of music in that country might prove interesting to the readers of the Orchestra. About twenty years ago, Herr Reiter, a German musician, came to Basle as leader of a very small amateur society. By dint of energy and musical knowledge, Reiter began to teach and organize, and at the present day he has got together the best orchestra, the best Männergesangverein existing in Switzerland; in one word such elements as favorably compete with any important German town. Every one who knows the puritanism and bigotry, (on both the Catholic and Protestant sides) as well as the avarice of the people of Basle, must admire the perseverance of a musical missionary like Reiter, who has collected so many hundred neophytes, that he has an imposing list of subscribers to the Philharmonic Society, which he has founded, and which is called the Concertgesellschaft. E. Reiter is not only a great leader, but a first-rate composer. His oratorio "Das neue Paradies," so many times successfully performed in Germany (published with English words by Ewer and Co. in London), and his dramatic opera—Die Fee von Elvershöhe, given with immense success at Wiesbaden last year, are among his best works. At his last concert I heard one of his last productions, a very fine ottello for harp, flute, oboe, clarinet, cornet, fagotto, violoncello and basso, which was highly effective, and very much appreciated. The best orchestral production on this occasion was the Sinfonia Eroica of Beethoven. The finale from the "Loreley" of Mendelssohn was very well rendered by the chorus, but the soprano solo was very indifferently sung by Frau Howitz-Steinan, who also spoiled the fine aria from "Titus," Mozart, Non più di fiori. A theatre is impossible in Basle, and every attempt to establish one has been a failure, the people calling it "a place of corruption and damnation."

After Basle the best music of any importance is to be found in Zurich. For the last two years, F. Hegar, a young man from Basle, pupil of the conservatoire in Leipzig, had succeeded Herr Fichleberger as Musikdirector. Herr Hegar brought new life into the orchestra and chorus, and I believe that if he remains a few years there, he will elevate musical taste to a very high standard. This gentleman is as good a fiddler as he is a capital leader. At a concert given by the Abonnements-Concert Society I had the opportunity of appreciating an overture in A Major by Riets, Kapellmeister at the opera in Dresden, late at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, a very melodious and effective work, by the way; the symphony in D Major by Beethoven; and a Toccata by Bach composed for organ, instrumented for full orchestra by Esser (Kapellmeister at the Opera, Vienna), all very finely executed for ensemble and nuances. However I must confess that the Toccata of Bach is quite spoiled through its transformation into an orchestral shape: it has become heavy, monotonous and confused, the rhythmic form of it not being calculated for stringed instruments. The vocal part of the programme was very well supported by Signor Marchesi, who sang with his usual skill the Polyphemus aria from "Acis and Galatea," Handel, an aria from "Le Nozze di Fi- garo," Mozart, and the Erlkönig, Schubert, meeting with due success. Herr Hegar as a violinist was highly successful in playing the concerto No. 8 of Spohr, which was enthusiastically applauded. The theatre in Zurich is something better than it was a few years ago, but for want of support cannot be regarded as one of the best. A good company costs a large sum now-a-days, and a good orchestra, chorus, and mise en scène as much.

The only town worthy to be mentioned in musical matters in Switzerland, after Basle and Zurich, is Bern; but here the residence of the government and ambassadors, strange enough, has not given the slightest impulse to public taste for the fine arts. The Music in Bern is still very primitive and unimportant. E. Frank, a German Jew, Kapellmeister of the Philharmonic Society is a clever pianist, but a very tame leader. The orchestra under his direction, being formed every time by different musicians from all the small towns around, is quite deficient in ensemble, coloring, and intonation. The theatre is not worth speaking of.

COLOGNE. Returning from his little flight into Switzerland, the correspondent above quoted describes the first Musikabend (Musical Evening) of the Cologne Conservatorium.

The conservatoire here being supported almost entirely by voluntary contributions, the directors give four soirées musicales d'invitation every winter, producing the best pupils of both sexes, for the recreation of the subscribers. Nothing could better prove to the directors of our musical Academy in London how far back we are with our musical institutions at home, than to admit them to one of these Musikabende in Cologne. The programme of the first soirée was as follows: 1. Sonata for piano and violin, Beethoven. 2. Military concerto for the violin, Lipinski. 3. Concerto in G major for the piano, Mendelssohn. 5. Quartetto, Haydn. 5. Sonata for piano and violin, Hauptmann. 6. Andante and musette for the violoncello, Goltermann. 7. Concerto for piano, Hiller. 8. Concerto for violin, De Bériot. Almost all these pieces were efficiently rendered. With the exception of two Fräuleins (both pianists) between sixteen and eighteen, the performers were merely children, the oldest being only fifteen. The name of this boy is A. Blomberg, from Brckerfeld; he plays violoncello and piano beautifully, having also an extraordinary talent for composition. A boy thirteen years old, C. Heimann, a Jew, from Amsterdam, is also a young phenomenon. He is a great composer, and as pianist he can compete with the first celebrities of the day. The beautiful concerto of Hiller which he played to perfection, is a most difficult tour de force from the mechanical skill and strength it receives. Heimann executed it by heart, and he electrified the audience to the highest pitch, being vociferously applauded and recalled several times. I have no doubt that in a few years the musical world will hear the name of this new genius. We had no vocal contributions at this soirée; Madame Marchesi, being only three months professor of singing here, objected to bring forward any of her pupils, who are all beginners.

COBLENTZ. We still follow the same correspondent, for his tale is interesting:

On the 26th inst., the Musik-Institut of Coblenz, under the leadership of the Musikdirector, Max Bruch (the composer of "Loreley" and "Frithjof-Sage") gave a concert zur Vorfeier von Mozarts Geburtstag (27 January). Attracted as you may imagine by the interesting programme I saw in the newspapers, and the name of Bruch, I went to this solemnity. Coblenz, a beautifully situated town, is still very poor, although the residence of the Queen of Prussia during more than six months every year. Being a fortification, its population of about thirty thousand is chiefly composed of military authorities and civil employees, who have not much money to spend on enjoyment. There is no trade, and the commercial part of the population is very small. The musical society has not resources enough to keep an orchestra, and therefore for every concert the Musikdirector must gather together all the musicians he can get from every quarter. While present at the rehearsal on the morning before the concert, I saw every description of soldiers and ouvriers come in with their second and third rate instruments, and take their place in the orchestra. A very characteristic incident is worthy special notice. When the orchestra were assembling, a man about fifty, with a very jolly face and lively manners, dressed in his postman's uniform, with the letter-box attached to his waist, entered, and after bowing politely to Herr Bruch, placed himself near the first bassoon. The rehearsal began with a concerto for piano and orchestra, in which the wind instruments are very much employed. All at once Herr Bruch stopped, and addressing the described gentleman, said, "Herr Moll, why do you not play your part?" "Ich bitte um Vergebung, Herr Musikdirector," answered the supposed second bassoon, "but I had to look after the letters from the last delivery, and therefore couldn't bring my instrument; but I can sing my part if you like." So singing the whole time, Herr Moll went through the rehearsal of the concerto, after which he left to go round the town to deliver his letters. On enquiring after this very interesting musical postman, I found out that he had been in a military band during many years, and that he is a great musical enthusiast, playing four or five instruments very well. Under such circumstances it is highly interesting to see how a man of genius like Bruch can, by his moral influence, unite the most heterogeneous elements, and how too the meanest capacities can be brought to wonderful results. Any one present at this rehearsal without knowing what the magical power of a superior man can realize, would have prophesied the Mozart a dead failure. But no; the concert went on capitally, and with very few exceptions the orchestra under the baton of Max Bruch did ample justice to the music of the immortal Cigno di Salisburgo. The selection of the programme was judicious and effective, and the public of Coblenz, well known as cold and reserved, were so highly delighted, that through a gradual crescendo they rose to ecstasy, and rapturously applauded every number of the programme.

The room was very elegantly decorated for the occasion and crowded with fashionable beauties. A bust of Mozart, wearing a crown of laurels, was placed on a very elegant pedestal before the orchestra, surrounded with magnificent flowers. A concert so artistically successful and so well attended is a real homage to the memory of Mozart.

LEIPZIG. The following was the programme of the 11th Gewandhaus Concert: Symphony in B flat major, Beethoven; "Pfinzgen," Chorus, Ferdinand Heller (first time); music to Lord Byron's Manfred, Robert Schumann, the connecting text, by R. Pohl, spoken by Herr Otto Deorient, from the Theatre Carlsruhe. The solos were sung by Mlle Scheuerlein, Mad. Pogner, and Herr Scharfe, from the Royal Opera-house, Dresden.—At the Sixth Enterpe Concert, the pieces selected were Concerto, No. 5, D minor, for string-band and two oboes, G. F. Handel (first time); Adagio for Flute, Mozart, performed by M. A. de Vroye, from Paris; Concerto for Violoncello, Goltermann, performed by Herr Louis Lübeck; Fantasia on an original theme for the Flute, Demersseman, played by M. A. de Vroye; two Pieces for the Violoncello, viz.: "Chanson villageoise," Ed. Lalou, and "Romanesca," dancing song of the 15th century, played by Herr L. Lübeck; Symphony in D minor, Robert Volkmann.

VIENNA. At a recent "Gesellschafts concert" two rare works were performed: a Symphony by Cherubini, his only one, written for the London Philharmonic Society and conducted by him at their concerts in 1815; and Beethoven's "Stephansmusik." Of the former, a correspondent of the London Musical World writes. (Vienna, Feb. 5):

Let no one fancy he will find in it the full flow of ideas and the dashing energy that characterise Cherubini's best operas. He will find merely a Haydn-like Symphony of artificially increased proportions, but without soul. By the way, Haydn, whom Cherubini himself looked upon as his musical father, has contributed in no slight degree towards the Symphony under consideration, but, however much the whole plan and numberless melodic turns remind us of "Papa," there is not the slightest approach to his freshness and his roguish humour. The seriousness of the Florentine maestro, who, in this instance, felt a kind of contrast imposed upon him by the grandeur and unusual nature of his task, sinks into mere dry and artificial pedantry. We can perceive unmistakably how hard he labours to work himself out of the real and the adopted country of his music, namely, Italy and France, into the German style, but, in the effort, everything like spontaneity, everything like originality, is lost. There are, it is true, some interesting passages from time to time, but the hearer feels notwithstanding a sense of relief when the Symphony is brought to a close. The audience seemed to breathe afresh, new life appeared to spread all through the place, at the very first bars of Weber's "Concertstück," which Herr Tausig gave like a first rate virtuoso, which does not quite mean like a real artist. He played with the difficulties, it is true, but then he played, also, with the composition itself. This was a serious fault, and imparted a kind of patchwork, used-up, character to his performance.

Of the Beethoven work he says :

An especially interesting feature in the programme was the last number, namely : Beethoven's music to Kotzebue's play of König Stephan, or as it was originally entitled, Ungarn's erster Wohltäter, anglisc : Hungary's first Benefactor. This was followed by the "Nachspiel," postlude, epilogue, or afterplay, Die Ruinen von Athen, with songs and choruses. This music, with which the public have become familiar by its being frequently performed at concerts, is far superior, not only in actual quantity, but also in musical worth, to that written for König Stephan, in which we in vain seek for such wondrously effective productions as the "Dervish Chorus," or the "Turkish March" from Die Ruinen von Athen. Beethoven treated the prelude in a far more superficial style, employing the music more as a decorative adjunct than an independent element ; he reserved his full strength for the more grateful subject of the epilogue. In König Stephan, we see only the paw of the lion ; in the epilogue we behold the lion himself.

Herr Hellmesberger's third Quartet-Soirée, this year, made the hundredth and fiftieth given since the establishment of this fine series of concerts, which have done so much for good music in Vienna. The audience proved, by the length and cordiality of their reception of Herr Hellmesberger, that they recollected the fact, and were delighted at having an opportunity of acknowledging his services. The programme included Mendelssohn's E minor Quartet, one of the finest cabinet pieces of Herr Hellmesberger and his fellow-laborers, Beethoven's E flat major Quartet, Op. 127, and a new Pianoforte Quartet in C major, in which Herr Dach took part, by Rubinstein.

MUNICH.—At the express desire of the King, Herr Niemann will shortly appear as the hero in Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. The king has, also, signified, through the medium of Herr Lutz, Oberappellrath, that he wishes Dr. Hans von Bülow to put himself once more into communication with the Minister of Education concerning the School of Art and Music which his Majesty would fain see established in his capital.

Music in the Public Schools.

II.

In a former article* we began to give our impressions after a number of visits to some of the public schools of this city during the hours devoted to lessons in vocal music. We confined our description to the Primary Schools, giving a very brief and fragmentary sketch of what we had witnessed of one man's teaching (Mr. L. W. MASON) in each of the classes of the youngest scholars. The result was certainly in the highest degree encouraging. Here was a true method embodied in a live man, one who has the gift for teaching just this thing ; one who not only completely engages the attentive interest of these young children in the rudiments of song and of notation, draws out their fresh and pleasant voices, makes them delight in unison and even concord, inspires them with a love of rhythm and of order, and so prepares them for further musical culture, or at least interest in music, as they grow older, but who enlists all their daily teachers as auxiliaries in this good work, inspiring the mistress in each school room with his own method, so that she can conduct the exercise in the intervals between his visits. We stated that this method was already in successful operation in 185 out of the 250 primary schools.

But what we so imperfectly described was by no means all we witnessed. After following the technical lessons and the singing up to the highest primary stage, we remarked to the teacher : So far, then, the whole course consists simply in teaching to sing simple songs and phrases by ear and by note ; is there nothing done to the direct end of forming the voice, of bringing out a good quality of tone ? "That," replied Mr. Mason, "is another man's department ; a great deal has been done in that way, as I will show you, but we owe it to Mr. Munroe." Whereupon he called upon the room-full of children to sing one more song. "Sing it first in the baby tone," the common drawling, listless, puny Primary school tone ; and so they did, pleased to mimic thus their own bad habits which they were learning to cast off. "Now sit up straight every one, throw the shoulders back, expand the chest, and sing the song in good round musical tone ;" and the order was obeyed with a will, sonorously, in a way to show that most young voices are capable of a good quality of sound, and that they had really been led to discriminate somewhat for themselves between good and bad in this respect.

It was the first that we had heard of Mr. MUNROE, and our enquiries about him and his teaching elicited such glowing statements, that we eagerly accepted an invitation to visit the Hancock Grammar School (a large and noble building, in whose various rooms some 900 girls are taught), and witness the famous "Vocal Gymnastics" as conducted by this gentleman, who had studied the system in Paris, and had been but recently employed to introduce the exercise, experimentally, in certain of the Boston schools. Here his function relates ostensibly and mainly to physical training, with an immediate view to the health and strength of the pupils ; but, as the voice is the main organ called into exercise, or rather the resultant of all the forces set in motion through the various organs, these exercises cannot but exert an influence on the speech, the reading and the singing of the pupil—especially the latter, for it is the music of speech that constitutes the hearty naturalness and health thereof, as truly as the bloom upon the cheek tells of the body's youth and vigor. Such a man seems to have come along providentially to meet that other want, besides simple music-teaching as such, in the schools, which was so well expressed in the following passage of the annual report of the School Committee for 1864 :

What remains to be provided for, therefore—in order to the attainment of this most important, though collateral benefit, a refined and musical utterance, in the great multitude who are, in other respects, educated with so much carefulness in our elementary schools—is a stricter attention to the physical training of the vocal organs and their accessories, especially, which both precedes and accompanies the development of the musical voice. This preparation, as we have before intimated, must be looked for in some systematic plan of physical exercises, begun at an early age, by which the pupils are taught from the first to stand and sit erect, and give freedom and full play to the organs of respiration and of speech. Such system should be judiciously but conscientiously pursued throughout the entire period of primary pupilage,—that to a correct posture may be added that harmonious growth and development of the whole body which is essential to the healthful action of any of its parts. If, in connection with such careful physical training, the child be daily exercised in the practice of the elementary sounds which promotes distinctness of articulation, and gain some knowledge and appreciation of musical tones, it will readily acquire a flexibility and facility of utterance, and that nameless element in spoken language which makes the "music of the phrase"—refined and educated speech.

Go with us, then, into the Hancock School. It is at the North End and draws its pupils, mostly, not from families much favored in respect of ease or culture. At one end of a spacious upper hall, hung round with creditable specimens of the pupils' skill in drawing maps, landscapes, picturesque buildings, figures, there stood in rows some forty girls taken at random from the upper classes, confronted by the teacher. (He, by the way, in rich, manly voice and physique seemed a picture of health and vigor ; but he assured us that he owes it all to the practice of this very system of "vocal gymnastics," that through the discipline of his own voice thus he had repaired a weak and sinking constitution, and that for this very end he had first sought the benefit of the exercise in Paris ; that through it he had been the means of building up both voice and health in several of his friends who fancied that they were getting past all hope of either.)

His cheery, quickening address brought the young platoon all instantly to the qui vive ; and the first exercises were in balancing and swaying this way and that, facing about, &c., all in unison, and rhythmically, with military precision, which was simply learning to stand well planted on the feet, erect, with freedom and aplomb.—Then came a series of evolutions of the arms, describing curves so graceful and executed with such unity, that we were reminded of the "Viennese Dancers," the object being to throw open the chest and give free play to the organs of respiration and tone. Respiration came next ; drawing of deep full breath ; breathing aloud ; holding the breath out long ; economy of the breath ; breathing upon a set key or pitch and so suggesting something like the shadow of a tone ; but tone itself was kept back for some time yet and only approached by slow degrees. At last the tone leaps out, a ringing, round, sonorous Sol ; it was startling ; one hardly hears a richer and more telling body of tone from a trained Italian Opera chorus, or from all the soprani and contraltos of the Handel and Haydn. Then, to show the atoms that made up the aggregate, each voice was called upon in turn to utter the same tone separately. Great and curious were the differences in deed ; each voice so individual in timbre, color, strength ; some slender and feeble in comparison with others ; yet all made so far true by this exercise that each enriched and did not mar the collective sound.

Other tones were tried in the same way, throughout the diatonic scale, and scarcely any voice fell out. Then came degrees of strength, fortissimo, mezzo forte, piano, pianissimo, &c. ; then long holding out of the tone, swelling and diminishing ; a more perfect, beautiful crescendo we have never heard in any choir of singers. Invaluable the habit thus formed of noticing and practicing these distinctions, these gradations ! Singing of simple strains, in unison, in two-part harmony, simple canons, catches, &c., followed. The application to the art of reading was then illustrated. One young lady read a passage of Milton's blank verse ; at first, purposely, in the common thin and shallow "school girl tone," which excited a smile of course by its too much truth to actual life. On being asked now to read it in the "oretund voice," it came out in such large, sonorous, noble, Faneuil Hall-like tones, that we could almost doubt the identity of the reader. Then this swelling oretund was subdued and toned down to what was called the "natural" tone, and this again contrasted with the nasal, the crying, the pinched, hard Yankee peculiarities of speech, which were plainly being exorcized by this process.

* See No. 22 of this Volume, Jan. 30.

We need not recall the details of the exercise at greater length. Its character and tendency, we trust, are sufficiently apparent so far as description can serve; but it must be witnessed to be fully realized. Go to the schools and judge for yourself. This was but the tenth lesson these girls had received, and already such good fruits! We would we could describe the admirable manner, the tact, the refinement, the kindly and inspiring way in which Mr. Munroe conducts the exercises; but this too must be seen to be appreciated.

We next accompanied him to a room in which all the female teachers of the district, twenty or thirty, were assembled for the same training, that they might severally teach it in their turn. This was even more interesting; for here the indoctrinator entered into lucid explanations of the physiology of the voice, illustrating by diagrams and on the black board. And when it came to readings, he drew them into discussions and nice analyses of the meaning and spirit of various passages with reference to the fit and natural character of voice for each, an exercise full of mental stimulus, a cure for affectations, and showing very clear and subtle faculty in the teacher. So too in the "training school" (established in one of the comfortable old mansions in Somerset Street), where young ladies who have graduated from the Normal Schools are getting their first experience in teaching. These young teachers have their hours when they too are put through the same course of "vocal gymnastics," readings and criticisms. And in several primary school rooms we have seen the exercise conducted by the mistress, and the children very apt and happy under the new and wholesome dispensation.

Well may the worthy chairman of the Music branch of the School Committee, Dr. Upham, and his zealous colleagues, point with satisfaction to these experiments, and plead for the extension of the system throughout all the public schools of Boston, until vocal music and "vocal gymnastics" shall become vitally part and parcel of the common education of the whole rising generation. To bear its rightful fruits the teaching must become general, the influence atmospheric, all-pervading. For it is destined to work salutary changes in certain characteristic and discreditable, but not essential, national traits and habits. The two courses, that of Mr. Mason and that of Mr. Munroe, are complements to each other. Because of the former, the latter, seeking in the outset only health, finds music; while the singing class is all the time replenished with fresh vocal strength from the gymnastics. We have left ourselves barely room to catalogue a few of the good results, immediate and prospective, from this two-fold exercise.

1. It makes the children happy, teaches them to know the pleasure of unity of movement, inclining them to rhythmical behavior and the instinct of order in all things,—that order in which they feel the liveliest freedom; and helps to make the school hours the sunshiniest part of their day.

2. It gives them possession of their voices—not their voices possession of them—so that those ringing little organs become a source of pleasure rather than annoyance to those around them.

3. It gives them health, expands the chest and lifts life up for all its tasks.

4. It loosens the soil, brushes away the obstacles, starts and nurtures such germs as there may be in each child of musical sensibility, perhaps of musical talent or even genius. Whole generations will grow up in a republic loving music, at least not dead to its influence: and what society in the world so much as a young great republic with its harsh, utilitarian, selfish and ambitious passions, needs the correcting, harmonizing influence of Art, especially of music, which is the most popular, the most ideal, universal, least material, and evermore believing, Art of Arts?

5. It is training up the voices to supply all our choirs and our great choruses. The churches and the Oratorios will not have to seek far for singers. And patriotism, with these tuneful means, may easily improve upon the model which the Germans give us in their singing unions which do so much to keep alive the soul of nationality and Fatherland.

6. It will work a revolution in our poor, pinched, hard, nasal Yankee utterance, which has grown proverbial. It will reform the national speech, tone, accent. The next generation will speak with full and hearty vowel sounds, with some graceful measured flow, something of the music of speech which we observe in most Europeans, and which has its moral as well as aesthetic advantages at the same time,—nay is in some sense a moral quality and not mere outside manner.

Concerts.

The prospect is richer than the retrospect. For instance:

Tomorrow (Sunday) evening, the combined choirs of King's Chapel and St. Paul's, with their respective leaders and organists, Mr. WHITING and Dr. TUCKERMAN, will perform a programme of rare sacred vocal and organ music in the Music Hall.

The fourth and last concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB is postponed from next Tuesday (on account of the great Military Ball) to Tuesday, the 13th inst.

The fourth SYMPHONY CONCERT is in order this day (Thursday) while we go to press; our report can only come in the next number. Meanwhile we give, in reference to the Schumann Symphony, something of interest on the first page. The fifth concert (March 22) will offer a new overture by Schubert, to "Fierabras," the first and best of Gade's Symphonies, a piece for two pianos (played by Messrs. Parker and Lang) with orchestra, and the whole of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music with female chorus.

Mr. B. J. LANG is rehearsing a large chorus for the first bringing out in full here of Haydn's "Seasons," probably on Saturday evening, the 24th inst.

The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY are growing week by week more sure and firm in the difficult choruses of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which they will bring out at Easter.

Mr. HERMANN DAUM, one of our best pianists and most high-toned musicians, proposes soon to give two or three concerts of piano music, classical and choice in programmes; among other things the Hummel Septet with all the instruments.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The seventh Wednesday Afternoon concert gave us the charming Haydn Symphony in B flat, the same that was played in the third Symphony Concert,—the very thing to win the attention of the young and gay part of the audience to the changeful interplay of the orchestral instruments and the beauties of the symphonic form. A light overture of Auber's, to "Le Lac des Fées," preceded the Symphony; and it was followed by the arranged duet from "Tell," one of the ever fresh things of Rossini, in which the clarinet and bassoon sang to good purpose; Mendelssohn's fairy Overture; and a new Strauss waltz, in which you hear the swallows.—This week, Mr. ZERRAHN being ill, Mr. SCHULTZE gracefully and quietly took his place as conductor. The music all went well: the bright La Gazza Ladra overture; Beethoven's first Symphony,—fit successor to the Haydn, and calling up traits of Mozart's "Jupiter" in the finale; a pretty song without words called "Spring's awakening;" the "Swallow" waltz again; and, for a novelty, a work of some importance, a Concerto for the Clarinet, by the Dresden capellmeister, Julius Rietz, which was quite interesting, especially in the last movement (it has three), which is poetic and much in the livelier vein of Mendelssohn. Mr. RYAN played it with much skill of execution and with good expression.

ORGAN CONCERTS in the Music Hall are still given thrice in a week. Mr. J. K. PAINE has played in the last two, giving us of Bach a Prelude in E minor, two movements of the Trio Sonata in G, a Prelude and Fugue in B minor (one of the noblest works), and a Choral Vorspiel,—of course in a masterly manner. Also, twice, the beautiful and deeply felt sixth Sonata of Mendelssohn, in D minor, that which is built upon the old Choral: "Vater unser;" a Chromatic Fugue and a Theme with variations by Thiele, a Choral Vorspiel by Fischer, and some interesting compositions of his own, especially the "Caprice" and a good serious Offertoire in B minor.

Organ programmes multiply upon our hands so fast, as to baulk our design to keep the run of them; nevertheless we hope soon to gather up the threads and make some review of what the last three months or more have given us.

FARMINGTON, CONN. The annual "Soirées of Chamber Music" at Miss S. Porter's Young Ladies' School took place on the 16th and 17th ult. These concerts, twenty-six of which have now been given, are always classical in their character, leading artists from New York, and sometimes from Boston, paying flying visits to the school and playing such music, and such only, as they would before the most musical of audiences. Here are the two programmes:

Feb. 16.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, A major, . . . . .	Mozart.
Allegro molto—Andante—Presto.
S. B. Mills and Theo. Thomas.
Sonata for Violin, . . . . .	Bach.
Allemande and Double, . . . . .	Sarabande and Double.—Tempo di Bourée and Double.
Theo. Thomas.
Second Book of Intermezzi, Op. 4, . . . . .	Schumann.
S. B. Mills.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, A major, op. 47, . . . . .	Beethoven.
Feb. 17.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, D major, op. 12, . . . . .	Beethoven.
Prelude and Fugue, C minor, . . . . .	Bach.
S. B. Mills.
Romance and Allegro, . . . . .	F. L. Ritter.
Theo. Thomas.
Berceuse, Op. 57, . . . . .	Chopin.
Etude, No. 5, Op. 10, . . . . .
S. B. Mills.
Intermezzi ad Libitum for Piano and Violin.

These are rare opportunities, truly, for the inmates of a boarding school; and they are mainly due to the zeal and wisdom of the man whom they are fortunate enough to have had there so long for a music teacher, one of the real musicians of the country, Mr. KARL KLAUSER, who expresses his gratitude to the artist visitors in a letter addressed to us in German, which must suffer somewhat in our translation:

"I send you," he writes, "for friendly notice, the programmes of our last concerts, which, apart from their laudable object, cannot fail to excite your special interest. Both artists were in right excellent humor and, being particularly animated by the sympathy and enthusiasm of the youthful audience, they set about it with true fire. This showed itself especially in the 'Kreutzer' Sonata, which they rendered in the greatest perfection and with poetic and transporting verve.

"MILLS proves himself more and more each year a genuine, striving artist, not spoiled by his virtuoso successes. He never plays aught that is unworthy; even when he finds it worth while to show his bravura and his eminent technique, he resorts to nothing worse than the Lisztian feats of strength. Powerfully as he takes hold of these, even so modestly does he subordinate his virtuosity in the rendering of a simple Mozart Sonata. What were still to be desired in him were a deeper inwardness of feeling,—that that comes from the whole heart and soul!

"It was characteristically brave in THOMAS to play Bach violin Sonata without accompaniment. Beautiful as this work is, and excellent and largely felt as was the execution, yet it seemed to me that the polyphonic treatment does too much violence to the instrument;—one misses also too much, in the long run, the 'fundamental sovereignty of the Bass'. Mendelssohn and Schumann felt this, when they wrote a piano accompaniment to these works!

"An interesting novelty was RITTER's Romance and Allegro for the Violin (manuscript),—a finely conceived and executed composition, which may place itself by the side of the best in its kind, and maintained its place on the programme between Bach and Chopin with all honor. The Romance is a piece of great euphony and shows a true feeling of beauty; the simple, tender mood reminds one of Chopin's Ballade in F major. The Allegro is distinguished by a very beautiful middle passage, and culminates in a brilliant but extremely difficult cadenza. It were to be wished that Ritter would prove for once untrue to his habit and not bury this composition, as he has done so many other works, in his desk!

"In regard to the Beethoven Sonata, op. 47, which the master dedicated 'al suo amico R. Kreutzer,' it deserves to be mentioned, that it is called the 'Kreutzer Sonata' to the shame of that violinist; for Kreutzer never played it himself, on the ground that it was 'too absurd and unintelligible'!

"In conclusion, I wish heretofore publicly to repeat my thanks to the two artists, Mills and Thomas, for so disinterestedly leaving New York in the busiest season, and not shrinking from a personal sacrifice out of their love for Art. Likewise to the always liberal firm of Steinway and Sons, who on the periodical return of our concerts send us most willingly their best instruments. KARL KLAUSER."

PHILADELPHIA has shown much musical activity of late, and mainly in a good direction, as the following extracts from the Bulletin will show.

Feb. 14.—Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN's fifth (Beethoven) matinee was rendered additionally attractive through the presence of Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter, of New York, who sang four songs, by as many different authors, and acquitted herself to the satisfaction of the audience.

It is seldom that singers favor us with arias of such antiquity. The "Lascia ch'io pianga" is from an opera dedicated to Queen Anne, by the illustrious Handel. Though the operas then in vogue have, for various reasons, lost their hold upon popular enthusiasm, there are scattered among them many gems which need but to be removed from their antique settings to hold their own with the favorites of to-day.

We have also to thank Madame Ritter for the aria from Gluck's "Paris and Helen." The same intelligence which marked her performance of these works displayed itself in the songs by Liszt and Schumann. She has a powerful voice and seems to have a fine conception of the spirit of the song-writer, which makes us the more regret that her vocal means seem scarcely sufficient for an artistic rendering of this order of music. Her voice is not very flexible and her style is, at times, too Italian in its mannerisms. With all these objections, there was yet much to praise in the matter and manner of Mrs. Ritter's songs. We feel that thanks are due her for the character of the selections and think that they prove her to be earnest in her musical studies; believing which, we can only say that with continued application, she may be able to employ her natural gifts in such a way as to insure permanent success as a vocal favorite.

The sonatas performed were most happily chosen, lending variety to the programme, and were given in Mr. Wolfsohn's best style.

Mr. JARVIS's THIRD MATINEE.—A beautiful trio for piano, violin and violoncello of Mozart heads Mr. Jarvis's programme for to-morrow afternoon, while one of Mendelssohn's charming suite of variations for piano and violoncello is followed by a couple of piano solos, which may be expected to be brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Jarvis. The Scherzo by Chopin is one which Schumann so warmly praises in his critique, and compares to a poem by Byron, full of love and contempt, tender spirited and impassioned.

A string quintet by Gade, one of the new lights of Germany, closes the interesting list of pieces. Mr.

Jarvis will be assisted by Gaertner, Schmitz, Kammerer and Plagemann.

MENDELSSOHN's "ELIJAH." (First time in Philadelphia, Feb. 9).

The densely packed audience at the Musical Fund Hall, last evening, reminded us of the old palmy days of the "Philharmonic" and the "Musical Fund Society." Every available and unavailable spot was occupied by an eager listener, and the unwearied attention of the assemblage testified how keen was the appreciation of the master-musician of modern times. At a quarter before eight Mr. Sents assumed his baton, and Mendelssohn's grand oratorio of "Elijah" began. To almost the whole audience it was a first hearing of this sublime composition, and as one beauty after another unfolded itself, developing all the wonderful genius of its creator, the audience seemed to rise to a higher and keener enjoyment of this rare treat. . . . The choruses were rendered with marvellous spirit and precision, showing the most pains-taking study and practice, and the splendid fugues with which the oratorio abounds, were given with splendid effect. The Germania orchestra, largely reinforced for the occasion, won new laurels by its admirable and delicate accompaniments, and all that was wanting, instrumentally, was what we, unfortunately, cannot have in Philadelphia, the grand diapasons of a fine organ.

The solo parts were well sustained, and elicited numerous hearty encores. The soprano, Miss Alexander, has a sweet, clear voice, with good method and intonation, but needs still greater power to do full justice to her very arduous and exhausting part. The contralto, Miss McCaffrey, was, as she always is, thoroughly satisfactory, and we are not disposed to criticize the little liberties which she occasionally took with the music, to adapt it more easily to her peculiar voice. Messrs. Rudolphsen and Simpson shared between them a large portion of the applause of the audience and were frequently encored. . . .

Mr. Sents conducted the Oratorio admirably, holding his large chorus of nearly two hundred voices and his full orchestra perfectly in hand throughout the whole performance, which occupied two hours and forty minutes, and supporting the solo singers with excellent judgment and taste. . . .

There was one feature of the performance last evening, worthy of remark. A better or more intelligent audience we never saw, and yet it was not at all what is technically called a "fashionable" one. It was an assemblage drawn together by a genuine love of Music, and by an educated appreciation of the genius of the great composer. Opera is "fashionable" in Philadelphia, Oratorio is not. It is "the thing" to hear "L'Africaine;" it is not yet, but will be, "the thing" to hear "Elijah." The "West End" was not at the Musical Fund Hall last night, and the "West End" made a great mistake, and lost a great treat thereby.

The Academy of Music was very well filled last evening, to hear a repetition of Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah, by the Handel and Haydn Society. The performers were all placed before the curtain, so as to avoid the loss of effect that has been observed when they have been placed back among the scenery. A large platform, extending over the orchestra, gave room for all the vocal and instrumental performers, numbering in all about three hundred.

The performance was an improvement over the first, excellent as that was. It is still to be regretted that Miss Alexander, who is a good musician and a very valuable member of the Society, has not sufficient volume of voice for the principal soprano part, and this is especially noticeable in a large building like the Academy. Miss McCaffrey's excellent voice and method showed to advantage. She was warmly applauded and her lovely solo, "O rest in the Lord," received a hearty encore. Mr. Simpson sang with great sweetness, but a little more animation would partly compensate for his lack of power, which is very manifest in a large hall. The basso part was sung by Dr. Guilmette, of Boston, and the Society was fortunate in securing the services of so good an artist to take Mr. Rudolphsen's place. He has had much experience in oratorio singing in England, where this kind of music is better cultivated than any other. He has a pure, mellow, sympathetic voice, of the basso cantante order, and he sings with intelligence and expression. He was frequently and enthusiastically applauded.

The orchestra and chorus, under Mr. Sents's direction, were admirable. So large a body of good and well-trained voices has rarely been assembled here, and the Handel and Haydn Society, in organizing it and maintaining it, has done a service to the cause of music that the community here ought to acknowledge in every possible way. Last evening every one of the fine choruses was sung with perfect precision, and with due attention to light and shade.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Wandering Boy from Home. Song & Cho. Vincent J. Engle. 30

Records very touchingly the longing of an absent son for the love and the blessings of home. Easy and pretty music.

Daughter of Kings. (Figlia dei Re.)

"L'Africaine." 60

Occurs in the prison scene, where Nelusko's fiery nature swerves between love and habitual reverence for his queen. (whose captivity makes no difference in his feelings of homage), and his hate for, and jealousy of Vasco, whom he is tempted to kill while sleeping. An effective song.

Farwell, ye shores of Tagus. (Del Tago sponde addio.)

"L'Africaine." 40

The charming song of the fair Inez, who, in it, repeats the serenade sung by Vasco ere his departure on the first perilous voyage. For soprano voice.

Once a cobbler, poor and lowly. (Una volta un ciabattino.)

"Crispino e la Comare." 30

Poor Crispino's ditty in the first act, wherein he sings, with small applause, of a cobbler and a benevolent fairy, never dreaming that it was to be, substantially, his own experience with the Comare, and his good fortune. Light and pretty.

My pretty tales and songs. (Storie belle a leggere.)

"Crispino e la Comare." 30

Annetta's appeal for the sale of her ballads, as she cries them in the grand plaza and the narrow lanes of Venice. Very pretty and not especially difficult.

The Sunset Land. Song & Cho. T. M. Towne. 30

A beautiful and ample ballad.

The gal with the roguish eye. F. Wilson. 40

Laughable and pretty.

Instrumental.

Helter skelter galop. (Ueber Stock und Stein).

Carl Faust. 30

It abounds with the brilliancy of true dance music, and is a favorite wherever known.

I'm lonely since my mother died. Varied by

C. Grobe. 60

One of Mr. Thompson's favorite pieces, which, it seems, has become sufficiently popular to attract the notice of the great Variation-er, whose works are climbing fast in number toward 2,000. A fine melody.

Rosebud Schottisch. E. H. Osborne.

Wildfang galop. C. Faust

The latter is a sort of wild hunting melody, and the other of a quieter nature. Two good pieces.

Fredonia march. For Guitar. W. L. Haydn. 30

An old acquaintance with piano teachers. Instructors on the violin must consider themselves duly notified that this very useful lesson piece is now within their reach.

Java and Titus marches. For guitar. W. L. Haydn.

Two easy and pretty pieces for learners.

The mountain rill. For Piano. C. A. Hawes. 50

In flowing style, and medium difficulty.

Through the air. Galop. Birgfeld. 35

Books.

GEMS OF SACRED SONG. B'ds. $2.50; Cl. $3.00

It is a gratification to announce the publication of another member of the very popular Home Circle series. The "Gems" include the greater part of all known good sacred songs, and the book will soon be well known to all those who like to sing sacred songs on Sunday evenings and at other times.

The Song of Colin Muset.

SINGER AND POET (TROUBADOUR).

A.D. 1240.

What music charming as the lay
Of minstrel gay, Colin Muset?
The maidens hear, and spring up dancing,
The youths begin to form the round,
And dame and shepherd stand spell-bound,
Let spindle drop, and sheep go prancing,
The while they listen to the sound
Of soft guitar, his song enhancing;
What music charming as the lay
Of minstrel gay, Colin Muset?

When falls his foot in pleasant places,
The maitre-d'hotel of proud chateau
Each portion doubles, pipes let flow—
So welcome minstrel Colin's face is!
My lord in rich robe stalks a-glow,
My lady dons her Flanders laces;
He makes a stir where'er he strays,
The minstrel gay, Colin Muset!

The baron asks for songs of glory,
The lay of Roland, soldier brave;
Of Lancelot's love, of Tristan's grave,
The baroness would list the story;
The chant that Orpheus' crew did save
Best suits the ear of friar hoary;
He sings for each and all a lay,
The minstrel gay, Colin Muset!

They feast and praise him at their leisure,
Each day some rich reward he gains;
But poet pains and singers' strains
No purse can pay with mortal treasure;
And Colin's voice, and Colin's brains,
What minstrel with his own dare measure?
For none like him can wake the lay,
Or sad, or gay, Colin Muset!

The brazen trumpet boldly blows he,
Sighs through the flute-like winds in Spring;
He strikes the harp's persuasive string,
The violin with soul endows he;
A light carillon he can ring;
All secrets of his science knows he,
And many a minstrel owes to-day
His skill to gay Colin Muset.

At last, his merry wanderings over,
While fortune on his fate attends,
The backward path he gladly wends,
From hearts at home no more a rover;
Then wife and children, servants, friends,
Rejoice with him, and live in clover.
"God bless thy liberal art," they say,
"Good, generous, gay Colin Muset!"

How Weber Composed "Der Freyschuütz."

From the first moment that Weber took his new opera in hand, he may be said to have entered into the phase of his maturity. The very day may be marked (the 23d February 1817) when the first act of the opera reached him,* and on reading it over, he felt "a spring of melody bubbling up within him." From this moment his whole artistic being assumed the form of this work. From this moment his hitherto vague and general feelings of art were concentrated upon the one idea of "Der Freischütz." From the world without, as from the rich world of thoughts within, every thing was seized upon to be amalgamated with this one idea. Wherever he went he carried it in his heart. Every outward impression, however heterogeneous it may have appeared, was reflected on the one mirror within, wherein was to be judged the effect of light and shade it might produce. The work became a portion of himself. Naturally enough the love that then pervaded his whole being was absorbed at once into this incorporation of his art, and exercised a powerful influence on his work. In "Aennchen" Weber saw all the nature and qualities of his beloved ope. He took her ideal form to his heart at once; and the portions of the opera in which it appears first ripened into musical life under the warm sun of his love. The first note of "Der Freischütz" which Weber ever wrote down belonged to the duet between Aennchen and Agathe, in the second act. As Weber himself has frequently declared, he not only saw his Caroline before him, carrying out all his artistic intentions in a part which so thoroughly accorded with her peculiar talents; but he could hear her singing every note of the music, as she would sit studying at the piano, now shaking her head over some passage, now smiling pleasantly over some other, until these visions of his brain dictated all the effects of his composition.

Weber did not compose "Der Freischütz;" he allowed it to grow out of the rich soil of his brave German heart, and to expand leaf by leaf, blossom by blossom, trained, tendered, fostered by the hand of his talent; and thus no German looks upon the opera as a work of art, which penetrates him from without: he feels as if every tone of the work came from his own heart, as if he himself had dreamed it so, and it could no more sound otherwise than the rustling of an honest German beech-wood. This very feeling was involuntarily expressed by Kind, when he so innocently exclaimed, "I cannot see what there is in the melody of 'The Bridesmaids' Chorus' to make such a wondrous fuss about! Why, from the very words, it could not have been otherwise. Every man would have hit upon the same idea."

Weber was much longer employed on the composition of his "Der Freischütz" than on that of any other of his operas. From the first beginning, on the 23d February, of his mental work on it, which never ceased to the 2d July, the first day that he wrote down a note of it, an interval of more than four months took place. There is not a single piece of music in it that he did not turn over twenty times in his mind, until he so felt it that he could say, "That's it!" and then he wrote it down rapidly in a firm, clear hand, almost without altering a note. Thus in none of his works does the peculiar speciality of the style and manner of his creation appear so markedly as in this one. He may be said to have been always composing. The world appeared to him a world of tones. Color, form, space, time were transformed, by a mysterious process of his inward man, into sounds. Out of the strangest and most unharmonious noises his ear sucked in the most original and striking effects. Strange to say, lines and forms seem to have called forth melodies within him, as sounds gave rise to harmonies. His musical ideas, he was wont say, came thickest upon him when the sight of outward objects was accompanied by the rolling of carriage-wheels. Landscapes were symphonies to his ears; and melodies sprang up from every rise or fall of the road from every trembling brook, from every waving field of corn; whilst the sound of the wheels supplied the richest harmonies. Thus certain drives or walks were involuntarily mixed up in his mind with such or such musical ideas. Whenever any spot recurred to his memory, it was combined with the recollection of the melody it had inspired. But, happy as might be the ideas thus elicited by outward objects, Weber was slow to write them down. Experience had taught him that such musical inspirations might, like poetical improvisations, strike upon the ear with brilliant and startling effect, yet fall upon the paper dead and cold, like shooting stars. Weber, however, was no lavish spender of his ideas. Portions of these fleeting musical apparitions, to which he assigned no greater value, and which he considered unworthy of being stored up, he would reproduce in his inimitable improvisations on the piano; and, as he played, he would unroll before his mind's eye the landscape panorama whence the musical thoughts had sprung.

But it must not be supposed, at the same time, that the nature of the outward objects always elicited analogous feelings. Sublime mountain scenery, by some strange chain of thought, or perhaps contrasting feeling, might give birth to a droll capriccio,—a joyous sunrise to a melancholy adagio,—a grotesque object to a grave motive. After this fashion, the "Laughing Chorus" of the first act of "Der Freischütz" owed its origin to the impression made upon the composer by the intolerably false intoning of the responses of a litany by some old women, during a sleepy afternoon-service in the Pillnitz chapel. The music of the Wolf's Glen was conceived one morning as he drove to Pillnitz in a heavy fog, the changeful masses of which swept in multitudinous forms around his carriage. The magnificent march in "Oberon," it may here be related, also owed its existence to a still more singular apparition. Weber was accustomed, when performances took place at the "Linkesches Bad," to walk out after dinner and take his coffee there in the garden by the Elbe. One day a heavy rain had come on during the walk, to the capellmeister's infinite disgust. He was unusually silent and morose. When he reached the garden, all the guests had been driven away by the rain, and the waiters had heaped the chairs and tables one upon another, with their legs sprawling in the air. The capellmeister stood for a time, with his hands folded behind him, gazing at the grotesque groupings of these distracted-looking objects. All on a sudden he called to young Roth, the clarionet-player, who had been the companion of his walk, "Look there!" he said; "does not that look exactly like a great triumphal march? Donnerwetter! What chords there are for the trumpets! I can use that! I can use that!" He had just then been asked to compose a march for Gehe's tragedy of "Henry the Fourth." Immediately on reaching home, after the theatre, Weber wrote down his singular inspiration, at first only for brass instruments. It was afterwards turned to account, and arranged for the orchestra in "Oberon."

To such strange outward impressions, and their mysterious workings upon Weber's artist soul, was due the music of that opera, which, of all his works, was the most characteristic of his own nature. His own feelings, during its composition, he expressed but seldom in word or writing. To his beloved Caroline, almost exclusively, he opened his mind upon the subject occupying all his thoughts. "I have such a terrible confession to make to you," he wrote one day, "I scarcely know how to come out with it. I am completely seduced by the charms of a young maiden; and the crime is all the more abominable, as she is another's bride. But I can't help it. She is always in my thoughts. Day and night I embrace her with the wildest passion. She came naked to me; but I am dressing her with the best I can supply, and feeding her with my own heart's blood. She has a dreadful longing for the stage; and I shall forward her desire as much as I can, although I know all the dangers which threaten her. Oh! will she be true to me? Now you know all. Beat me! tear out my eyes! But that will do no good. Yes, that perfidious 'Jäger's Bride' haunts me wherever I go. Heaven grant her and me its blessing!" "Every thing which has any connection with my own dear Lina goes before all," he writes again. "Aennchen would suit you exactly; and I cannot but compose those portions of my music first, wherein you come before my eyes. In that merry, coquettish little demon you will, one of these days, find your own portrait, my little mouse." "The great work before me terrifies me sometimes," he writes once more; "and with all the labors of my office, my correspondence, and the direction of the German and Italian operas, and the church music too, how can I ever hope to complete it?" "I have had a few happy moments," runs another letter; "and I have played several passages of my music to Kind, who does not seem by any means pleased. But that does not matter much. Poets only want to hear their own words. But what will my public with two eyes say? Will that be pleased? That's the important point. Now I'll have a good run round my room, and see whether any thoughts will come." "If I have only my first act ready before—you know what—I shall have you to help me in the others," sighs the composer in another letter; "and then we'll see whether we cannot patch it up together, and have it produced this winter. You'll aid me in cutting out and sewing my bride's petticoat for her, won't you?" "I have been working hard," he writes in August; principally upon Agathe's scene; but I cannot get the glow and passion which should be here." "Oh! my good Jäger's Bride," he writes another time; "come quick and bring me gold in store, that I may provide all sorts of beautiful things for my own, my real bride, and line her nest with every comfort." This period of his work on the "Jäger's Bride" ends with the year 1817. The duet of Agathe and Aennchen, the air of Agathe, and a portion of the ensemble piece between Max, Cuno, and Chorus were then composed. It was not until the end of the following year that he again appears busily employed upon his opera.

Meanwhile the "Jäger's Bride" was again rising to the surface of Weber's artistic life. Early in the July of 1819 Count Brühl had begged for a plan of Weber's new opera, with the intention of making an attempt to open with it the newly-erected theatre in Berlin, generally known as the "Schauspielhaus." Count Brühl was anxious to make every preparation as long before the time of the opening as possible, inasmuch as competition for this occasion was to be feared not only on the part of Spontini, who had been newly engaged for the ensuing year, but of the still more redoubtable Goethe, who of his own accord had offered to write a work for the opening of the new house. The book of the "Jäger's Bride" was immediately despatched; and it was perused with so much delight by Count Brühl, that he entreated Weber to visit him at his country-seat of Seifersdorf, and make every arrangement with him for the production of the opera in the coming spring.

All Weber's energy and activity were now once more bestowed upon his "Jäger's Bride." The pieces already mentioned were completed in every point. In September and November the terzet between Agathe, Max, and Aennchen, in the second act, and all the music of the Wolf's Glen, that most original of Weber's compositions, were ready. The charming duet between Agathe and Aennchen, and the lovely little air of the latter, which had sprung entire in their individuality, as it were, out of the composer's heart, were in turn fully completed. On the 6th December, Weber, on reviewing all that he had already done of his opera, was able to write to Brühl to inform him that the whole could be ready by March. But on this assurance Weber did not rest his oars. The endless materials which for years Weber had nourished in his heart, rolled in rich profusion on the paper, like pearls from the hands of the divers rising from the jewel-chambers of the ocean. Agathe's great air now came; and her sweet song, "Und ob die Wolke sich verhülle," was born on the same day as the first gush of the bridesmaids' chorus,—immortal pieces both. In those prolific days this one spare man was forging powerful weapons, with which Germany was to win her great place of artistic honor in the history of the world.

On the 21st December came an announcement fully capable of damping Weber's now ardent spirit. Count Brühl wrote to say, that the opening of the new Berlin theatre was to be celebrated by a work of the great poet Goethe, but that the "Jäger's Bride" would, he trusted, be the first opera given on its boards. But Weber was now too rapidly borne forward on the wings of his excitement and inspiration to be checked in his course by slight disappointments. Heart and head were alike singing, and were not to be stilled. Once more the old joyous spirit of past days seemed to have been kindled within him. He wrote for the new-year's eve some of his genial comic verses of former times, to accompany presents to his friends, or to characterize the personages assumed, as in a twelfth-night masquerade, by himself and his guests on this festive occasion; and as he retired for the night, he penned in his diary the words, "And thus the year, which has brought so many sorrows, has ended gaily. May God give us his blessing, and grateful hearts for the strength bestowed on us to bear all his trials!"

But not alone were the fortunes of the German opera now occupying Weber's active energies. The "Jäger's Bride" was still to be completed. News had reached the composer that the new Schauspielhaus in Berlin would probably be opened before the end of the season of 1820; and it was necessary that the destined opera should be ready. The overture, that marvel of all German orchestral compositions, breathing forth the finest breath of German art, was commenced to be sketched out on the 22d of February, although never completed until the 13th of May. The "Huntsman's Chorus," and the beautiful "entre-acte," which leads to the most pious strain ever sung upon a stage, "Und ob die Wolke sich verhülle," were completed in March. On the 18th of April, a finishing hand was given to the "Wolf's Glen," one of the most daring musical ventures of modern days, for the effect of which Weber trembled to the last, more than for that of any thing he had ever composed, but which ultimately proved the "bouquet" of success in that great brilliant musical firework. The glorious finale, so full of light, and love, and faith, was completed early in May. On the 13th of that month the last note of the opera was written. In the whole work there was not one weak place. From the first to the last the pulse of Weber's genius had beat with unrelenting fervor and intensity. In the revision of his score, he himself cannot have found a single fault; for in the glorious manuscript, presented by his wife, after Weber's death, to the Royal Library at Berlin, not one single correction, not one single erasure of any one note is to be found. The notes seem to have rolled upon the paper like the purest pearls, as if conjured up by magic, and not written by mortal hand; and, certainly, the powerful concentration of mind, which permitted a man to write down such a work without the slightest blemish, belongs to one of the greatest phenomena of man's nature.

All now was ready; and on the 8th May the score was despatched to the director of the Berlin theatre, in order that the study of the choruses, in which so much of the principal effect of the work lay, might be commenced as soon as practicable. Immediately on arrival, the "Jäger's Bride" was destined to be re-baptized. In a letter from Brühl to Weber, acknowledging the receipt of the score, the former complains of the title as weak and colorless, and urges the adoption of that originally belonging to the legend, "Der Freischütz," as more analogous to the wild, romantic spirit of the subject. To this suggestion Weber at once consented. The half of the remuneration of eighty Friedrichs-d'or, for which Weber had arranged, on the cession of the opera to the court theatre of Berlin, was sent in June; and on deduction of the sixty ducats paid to Kind for the book, the sum of 388 thalers alone remained for Weber's share—a sum which was afterwards increased.

Italian Language.

Let us now turn to the double vowels, a fertile source of mispronunciation to foreigners, but which nothing more than the most ordinary attention will suffice to master, as no sounds are required that our language does not possess. In the combinations ai, ao, au, each vowel should be pronounced distinctly, with the accent generally on the a. It is common to hear au pronounced like our ow; but when the Messrs. Brown hear themselves called Brüh-own, they can profit by the lesson. So, when a is followed by other vowels, each must have its distinct utterance.

i, before another vowel, has the force of the German j and English y. It is a very common mistake to give each vowel its separate sound. Thus we often hear Giovanni, Miniato, Seggiola, Pagliano, Guiccioli, pronounced as having four syllables; thus Gi-o-van-ni, Mi-ni-a-to, &c., instead of Gi-o'-van-ni, Min-i-a-to, &c. So scienza, Pietro, fiasco, &c. are dissyllables. There are some words, however, in which the vowels io are pronounced separately: as mio, desio.

Finally, let us hope that no traveller, whose eye this may meet, will ever pronounce Duomo in three syllables, Doo-o-mo, when he is informed that u before a vowel is always equivalent to the English u. All pronounce Guido correctly. It is no more Doo-o-mo than Goo-es-do. So also vuolo, fucio, &c. If I can be instrumental in rooting out this one universal vice alone, I shall feel, as prefaces say, that I have not written in vain.

Of the consonants there is little to be said that cannot be found in any grammar. The error most usual and most carefully to be shunned is the depriving the double consonants of their full value. Thus, ecco is not like the English echo, nor bello like bellow. The sounds of hard c and l must be repeated; thus, ec-co, bel-lo. This error is by no means so common as the mispronunciation of the vowels. On the other hand the truth is as often overdone as come short of. Ardent students, while they shun one vice, sometimes run into the opposite extreme, and lose so much time between their consonants as materially to shorten the hour allotted by their master. One thing more, r must get its fair share of roll; but it would be well, in this case, as in the last mentioned, to heed the advice of Hamlet.*

A good deal is said by fresh arrivals about the Tuscan gutturals and the aspiration of the hard sound of c; also fault is found with the frequent application of the French sound of ch to soft c, and j to soft g, instead of the English sound (as in Charles and John) which the Romans use exclusively. But it would be well for such critics to bear in mind the friendly advice of yore to dwellers in glass houses, and get the beams out of their own eyes and other vowels before they bury themselves with the consonants of their neighbors. The Tuscans have too an Irish burr in their t, which should be only noticed to be avoided.

I suppose it is fair to concede the palm to the Romans in pronunciation, in spite of their drawling, singing, and clipping of final syllables. Their manner of speech is so distinct and sonorous that foreigners who pride themselves on their progress in Italian, often feel hurt, on their arrival in Rome, at what they think is intended to aid their apprehension. On the other hand, it is hard to ignore the Pantheon of great names in Tuscan literature; and so, by an equitable compromise, it has been agreed between the rivals to make a treaty on the following terms:—Lingua Toscana in bocca Romana. This gratifies the pride of both, and is repeated by both with similarunction. I would give the student, however, warning that the repetition of this phrase will not, to dwellers in the Peninsula, savor of originality; for it is fair to assume that, from time immemorial, no two persons ever approached the subject of the Italian language without one or the other quoting it, ore rotundo.

I have gone over thus cursorily the chief sources of error that exist in Italian pronunciation for those whose vernacular is English; but I feel persuaded that enough has been said to make it easy for any one, sufficiently interested to give the subject a fair degree of attention, to avoid the most glaring solecisms which pervade that kind of lingua franca spoken by most American and English tourists in Italy, and which bears about as much resemblance to the true thing, as the Chinese English at Macao does to our vernacular. To talk like a native Italian must of course be the lot of but few foreigners; yet there is a wide space between this height and the low level where most are content to remain. Time and very favorable circumstances are necessary to reach the summit; but it can never even be approximated unless the obstacles that beset the traveller are known and met with a determination to overcome them.

Although what I have said may be applied by the student for himself in practice, Italian pronunciation being singularly amenable to rule and free from exceptions, yet perhaps it may not be amiss to make some applications to words most frequently in use among travellers. In Rome and Naples the proper names oftenest in the mouths of tourists are anglicised; e.g. St. Peter's, the Coliseum, Vatican, Quirinal, Pincian, Tiber, Toledo, Vesuvius, Herculaneum, &c.—while few but a valet de place could recognize the Florentine lions in the various Protean changes they are made to undergo. The Cascone becomes a casino; the Pitti palace is made (what it certainly is not) petty; Boboli is slurred into Bobbully, and Fiesole is generally Fecooly; though I once heard the bold innovation of Fusyoli.

To provide in part against such mishaps, and at the same time to give some application of the foregoing remarks, I subjoin a number of words with their pronunciation indicated as nearly as may be in English; choosing those most often in use, that may thus serve to hang rules on that should be always kept in sight. Such attempts, however, at indicating Italian pronunciation in English can only be, at best, a very slight approximation.

In the first column I have marked by an 'accent the syllable on which the stress must be laid.

Cascone. *Cá-shee-nay. A plural noun, signifying dairy farms.

Palazzo. Pá-lát-to.

Pitti. Peet-tee. The first i shorter than the 2d.

Boboli. Bo-bo-lee. The 1st o rather open.

Uffizi. Oof-feet-see. The 1st i shorter than 2d.

Galleria. Gál-lay-ree-á.

Médici. May-dee-chee.

Sciènsa. Shen-tá.

Pèllico. Pel-lee-co.

Frighi. Pree-jo-nee.

Picciola. Pee-cho-lá.

There are also some colloquial expressions, many not inelegant, which it would be vain to expect to learn from books, at least from such as are usually put into the hands of students. It may not be amiss to subjoin a few of these for the benefit of the traveller, as a sagacious use of them will sometimes act as a talisman in ridding him of the vexatious importunities of the natives—turning him (in their eyes at least), like an irritated chameleon, from green to brown.

Che! or che! che! Poh! poh!

Va via! sometimes slurred into va'ia! Begone!

Come mai? How is it possible?

Già. Exactly, just so.

Sicuro. Certainly, of course.

Altro. A strong affirmative, meaning literally that and something more; equivalent, by a strange opposition of idiom, to our nothing else.

Tutt' altro. Quite the reverse.

Questo poi. As for that.

Non c'è male. Not bad.

Ma che vi pare? How can you think so?

S'accomodi. Be seated.

A rivederla. Stia bene. Farewell.

Faccia, faccia. Go on with what you were doing.

Don't let me disturb you.

Scusi. I beg your pardon.

ces. The same may be implied, without articulation, by raising the shoulders, and with the open mouth ejaculating, as if with difficulty, eh! eh! eh! Compared with this, Lord Barleigh's nod was sterile.

A long hiss, with the corners of the mouth drawn back, gives a strong assurance, in answer to a doubt expressed.

The noise we make, with the tongue against the palate, to express regret, implies, in Tuscany, a negative. The Neapolitans effect the same end by jerking up their head as if choking.

The manner of expressing a negative by the wagging of the forefinger horizontally has been well explained by Dickens in his "Pictures from Italy."

Charles Gounod.

Gounod was born in Paris on the 17th of June, 1818, and is consequently in his forty-eighth year. As a pupil of the Conservatoire he went through a course of counterpoint under the direction of Halévy, and worked under Lesueur and Püer for "composition idéale." In 1837 he obtained a Deuxième Seconde Grand Prix de l'Institut for the cantata "Marie Stuart et Rizzio." His name does not appear in the list of 1838; but in 1839 he was unanimously awarded the first prize for "Fernand," and, according to the usual regulations, started for Rome and became a denizen of the Villa Médicis. M. Gounod was in good company during the time he passed at the Conservatoire, for we find the names of Mmes. Castellan, Julian Van Gelder, Lavoye, MM. Roger, Achard, Alizard, Bonlo, (Singers); Croisilles, Gautier, Seligmann, De Garaudé, Dancie, Deldevez, Charlot, (Instrumentalists); Bazin, Maillart, Hy. Duvernoy (Composers), among his colleagues. While at Rome Gounod occupied himself especially with the study of religious music; and we hear of him four years later at Vienna as the composer of a Mass "à la Palestrina," given at the Church of St. Charles. On his return to Paris he accepted the post of Maître de Chapelle at the Church of the "Missions Étrangères," and seemed for a time to contemplate a change of profession, and to turn his thoughts to a religious career. In fact, he did (we believe) go through a certain part of the preliminary noviciat, and wore the ecclesiastical dress for some time. In 1846 it was almost officially announced that he had entered a convent. We hear nothing more of him until 1851; and it is a curious fact that the first really important notice on his works was written by the musical critic of a London paper—the Athenæum—in a compte rendu he gave of a concert at St. Martin's Hall, at which four of M. Gounod's works were produced. The article, which was most favorable, and spoke of the composition as "the work of an accomplished artist, the poetry of a new poet," and mentioned the great effect they had produced on the public, was generally attributed to M. Viardot (who has never denied the "soft impeachment"), and being reproduced in French a few days later, created great interest, as it was known that Gounod had a work in rehearsal at the Académie de Musique. On the 16th of April, 1851, "Sapho," a grand opera in three acts, libretto by Emile Augier, was produced; Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia and M. Gueymard (a debutant and ex-pensionnaire of the Conservatoire) being the chief interpreters. Though less successful than many of his future productions, the serious and original character of the music sufficed to show that the composer was a man of genius, and not to be treated à la légère; and this first essay, which was given some eight or ten nights only, gained its author more reputation than many operas, played a hundred nights and then heard no more, have produced for their composers. Gounod was "accepted" by the musical world—we do not allude to the "feuille de chou" which assumes that title—and the choruses which he wrote for a tragedy by Ponsard raised him still higher in public estimation. In this work he gave to his composition a quaint and ancient character, which showed the man of profound study and attention to couleur locale—a quality further developed in the chœur des Bacchantes in "Philemone et Baucis," the Kermesse of "Faust," the Chanson of "Mireille," &c. 1854 brought "La Nonne Sanglante," grand opera in five acts, with Scribe and Delavigne for partners; and in 1858 Gounod made a first essay in opera comique, and gave (Theatre Lyrique) "Le Médecin malgré Lui," a great success and justly named the "Barbier" of the works of French composers. Mmes. Moreau, Girard, MM. Meillet, Potel and Wartel were the principal artists. This was but a "happy prologue to the swelling act of the imperial theme." On the 19th March, 1859, "Faust" was produced at the same theatre. All our readers are aware of its great and well-deserved success; and the "Kermesse," "Salut Demeure," the duet, "the Soldiers' Chorus," the splendid trio finale, the Page's Song, &c., are familiar as Mr. Dickens' Household Words. The principal artists of the "creation" were Mme. Carvalho (Marquise), Mlle. Faivre—now Mme. Réty (Siebel), M. Barbot (Faust), M. Balanqué (Méphistophélès), and Mme. Duclos (Marthe).

"Philemon et Baucis" was given in 1860. Although the subject was bad to work upon, this opera added greatly to the composer's reputation, and, notwithstanding the weakness of the plot, held its place for a long time as the "pièce de résistance" on the bills of the Lyrique, thanks to the beautiful music it contains. (Mmes. Carvalho and Sax, MM. Bataille, Balanqué and Froment were the principal interpreters.) Next "La Reine de Sabir," given at the Grand Opera in 1862. This was at first unsuccessful, owing to the failure of the stage management in the mise-en-scène of the Scène de la Fontaine, and which caused the entire cutting out of the second act—one of the most interesting. Thanks to the energy of Gounod's publisher, M. Choudens, the opera was performed entire at Darmstadt during the succeeding year, and with great success. It has since been produced at Brussels, at Bordeaux, Marseilles, and the performance of an English version under the title of "Irene" was the chief attraction of last year's musical season at the Crystal Palace.

In 1863 M. Gounod returned to the Lyrique, and gave "Mireille" in four acts, founded on Mistral's charming Provençal poem "Mireio." This was a great success. Mmes. Miolan-Carvalho, Faure-Lefevre, Ugalde, MM. Monjaux, Ismael, and Petit were included in the cast. Some objection being made to certain situations in the piece, it was rearranged and compressed into three acts. It was re-produced in that form in December 1864, with nearly the same personnel—M. Michot vice Monjaux being the only important change—and had a run of some sixty nights.

"Tobias," a sacred drama, or, as the composer modestly insists on calling it, a "petit Oratorio," was written some years ago, and lately presented as a cadeau to M. Choudens, his friend and editor, as a slight acknowledgment for the eminent services he has rendered him. Of course any allusion to it at present would be premature and out of place in these columns. ("Tobias" being announced for performance in London.)

For the benefit and information of our lady readers, we beg to add that M. Gounod is married and has a family; and that at the present moment he is so deeply engaged on a most important work that he is naughty enough to neglect them. He seldom leaves his study; and, to conclude this notice with his own words, has been unkind enough to say "Quand je travaille je suis dans le Ciel: quand je suis de ma chambre je suis en—" Well, never mind where.—Orchestra, Feb. 27.

Haydn's Seasons.

(From the London Orchestra, Feb. 24.)

"The Four Seasons" in some strange phase of complimentary mythology have earned much bread, teased many brains, tired many hands. "The Four Seasons" have adorned long corridors, the walls of dining rooms, the ceilings of Presence Chambers, and as a Ballet have given ample scope to Shepherds and Shepherdesses, nymphs and swains, Dianas and Acteons, and an entire spiritualism of airy potentialities embodied by Kings, Queens, and courtiers moving about the stage dressed after the manner familiarized by the stereotypes of Watteau. No doubt it was the popularity of "The Seasons" as a ballet which led Haydn's friends to think of the possibility of turning the poem of Thomson into an Opera or some sort of Cantata, and when putting Thomson's Seasons into Haydn's hands, they well knew they had left the subject to the man of all others the most competent, and possibly the most willing to realize it in music.

Haydn was an obedient and tractable man; he desired to please Prince Esterhazy, he was compelled to listen to Baron von Swieten.

The one was his Patron, the other his Poet. Haydn's first Oratorio portrayed the change of Chaos into Creation; his second was intended to be the creation continued by the change of its Seasons. Prince Esterhazy wanted the first morn of September, a stag hunt, and a bacchanal chorus. Baron von Swieten preferred the quieter scenes of the girls at the loom, and the laughing chorus round the fireside. The libretto was not an opera, it could not be an oratorio, it was too large to be a cantata, and so it turned out a compound of all three, and it is now "Haydn's Seasons," immeasurably the greatest work of its great master, belonging to no school, but a standard for right and wrong in all schools. It has not yet been properly heard in this country. One reason is, performers, singers, and audience imagine it an oratorio, and so the band looks devout, the singers solemn, the audience prayerful. Another and the stronger reason is that the work is crushed by the mistaken imaginations of its translators. For example, the crash in the coda to the exciting wine revel, which in the original is given to the line, "Juhs! Juh! es lebe der wein," is Anglicized thus:—"The generous liquor praise;" and by this change the cheer of the Juhs! Juh! is tied up to the monosyllable "praise," and the whole intention and feeling of the composer destroyed. In another translation the "Juhs! Juh!" is translated with "Huzza." "Hip! hurra!" might possibly have been made manageable, but Huzza renders all proper execution hopeless.

The stag hunt, in its present dress, it is almost impossible to make out. The call, the finding of the quarry, the flight, the speed, the rush, the hounds at fault, the fresh start, the stag at bay, and shout of Ha-la-li at his death, all stand out in Haydn's chorus as so many scenes in an opera. The dogs begin to bark, the cry gets fiercer and fiercer, until the whole score is a pack of hounds—there are no pastoral inanities, no unnatural and ridiculous refinements of pastoral life, no foolish sentimentalities or cockney ignorance. Nothing short of a real chase would have satisfied Prince Esterhazy, and so Haydn puts off his court dress, takes off his diamond ring, dons the green, slings the large horn over and under his shoulders, mounts his hunter, and rushes over hill and ford and brook, and puts all this down in music because he felt it, and came to love it. The chorus is no tedious explanation, no careful description of the chase; it is simply a red-hot glowing photograph with a record of what the dogs said, the horns said, the hunters said, and the quarry did. The audience in Exeter Hall on Friday found out there was something in this musical rendering of what we may call a noble emotion, and some thought it like the Hallelujah Chorus; others imagined it better, many doubted, but all encored. It would be well in any analysis or description of the Grand Hunt to put out the notes of the horns, just because they are the real things, and secondly, because they divide the chase in its several scenes and enable the auditors to know the precise situation of the field and its doings.

If Baron von Swieten had been a good handicraftsman instead of a miserable worker he would have wedded together the day's chase and the wine revel with its accompanying dance. The intermediate recitative entangles the understanding and cools down the imagination, and separates three acts commonly in gentle life joined together. The wine chorus is of two parts—a choral hymn, so to write, in laudation of Bacchus, and then the villagers group themselves for the dance, and Haydn, taking for his theme a well known Austrian Sir Roger de Coverley kind of melody, set them to work, and in connection with this simple act of earthly humanity evolves a result of almost supernatural agency. There are laws of musical art—technicalities and absurdities—which have proved its curse, and are only believed in by the narrowest, fullest, and most superficial of composers. But underneath these lies the truth, and hence real composers have always written from one and the same code of laws; for such awaken thought and extract fire from the individual mind. The one set of laws poisons invention and breeds corruption. The laws lying under lead to a universal system of form and workmanship, and generate originality without calling up a pretended invention of new chords, new measures, phrases or rhythms. The one set fosters a formalized deformity, the other creates a distinct and certain style. Obedience to rule is easy because the rule is founded on truth, and it is found executive facility attends such obedience. A blockhead with patience may become respectable in counterpoint, for it is only a means to an end; but only such a seer and thinker as Haydn could have turned the electric affinities between sounds into such tone-painting as we find in this Bacchanal dance. Counterpoint is straw-stuffing when it is only counterpoint, but where used as Haydn here employs it, it is the fulfilment of a natural law, and the result is life, beauty, and joy. It is in such movements as this that the true artist in sounds—knowing well that all parts thereof have grown out of the universal law of harmony in its triple character of the sounds just heard, the sounds now heard, and the sounds next to be heard—falls back upon the opinion of Sir John Herschel, and inclines to imagine that although enough has been revealed to enable man to make music, its true fount and spring is still sealed and undiscovered. In England the chorus loses its national character, the drone of the bagpipe brings up no recollections, and the continued arch and cunning by-play of the second violins passes unperceived. We hear only the troll of tipplers, we see merely the whirl of merry, twinkling feet; but of fidelity and felicity in execution artists may and ought to judge, and these are they who eventually control the judgment of the public. Nothing endures but what always pleases, and if artists are always dissatisfied with any piece the dissatisfaction of the general community is inevitable.

Haydn's first composition was published in a collection of music made up of the works of many composers, who were announced thus: "Les noms inconus, bons à connaître." M. Fétis sneers at the "Seasons" as the weak effort of a failing old man, failing so fast that the imbecilities of the latter portion of the work stand out in striking contrast with the comparative vigor of the earlier portion. And a critic no less celebrated tells us that, were five or six arias of Sacchini interpolated into "this mass of harmony," the "Seasons" would receive "a celestial grace, an ease and a dignity which are now sought for in vain." As to the recitatives we are informed that "Porpora and Zingarelli would have done these better." As the recitatives chiefly deal with a morbid pastoralism, it is only necessary to remark that Haydn has worked from his own point of view, and truly this point is not that of either Porpora or Zingarelli, and his sight and his power have no place in the eyes or heads of those without doubt very respectable and amiable artists. With regard to the judgment of M. Fétis, it should be met with that by Beethoven, who was Haydn's pupil, just as Haydn commenced writing the Creation. "The Creation," said Beethoven, "must die." Under the guise of a pretended drama—an unreal, unnatural, rabbinical sort of commentary on the historical records in Holy Writ, there is much exquisite and lovely music, and many splendid specimens of choral weaving, exciting interest and almost demanding enthusiasm. One cannot refuse sympathy with the good and the beautiful, and assuredly not with the general purpose of the work, for the object and end thereof is great and noble; but the movements are all links of one feeling, and this is of the religion of the masque, the devout sentimentality of the concert room, and of those who seldom put their feet inside a church. There is much affectation of interest, little ebullition of sincere feeling. With Haydn nature-worship was strong. All his education was against such emotion, but his art gave him perception and the direction of his art the moral tone. In the representations of "purling brooks," "playful lambskins," "lusty steers," "warbling birds," "silent vales," and "horrid mountains," phrases which form the stock in trade of the nature poet of coffee houses and way-side inns, he is perfect. What can be more charming than his transcript of the early rising of the shepherd, the crow of the cock, and the release of the sheep, and their travel to the pasture ground? Beethoven has taken the motif for his opening movement of the Pastoral Symphony, and if he has not said less in the same number of bars, he has certainly not said more. Again in the Trio in F major 2-4 time (No. 23), how happily natural is the croaking of the frog, the call of the quail (taken bodily afterwards by Beethoven in his "Quail song"); and then there is the Curfew Bell (perhaps better done by Meyerbeer) and then in the "good night" chorus which follows, we find the nightingale, the quail, the cricket, and all animal creation invited to slumber and rest. All this is real Haydn, not to be learnt from Fux or Marpurg, nor of Porpora or Zingarelli. In such work second rates disappear whilst the true genius comes forth in giant splendor.

His picture of the "Mid-day Sun" is only second (if second) to its first radiant glow in the "Creation." But this is grievously marred by the interpretation of the translator:—

"Yon ruddy lines proclaim that now
The sun his course prepares to run.
He flames, in radiance full,
In glowing majesty."

The rising of the sun had been described in the previous movement, and admirably so—the shepherd standing still upon his staff, watching the advent of "the king of day." The chorus mark the sun in the heavens—its mounting and descending until its beams attain their full power and oppress the earth with their blaze and heat. Brief is the movement but full and perfect the picture, and most exquisite is the distress of nature revealed in the short tenor song (well sung by Mr. Sims Reeves) with its sordini accompaniment of violins, and its beautiful phrase afterwards unceremoniously borrowed and put into the "Robert" by Meyerbeer. In fact "The Seasons" has been the treasure house of all composers, unto which they have ever repaired in case of necessity and famine, and fed themselves to repletion. From Handel it is most difficult "to convey," but from Haydn the operation only requires escape from work and hardihood in moral courage! Hearing Haydn is like hearing an old Greek Hymn of Anatolus, pillaged by the Latins, and anatomized by Anglican hymnodists.

The choral "free fugues" in "the Seasons" are still fresh and young. The first (in F Major  $\frac{3}{4}$  time) is on the same theme as that used by Mozart in the "Domine" of the "Requiem"—"Quam olim Abraham promissisti." With Mozart it is the recognition of the oath strong and unchanging; in the Seasons the feeling is different—it is a prayer for blessing on the seed sown; there is in both the roll of the semiquavers in the bass, but each composer works his own way, and there is little room for comparison. Both movements are perfect. The chorus closing the first act, "God of light," with a fugue built on root harmony, although a favorite, is weak in comparison with many others in the work. The voices halt too often, the crescendo is broken, and the motion lags and is fretful. These blots much diminish choral vigor, and the effect is noise rather than grandeur. Of "the Storm Chorus" what can be said? Haydn here first pictured a tempest, and all other work of the kind is merely "engrafted work." Beethoven has not touched it in the Pastoral Symphony; Spohr is far behind in the Earthquake of the Calvary.—Rossini only reminds us of the better thing when we hear him in the William Tell; and Meyerbeer, if (in the Dinorah) he has conveyed a sense of more struggle in the elemental war, has not added aught of strength. Looking at this chorus and the Dance in the Wine Revel we may well say of its composer:

Vidit, scripsit, vicit.

It is some years since the "Seasons" was performed at Exeter Hall by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and although last Friday's solemnity was highly meritorious, there is unquestionably room for renewed study and practice. There are three or four translations of the work, and it is difficult to know which is patronized by the members of this Institution; the chorus, we believe, singing one translation, and the audience using another. It would be well to secure a revision of the libretto, especially in those portions where the picture is prominent in the music, to settle down to one translation, to obtain a somewhat more faithful delivery of the intentions of the composer, and if possible to infuse a natural, mundane, and (if we may so write) earthly spirit, a naturalistic reading, from the earnest and zealous members of the Chorus. "The Seasons" is not an oratorio; Exeter Hall is not a church.

Music Abroad.

FLORENCE. Quite an interest in classical, yes German, music seems to have sprung up in this ancient city of the arts, now the free capital of a new Italy. Is it among the signs of the new national life, that Beethoven and Mendelssohn, nay even Bach, and even Schumann, now find admirers where so lately only such names as Verdi, Donizetti, Mercadante and Petrella, scarcely Rossini, were in vogue? A friend sends us a budget of programmes and a copy of the Boccherini, a musical journal, organ of the "Società del Quartetto." The subscribing members to this Quartet Society receive not only the fortnightly Boccherini, but also, in the course of this "fifth social year," six pieces of classical chamber music, in the so-called Vade mecum edition, viz., a Quintet by Boccherini, a Quartet by Haydn, a Quintet by Mozart, a Beethoven Trio (op. 1) with piano, a Mendelssohn Quartet (op. 12), and the Mendelssohn Trio, op. 66. The number of the Boccherini before us contains a "chronicle" of the 6th, 7th and 8th concerts of the Quartet Society, which occurred in the latter half of December, before "a numerous and select audience." We translate a portion, showing the thing from an Italian point of view:

"In the sixth concert was heard the magnificent Quartet of the Chevalier Bazzini, which won the first prize at the Quartet Society of Milan. It is a work truly classical in kind, showing the uncommon genius of the author and his profound study of the classical masters. Bazzini is certainly no obscurantist [a term which Boccherini in another article applies to those who decry classical music]; his Quartet bears it written on its front. Most beautiful are the tempi, conspicuously so the Adagio and the Scherzo. . . The execution could not be better; the artists Becker, Masi, Chiostri and Hilpert, laid down the highest pledge there. The Quartet in D, op. 44, of Mendelssohn was then executed by the same artists with a precision and a perfect ensemble which awakened general admiration. The concert ended with Tartini's famous 'Trillo del Diavolo,' magically rendered by Becker.

"The seventh concert began with Schumann's Quartet, for piano, violin, &c., op. 47. The renowned pianist Carlo Andreoli made his first appearance in our Society, and won the best reception by the precision, the intelligence, the ease and the agility of which he gave fine proof in the execution of this quartet, as well as in Liszt's transcription of the March in Tannhäuser. The Schumann Quartet contains incontestable beauties, but lacks what is vulgarly called spolero [clear outline?] . . . The piece which had a success which might be called pyramidal is the Quartet in E flat, op. 44, by Mendelssohn, of which the Scherzo was repeated. The public, hearing such execution, seemed on the point of exclaiming enthusiastically: nec plus ultra. The interpreters were Becker, Masi, Chiostri and Jandelli.

"The eighth concert was very attractive, being in a certain sense a historical concert. The two opposite poles were the Quintet by Boccherini in A minor, op. 47, and the Sestet, op. 18, by Brahms. It is well known that Boccherini was, so to say, the creator of the Quartet style. There is a charming ingenuity in this piece. Melodious as always, it develops the musical ideas in a marvellous manner. Brahms is a young man of 32 years, who has already made a reputation in Germany. He belongs to the school of Schumann, and that of 'the Future.' This Sestet obtained the approval of the intelligent, but did not seem very clear in some parts; the harmony there is very daring, but robust, the melodic ideas not sparing. Between these two pieces was performed the Quartet of Beethoven in E minor, op. 59, a colossal work, which, interpreted to perfection under Becker's leadership, had a most splendid success."

Besides the concerts of the Quartet Society proper, the aforesaid Signori Becker and associates gave on the 19th and 26th of January two "Concerts for the execution of the works of Beethoven." The first programme consisted of the Trio in G, op. 4, for violin, viola and cello; the 10th Quartet, in E flat, op. 74; and the 16th Quartet, in C-sharp minor, op. 134. "In this concert," says the programme, "the hearer can confront the three manners of the great composer." In the second concert, the quartettists were assisted by "the celebrated pianist Fanny Jeremia," and the pieces were: 9th Quartet, in C, op. 59 (Rasounowski set); the "Kreutzer Sonata"; and 12th Quartet, in E flat, op. 127.

Another programme hails from a German-Italian partnership, Messrs. Scholz and Bazzini, who with the aid of Giovacchini, a leading resident violinist, and others, gave their second Accademia of chamber music on the 17th of January. On it we find: Beethoven—Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1; Mozart—Sonata in B flat, No. 10, for piano and violin; Bazzini—(a) Les Regrets, (b) Ballade ("lyrical pieces executed by the author"); B. Scholz—Concerto for piano and orchestra reduced to quartet.

Finally, Sig. Gennaro Perrelli, honorary pianist to his majesty the King of Italy, gave a concert with a very mixed programme. Sebastian Bach led off, in the Allegro of the Concerto in D minor, for piano, with quartet accompaniment, played by the Signori Professori Perrelli, Giovacchini, Laschi, Bruni, Sbolci and Campostrini. Then came: Duet, I Marinari, Rossini; Fantasia on Marta, composed and executed by Perrelli; Cavatina from Verdi's Rigoletto, sung by the Signora Emma Witzjak; Canzonetta by Mendelssohn, transcribed by Perrelli, with a two-part Fugue, executed in octaves, and a fantastic Rondo, composed and played by the said Perrelli; Neapolitan Canzonet by Mercadante, sung by Sig. Frizzi.—Part II. Romanza from Verdi's Luisa Miller; Fantasia on Trovatore; Romanza from La For- za del Destino—still Verdi; and Capriccio alla Mariska, by Perrelli.

Per contra. On the above named Scholz-Bazzini concerts the correspondent of a German paper remarks: "A so-called select public were assembled, who, however, at least for the most part, evidently could not distinguish good music from bad, nor a good rendering from a faulty one. Bazzini was never a player from whom one wished particularly to hear classical music; but now one may well feel alarmed when threatened with such an entertainment. The renowned fiddler massacred poor Beethoven, so, that it seemed as if the pianist smote the keys in wrath and tried to cover up the violin. Bazzini used the composition as a mere indifferent foil to his own egotistic purpose," &c., &c. But this writer gives high praise to the performers of the Società del Quartetto.

PARIS. The various means for educating the musical sense and taste among the people which have sprung up within a few years, such as the Popular Concerts of classical Orchestral Music in the Cirque Napoleon, the Orpheoniste singing clubs, the teaching of music in the schools, &c., have worked so well that the minister of public instruction has authorized the organization of a series of Chamber Concerts at the Lyceum Louis-le-Grand, where the pupils may have a chance to get familiar with the classical works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and all the nobler masters. In an article in the Journal des Débats, Jan. 26, M. J. d'Ortigue describes the pleasure with which he listened to the first programme. Mozart's G-minor Quintet was finely played under the lead of M. A. Holmes. Then followed a Sarabande by Bach; Beethoven's 10th Quartet; two Songs without Words by Mendelssohn, played by M. de la Nux, "classical pianist par excellence;" Adagio by Spohr; and Haydn's Trio in C. The writer hopes that this measure will be extended to the other lycées and schools. "M. Duruy (the Minister)," he says, thus manifests anew his great solicitude for the progress of musical instruction. His decree is actually in force in the lycées, whereby the study of solfeggio, of musical reading and dictation, and of singing together, are rendered obligatory through the first four stages and optional for the pupils of the higher schools. The new measure is the complement to these. To the education which is the fruit of the first theoretic principles, the elementary notions of the art, an education crowned by the practice of part-singing, is now joined this other education which results from the frequent hearing of the masterworks of the great composers. No one doubts that the chamber works of Sebastian and Emmanuel Bach, the eighty-three string quartets of Haydn, the ten of Mozart, the seventeen of Beethoven,—that the sonatas, trios, quintets of these three great geniuses, who form by themselves an august trinity around which the other masters group themselves at various distances,—that the compositions in the same kind of Boccherini, of Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, &c., are to musical instruction what the ancient authors, Greek and Roman, and the writers of our 17th century are to literary instruction. The knowledge of these masterpieces is the basis of all musical education, and they who are ignorant of them can never judge sanely of the works produced upon the lyric stage."

The Orchestra says:

Not fewer than seven societies of Chamber Music are in vogue now in Paris. Pasdeloup's weekly Sunday-afternoon and the Conservatoire grand fortnightly Concerts are crowded to excess. Classical music was never so much in the ascendancy among French amateurs as at the present time. Editions of classical masters are issuing from the press from more than one publisher. Music lessons, formerly at ten francs by the best masters, are risen to twenty! This, too, in spite of the 600 musicians annually sent forth from the schools. Paris is rich in female pianists of renown and promise—viz., Mesdames Massart, Scharvady (Claude) Martin, and Maleville. Mlle. Remaury, Mlle. Gayard, Mlle. Amélie Staps (from Brussels), Mlle. Elie, Mlle. Mengin, and the first prize of 1865—Mlle. Lack.

At the eighth Popular Concert of Classical Music on Sunday last the following selection was given:—Symphony in C minor, Haydn; Prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; Overture to Les Joyeuses Comtesses de Windsor, Nicolai; Rigodon (1737), Rameau; Symphony in C minor—Beethoven.

The Third Subscription Concert of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, the same day, provided the subjoined programme:—Symphony in C minor—Beethoven; Scenes and Chorus from Idomeneo—Mozart; Andante and Finale from the 38th Quartet—Haydn; "Air du Sommeil," from Armida—Gluck; Finale from The Mount of Olives—Beethoven; Overture to Euryanthe—Weber.

MUSIC IN PROSPECT.—The remaining two weeks of the month are rich in promise.

To-day, at noon, the usual Organ Concert at the Music Hall. Mr. WHITING will play.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening, Sacred Concert by Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN and Mr. G. E. WHITING, with the Choirs (which they conduct respectively) of St. Paul's Church and King's Chapel. Mrs. H. M. SMITH will sing "On mighty pens" and the "Spirit Song," both by Haydn; Miss CARY, Stradella's "Pieta, Signore"; Mrs. GILBERT, "O quam suavis," by Mendelssohn; Dr. GUILMETTE, bass solo: "O God have mercy," from St. Paul, Costa's "Date Sonitum" with chorus, Calcott's "The Soul's Errand," and Luther's Judgment Hymn (trumpet by Mr. ARBUCKLE); Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, bass solo from "The Creation." There will also be a Duet from Spohr's "Last Judgment," a Quartet, with tenor solo, "Thy sovereign grace," by Mendelssohn; a Quartet from Elijah; an original Quartet (without accompaniment) by Dr. Tuckerman; a Quintet from "Moses in Egypt"; the Miserere, which Beethoven wrote for four trombones, and which was performed at his funeral, now to be given as chorus of male voices with trombones and Organ; also Gounod's "Meditation" or the Bach Prelude, by violin, piano and organ.

Wednesday Afternoon, March 21. Last Concert but one of the ORCHESTRAL UNION, when Miss ALICE DUTTON will play Mendelssohn's "Serenade and Allegro Gioioso," for piano with orchestra.

Same evening, at Chickering's, Mr. HERMANN DAUM's first Piano Soirée, with aid of the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. Mozart's Trio in E flat, with clarinet; Beethoven's Sonata in C, op. 2, No. 3; Schumann's E flat Quintet; and songs by Schubert and Franz, to be sung by Miss RYAN.

Thursday, 22nd, at 4 P. M. Fifth (and last but one) SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association. Part I. A beautiful Overture, never heard here before, by Schubert, to "Fierabras." Mendelssohn's "Serenade and Allegro gioioso," by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, with orchestra. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, by Gade,—his first work, the one which so excited the admiration of Mendelssohn and of all Leipzig, when suddenly appeared among them this masterwork from a composer hardly heard of before, and he a Dane.—Part II. The music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," entire (overture, and other orchestral pieces, fairy choruses, and solos). The choruses by a select choir of ladies under the direction of Mr. B. J. LANG; solos by Miss HOUSTON and Mrs. CARY.

Saturday evening, 24th. For the first time in Boston, Haydn's "Seasons," with full orchestra and chorus, conducted by Mr. LANG. The solos by Miss HOUSTON, Mr. SIMPSON, of New York, and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN. We think many will be surprised by the freshness, genial beauty and variety of this "last work of an old man."

Sunday, April 1. First performance of Mendelssohn's great Oratorio, "St. Paul," by the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. Solos by Miss HOUSTON, Miss ANNIE CARY, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. WHITNEY.

Concert Review.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT, (Thursday, March 1). The Harvard Musical Association had new cause to congratulate themselves on the success of their experiment; and so had all the lovers of the noblest music, who were out that day in stronger force than ever, the weather being, for the first time, not absolutely stormy. We think it was voted the most interesting concert thus far; a little too long, to be sure; but then a little excess is warrantable once in a while, where everything is so good, and it would have been a pity to pull to pieces or in any way disturb the balance of a programme so unique and beautiful as this:

- 1 Overture to "Genoveva," (first time). . . . . Schumann.
- 2 Piano Solo Concerto, in G. (Op. 58). . . . . Beethoven.
- 3 Andante.—Rondo Finale. . . . . Mendelssohn.
- 4 Double Chorus, ("Hear us, Bacchus!") for Male Voices, from "Antigone." . . . . Mendelssohn.
- 5 Symphony in C major, No. 2, Op. 61. (first time). . . . . Schumann.
- 6 Introduction and Allegro. Scherzo. Adagio. Allegro vivace. . . . . Schumann.
- 7 Overture to "Der Wasserträger." . . . . Oberlin.
- 8 Chorus (No 2), from "Antigone," (first time). . . . . Mendelssohn.
- 9 Chorus of Dervishes, from "The Ruins of Athens," (first time). . . . . Beethoven.
- 10 Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens." . . . . " "

Here was a heavy task put upon the orchestra, to prepare so many new and formidable works, and in so short a time; ideals are sometimes unconsciously exacting; but when they are so well worth working for as this was, the successful labor is its own rich reward. And indeed our orchestra went through it admirably, never better; Mr. ZERRAHL had inspired his forces with no little of his own enthusiasm, which enabled him, though hardly risen from a most painful and exhausting illness of several days, and with the full use of only one arm (fortunately the right one), to take his place at the Conductor's stand and lead nearly the whole performance with even more than his usual efficiency; he had set his heart upon conducting that Schumann Symphony, evidently, even if his strength went no further! and that was the right temper for a good performance.

We were happily surprised at the success which that Symphony had with the audience; a long, elaborate work by the "mystical," "involved," "transcendental," "unintelligible" Schumann, a man whose name has been such a bugbear with so many; a Symphony so contemptuously treated two years ago in London by all the critics, Athenaeum, Musical World, Orchestra, &c., (although, thanks to Madame Schumann's visits of late, Schumann's music is at last penetrating the thick rind of English prejudice, so that it already counts important circles of admirers there, and is likely to keep its place upon the concert bills of far as well as Mendelssohn). It was heard with profound attention, much applauded, and talked over with delight afterwards in many circles. Of course there were exceptional cases of those who did not appreciate it at once, or feel that it came home to them like Beethoven and others; but even these listened respectfully and did have some dim sort of feeling that there was power and genius there, that there was a man behind it not to be set at naught. Naturally enough the first Allegro with its sombre, brooding, yet determined, stately introduction, proved the least clear and satisfactory; and we have Schumann's own word for it, that he wrote it in a morbid period (disease of the brain) and that the struggle of the spiritual will to overcome the physical infirmity was the very inspiration of it. And it is wonderfully worked out, if you but study it and get enough familiar with its motives to watch their artistic and symmetrical development. The slow introduction quickens suddenly into a brighter bit of melody, but this is not the real entrance, only a foregleam, of the Allegro, suggested in the oboes, flutes, &c., a positive, clear theme enough, to which those sudden twitches of the first violins from very high to very low tones suggest a sort of neuralgic accompaniment, in short the very enemy aforesaid. When presently we are launched for good upon the Allegro, and the melodic main theme gradually and surely gets the better of all the unquiet elements, we have a beautiful result worked out and can look back and realize the grand unity of the whole. The charm is not so much in the themes, which are not remarkable in themselves, as in the composition.

The Scherzo was found more enchanting; so rich in ideas, the moody, half playful earnest and even sadness of its main subject so finely contrasted by the cheery Spring-like triplets of the first Trio, and again by the placid stream of the second Trio, set in charming relief by the figurative staccato of the viola and 'cello parts and the delicate contrapuntal working out of all that. The Adagio, too, charmed by its heavenly beauty, so deep in feeling, so high and spiritual in thought, so warm and tender in color, one of Schumann's highest moments! The exceedingly swift Finale, by its inexhaustible energy, keeping up its strong flight so long and yet never letting the mind sink wearied, swept all resistlessly along with it. If the two middle movements charmed most, this was most exciting; so might Ganymed have felt when borne aloft by Jove's strong eagle. The instrumentation is rich and ingenious throughout. In fine, did we not find that we could enjoy Schumann, even if he be not by many degrees a Beethoven? It is needless to say that this work adheres essentially to the usual form of Beethoven and the rest, both in the symphonic form proper of the first Allegro and in the contrasted character of the four movements.

But Beethoven carried the day of course, and by divine right of the truest sort of kings, in that wonderful Concerto in G. Nothing in the programme gave such unalloyed, entire delight as that. It is the most poetic, perhaps, of all the Concertos, the product of a rare mood, the finest temper of creative fancy. That in E flat, which Mr. Dreßel played, is grander, more heroic; but this, in a more delicate and moody way, is quite as finely imaginative. No praise can be too much for Mr. LEONHARD's rendering of it; in technical respects and in poetic, nice conception and feeling of every beauty, in thoroughly musical and vital touch, it lacked nothing, nor, as a whole, could we conceive of its being played better. The Allegro is extremely difficult, a series of fitful passages, short flights of fancy, delicate and bold, in which a certain wilful plenty of bravura is thoroughly vitalized with poetry,—coruscations and reflexions, as it were, from the highly charged orchestral background where the continuity of the main theme is all the time kept up. All these passages were played with perfect precision and fine accent, no exaggeration and no falling short; even those double trills in the same hand, which one would think too much for any mortal fingers, came out clear and even; and the elaborate cadenza by Moscheles, in which he struck out the great chords with such Beethoven-like fire, made great effect. The Andante, short as it is, and simple, is a piece of transcendent beauty, full of meaning. Here the musing, subdued cantabile passages in answer to the repeated stern call of the orchestra, were so purely musical and chaste that, in this interval of ideal, inward music, we forgot for once all about execution, to be made pleasantly aware again of its triumphs, in a lighter form, by the graceful Rondo Finale, with another Moscheles cadenza. Mr. Leonhard, we believe, had never played with orchestra before, and he at once placed himself in the front rank. Certainly we have reason to be proud of our pianists in these concerts. Beethoven must have been something of a piano virtuoso in his younger days. He composed this Concerto in 1806, and played it in one of his own concerts in December, 1808, one of the critics speaking of it as: "A new forte-piano Concerto of prodigious difficulty, which Beethoven executed surprisingly well in the most rapid tempi." Thayer, in his Catalogue, tells us that Herr Carl Haslinger in Vienna possesses Cadenzas to this Concerto in Beethoven's own hand-writing; two of them to the first movement, one of which—with very difficult double trills near the end—is superscribed by Beethoven: "Cadenza (ma senza cadere)." The Concerto in G has been played twice before in Boston some dozen years ago, once by Robert Heller, the magician (!), and once by Jaell; but never as it was played this time. The admirable instrument (the same, we believe, used by Mr. Lang before), which seemed to us the best Concert Grand that we had ever heard in that or any hall, must again claim some of the credit of the pianist's triumph; however strongly he might smite the chords, the tone was still musical and free, losing none of the liquid, sympathetic quality it had in softer passages.

The two overtures, the first entirely new, and the other as good as new, to a Boston audience, were singularly and characteristically interesting to the more earnest class of musical students, though neither of them seemed to be quite appreciated by most listeners. Schumann's only opera, "Genoveva," failed in Leipzig and went no further,—greatly owing, no doubt, to its ill-chosen romantic subject. The overture is what survives, and is in truth a rich, original, artistic work. It suffers, however, on first hearing, from that cloying over-richness which Schumann sometimes puts into his more sentimental works, a certain crowding of the harmony, resulting in a style for which our Blair's Rhetoric term "turgid" would be too disrespectful, but which is graphically described by the German "schwülstig." On repeated hearing, however, the overture grows upon one in spite of that, by its intrinsic art and beauty; and it is freshened up once or twice by breezy horn passages, which bring the woods about us.—We wondered that the Overture to the "Wasserträger" (the "Water Carrier," called in French "Les deux Journées") excited so much less interest with many than that to "Anacreon." Charming as that is, the Wasserträger is certainly greater, one of Cherubini's very best, with much more matter in it, more wealth and individuality of ideas. The introduction is incomparably larger, grander, more impressive and significant; and after the Allegro sets in, it is all full of brilliancy and subtle charm. It can only be because so much else had gone before to tax the mind and sate the appetite.

The chorus singing was much better than in the former concert. The "Bacchus" chorus, in spite of a slight hitch in the accompaniment, sounded splendidly. But the great success was the other chorus from "Antigone," that quiet, moralizing movement in six-eight measure, which fairly took the audience captive. Close upon these tuneful reproductions of the classical spirit of old Greece, another magician (Beethoven) lifts his wand and summons up the barbaric hordes of Mahomedan Dervishes, shouting their fanatical and frenzied "Ka-a-ba" amid the "Ruins of Athens," to the whirling, irresistible accompaniment of the orchestra; all in unison, but so relieved and enriched by the strange instrumentation that the ear craves no harmony. It is one of the most original conceits of Beethoven,—a pure act of creative genius, seizing and reproducing the very spirit of the Turkish devotee. Very amusing, too, and quaint withal. It was capital-ly sung; and the "Turkish March," from the same work, came fitly after to complete the picture and the concert.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The ninth Wednesday Afternoon Concert offered the "Pastoral Symphony," the Overtures to Semiramide (Rossini) and Anacreon (Cherubini), a couple of vocal pieces, and a Strauss waltz "by request." We arrived unfortunately too late to hear the debutante, Mrs. BISHOP, (a sister of our excellent Wulf Fries) in her principal piece, the romance from William Tell. We heard a trivial ballad, "Beware," to Longfellow's words, from which we could only make out the fact of a soprano voice sweet and pure in quality, and a manner indicating good cultivation. From the way in which the lady was received on this second appearance it was plain that she had already won the good graces of her audience. Many were glad, and we among the number, to hear the Anacreon overture again; for, though it has not so much in it as that to the Wasserträger, it presents its simple, happy, unpretending stock of ideas in such a hearty, genial way, that one must needs be charmed with it. It is not a great overture; neither was Anacreon a great poet, but one still ever fresh and charming to converse with nevertheless. The old Symphony is good as ever; its colors stand.

Of the tenth concert the chief point of interest was an overture by a composer wholly new to us, Norbert Burgmüller, of whom Schumann had high expectations, lamenting his early death in the same sentence with that of Schubert. His name is often mentioned with interest among German musicians and in German musical journals. He has left several works which are always alluded to as interesting and important, among them a Symphony which there have been some hints of bringing out here. On the whole, a musicianlike character, clever in all, but with no decided individuality of genius, is the verdict generally passed upon him. This overture, according to the bills, belongs to an unfinished opera, "Dionysius." We found it really interesting, largely and well laid out, richly instrumented, beginning like a Symphony and the principal themes, which set in later, striking in themselves and well carried out. We hope to hear it again.

The charming E-flat Symphony of Mozart showed the wealth of genius, not so much in its want as in its independence of our modern means; what color it can create, what contrasts, what effects, even with no trombones, no oboes, only one flute. The "Bridal Procession" from Wagner's Lohengrin, not without its delicate beauty as well as strength, was just the opposite to this,—less genius, covetous of all means.—Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZ played a Violin Concerto by De Beriot, No. 2, in C-sharp minor, difficult, and one of the less trivial of modern concert pieces' with an easy mastery and a truth and sweetness of tone, which won him much applause. A waltz by Gungl followed. The audience was very large, with some reflux of the gabbling throng of old, who sit down in a concert room to talk over their own affairs, their shopping and other gossip, to the unheeded accompaniment of the orchestra, annoying and insulting those who care for music.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fourth concert of the season, and the finale, last Tuesday evening, was too rich a feast to be discussed at this moment in the little remainder of space in which we are cornered.

MUSICAL LIBRARY. The attention of musical persons is called to the sale announced for next Wednesday, by Messrs. Leonard & Co., of an uncommonly valuable private library of musical works. It was collected in the course of a long life, in England, by Mr. WM. E. VINER, an English organist of high standing, who has resided a few years past in Western Massachusetts. It numbers between five and six hundred works, mostly bound, and good editions; embracing quite a number of full scores of Symphonies, of Mozart's and other operas, of Concertos, &c.; Handel's Oratorios, in Clark's and Arnold's editions; much standard organ music, numerous piano and vocal scores of operas, masses, &c., &c. Here will be a chance for each one to pick out something to fill gaps in his library.

ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY. Our German part-singers improvised a performance the other evening in their pleasant club room, of quite peculiar and touching interest. It was the presentation of a gold watch and chain to their honored teacher and conductor, who had served them so faithfully so many years, Mr. AUGUST KREISSMANN. The state of his health alone has obliged him to resign his post, to the sincere regret of all. We trust that in his contemplated visit to Europe during the coming season he may "renew his strength like the eagles" and return to us the same sweet singer as before, with no end of Franz songs.

Music in New York.

(From an Occasional Correspondent.)

MARCH 13. As I perceive, Mr. Dwight, that your regular supplies from New York have lately fallen short, perhaps the result of a little predatory warfare in the field of criticism may not be altogether unacceptable from a volunteer.

To begin at the end, the last musical event up to date was the Fourth concert of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, on Saturday evening last. The orchestra performed Schumann's beautiful and (here at least) little understood third Symphony in a less perfect manner than we are accustomed to from this experienced body of performers; besides Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and Wagner's introduction to his "Tristan and Isolde." For the latter highly suggestive and poetic work, which has been already performed here at Mr. Theodore Thomas's last Symphony Concert, we confess a more than common admiration. Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN played Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto in a perfectly blameless manner; with finish, grace, ease, clearness, and intelligence, to which his unaffected manner adds another charm. The vocal portion of the programme was less happy; Senorita POCH, a lately debuted mezzo-soprano belonging to the Italian opera troupe, sang the hack-nied "O mio Fernando" and "Selva oscura" (the latter from Rossini's "Tell") in a pleasing yet mediocre style; and, on a "claque" encore, a coarse Spanish song, which, however in place it might be in the lemon alleys of Granada, or the wild passes of the Sierra Morena, was altogether out of place in a Philharmonic concert.

Meyerbeer's "Star of the North" was brought out last week at the Opera. This work, the third of those which have given Meyerbeer his reputation, originally produced in Berlin in 1844, under the title "Eis Fiedlager in Schlenien," is also memorable in the annals of music, as the opera in which, re-christened "Tielka," the Lind gained, a few years afterwards, some of her first laurels, and began to sing down the adverse criticisms which her original manner and voice had at first awakened. The work is presented with as much spectacular effect as the limited resources of our Academy of Music will permit; the cast is tolerably good; Miss Kellogg, pleasing and intelligent as ever; but the principal female part calls for greater vocal means than the favorite chanteuse légère of the American opera possesses.

Handel's great oratorio "Samson" was brought out by the HARMONIC SOCIETY at the church of the Puritans, last Thursday evening. Under the musician-like and energetic direction of Mr. F. L. RITTER, this society is gradually regaining the prestige and influence which it had lost under his predecessors; and, a sure touchstone of the most genuine kind of success, the opposition of mercenary and undisciplined criticism. The performance of last week created a deep impression among our music-lovers, and we understand that in acceptance of a liberal offer from prominent citizens of Brooklyn, the oratorio will be shortly repeated in the Rev. H. W. Beecher's church there. What shall we say of the effect produced on ourselves by this colossal work? It is one "too deep for tears," or speech either.

Anything surpassing the sublime pathos of the airs "Total eclipse," "Return, O God of Hosts," "How willing my paternal love," "Go Sons of Israel," we cannot recall in the whole repertoire of sacred music, while many of the choruses rival, in breadth of conception and effect, some of the finest in the "Messiah." Often as we have heard this work in Europe, under the intelligent direction of Costa and other famous conductors, it never failed to create in us anew a deep surprise, as well as admiration. It is a creation whose grandeur cannot be measured at once, even by the broadest and best instructed minds. The production of "Samson," last week, was highly satisfactory and encouraging to the Society, especially when we consider the difficulties of a first performance—for it is twenty years since "Samson" has been heard in New York! "Tell it not in Gath!" The judicious cuts were made according to approved English tradition, and the directions of Handel himself. A fine Steinway piano-forte was added to the orchestral force (selected from Mr. Theo. Thomas's orchestra); quite a Handelian accompaniment, as Handel students well know; that composer having frequently made use of two piano-fortes, in addition to the organ, and orchestra. They were probably not quite such sonorous adjuncts to his harmonies as those we are fortunate enough to possess, however. The Soli were entrusted to Mesdames RITTER and BRAINERD, Messrs. SIMPSON and THOMAS.

Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK has given two of three subscription concerts, the principal features of which have been the production of that gentleman's piano-forte compositions, besides a Beethoven Sonata as bonne bouche, each evening. Mr. Goldbeck has been assisted in the vocal selections by several of our amateurs.

The MASON and THOMAS Quartet Soirées continue at bi-weekly intervals as usual, and still attract the usual small but appreciative circle of listeners.

Mr. MORRIS, the well-known organist, is displaying his technical abilities on the king of instruments in a series of concerts, the very mixed programmes of which cause in us the liveliest regret that this performer should commit such a mistake, as to suppose it is necessary to do such things, and not do better things. The old-fashioned and old foggy days of trashy programmes are gone by, when the artist thought it necessary that the flies should outnumber the plums in the pudding. Not that we would have all Bach, all Handel, all Mendelssohn; but give us good light and short things, and clear away the rubbish and clap-trap. Far be from any intelligent American citizen the barbarism of musical know-nothingism, but we cannot avoid holding out for the imitation of this English organist, the example of our native player, the modest and talented Mr. WARREN, whose admirable playing and well-chosen programme of organ music, displayed as much good taste, as sound information in the literature of his instrument.

Mr. THEO. THOMAS's last Symphony Concert will take place next Saturday, when an interesting programme will be performed. There was a rumor, which unfortunately seems to have died away, that Beethoven's Ninth Symphony would be heard yet this season, under this gentleman's direction. But, quien sabe? VERITAS.

PHILADELPHIA. Grover's German Opera company have been bringing out some good things which are too seldom heard in this country: William Tell, the Magic Flute, La Dama Blanca, Fra Diavolo, not to name Don Juan, Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, Krentzer's Night in Granada, Freyschutz, Faust, Martha, &c. But was Fidelio too good for the Philadelphians? They had their revenge in William Tell, which will not the next time, we trust, be found too good for Boston. The Bulletin, 6th inst., thus speaks of the performance:

As a whole, the performance was the best of this opera that we have ever had here. The orchestra, led by Mr. Neuendorf, was excellent, and the glorious overture was heartily applauded. Mr. Habelmann took the modest part of the fisherman, and sang the opening song deliciously. Mr. Himmer played "Arnold," a part written for an exceptional tenor voice, and he was obliged in several cases to transpose or resort to a falsetto. But he sang carefully, expressively and intelligently, and in the concerted pieces especially, his voice was effective. Mr. Steincke played "Tell"; but, giving him full credit for his earnest efforts, we are constrained to say that his voice is not now equal to the music, and it is a matter for congratulation that this evening, when the opera is to be repeated, the part will be taken by Wilhelm Formes, who is said to possess a fine barytone voice.

The fine voice of Mr. Hermanns showed to great advantage in the concerted pieces, though he had only an unimportant part. Mr. Weinlich was good as "Geisler," and Mr. Armand and other gentlemen of the company did their parts well. Mlle. Naddi appeared to advantage as "Mathilda." The exquisite song, "Sombre forêt," was sung by her with great grace and tenderness, but there was a misunderstanding with the orchestra towards the close, in both verses, which ought to be corrected before this evening. Mlle. Dziuba was admirable as Tell's son, and Mme. Pichonazzi was as good as his wife. A lovely trio for the three female voices, in the third act, which is usually omitted, was sung last evening with beautiful effect. The original opera, which is extremely long, always has to be "cut"; but the Germans do not make the same cuts as the Italians, and their version, last evening, made so very good an impression, that it is fair to presume that it is the most judiciously arranged. With all the cuts, the opera was not over till near twelve o'clock.

The Bulletin calls Mozart's Magic Flute (in which Mlle. Naddi made a successful debut as Queen of Night) "a dreamy, tiresome opera, with a story as senseless as a nursery rhyme, and with music which may interest antiquarians, but is a dreadful bore to those accustomed to the modern style." (!) If all the good the Trovatores and the Africaines do is to bring the musical critics to this pass, the Lord deliver us from the "modern style!" Cannot we dispense with all the modern confectionery better than we can afford to lose the taste for wholesome apples, plums and peaches?

How the various series of concerts are progressing we may judge from a few extracts from the correspondent of the New York Weekly Review:

Tuesday afternoon, the twenty-seventh, brought around the sixth of Mr. Wolfsohn's Matinees, when he played the Sonata Pathétique, C minor, op. 13, the one in E flat-major, op. 7, and in A flat major, op. 110. To praise the performance would be superfluous, for until Mr. Wolfsohn fails it will be safe to assume that his performance was entirely satisfactory. He is so anxious, however, to impress his audience with the peculiar power and beauty of the sonatas, that yesterday he made a very pleasant and earnest little speech in which he tried to convey in a few words the influence of the circumstances of Beethoven's life on his genius, and the utterance he had given to these pious compositions, of the power, beauty, melody and passion condensed into them; but while Mr. Wolfsohn's brain, working through his execution, expresses them so well, those who need words to help them understand, must be indeed deaf and obtuse. The next Matinée will not be given until March the 20th, when the well known C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2, will be given among others.

The Germania had a miserably rainy day for their last rehearsal, and consequently a poor house; they gave Hummel's Concert overture, Torzetto from Atila, Verdi; Larghetto from Second Symphony of Beethoven; Overture Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Romance from Robert le Diable, and the first Finale from Il Templario.

Thursday afternoon, Mr. Jarvis gives one of his delightful concerts, the fourth of this season, when he gives Beethoven's Sonata for Piano, op. 22; a Violin Solo, Etude in D flat of Henselt, Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor, and Schumann's Trio in D minor for Piano, Violin and Violoncello.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Cobbler, to thy bench returning. (Puo tornare al tuo panchetto). Duet and Trio.

"Crispino e la Comare." 75

The famous scolding Duet between Crispino and Mirabolano, which changes into a Trio when Fabrizio interposes. The allusions to former and present occupations of the disputants, are extremely amusing. The piece is long, but not difficult, goes quickly, is suited to three bass voices, or bass and baritone, and is a capital thing to amuse a party or an audience.

Times hab badly change' old massa now. Freedman's Song. H. G. Spaulding. 40

One of the best of the more recent negro songs. Mr. S. heard the melody quite recently, in Florida. It was sung by a colored man. The words could not be distinguished, but the haunting sweetness of the air seemed to call for its publication, and new words have been skillfully supplied.

Father, source of every blessing. Tantum Ergo. Solo and Chorus. C. P. Morrison. 40

A fine quartet for church service, with a very sweet, gliding melody.

I will remember. Q't. (Morning and evening.) 40

Another of Southard's excellent compositions. Similar in character to other members of the series.

True love it is worth keeping. Mrs. Parkhurst. 30

The words are by Mrs. Kidder, and both poetess and composer have that rare talent, which is not so much that of writing the best music and words, (although these are excellent), as the fine skill of exactly suiting the public taste.

It is a good thing. (Bonum est.) Quartet.

J. B. Marsh. 40

Not difficult, and a good anthem or chorus as well as quartet.

Instrumental.

Crown Jewels. No. 7. False one, I love thee still. A. Baumbach. 40

An excellent piece for learners, of easy medium difficulty, and carefully fingered. It also bears marks of Mr. Baumbach's excellent taste in arrangement.

L'Africaine. (Revue melodique. No. 24.) 4 hands. Beyer. 90

The melodies of the opera, well arranged for two performers.

Nightingale, or Bird polka. E. L. Hime. 30

Lively and pretty.

Juanita. (Crown Jewels, No. 30.) A. Baumbach. 40

An excellent arrangement for learners. Not difficult.

The Crystalline waltzes. For guitar. M. Jung. 30

As the name indicates, a succession of "crystalline" arpeggios. Very pure and sweet music.

Danse Napolitaine. Morcean de Concert.

Sydney Smith. 60

Brilliant and effective.

Five o'clock in the morning. Varied by Grobe. 60

A favorite song, well varied.

Jolly Dogs, or Slap Bang galop. C. H. Marriott. 30

The jolly dogs are on a new "lark," it seems. A very bright and merry galop.

Books.

STUDIES FOR SKILLFUL EXECUTION. By L.

Köhler. Op. 135. Book 2. $2.00

These studies are quite difficult of execution, and well calculated to develop the manual dexterity of a player already considerably advanced. They are carefully fingered, (foreign fingering), and furnish an acceptable addition to the libraries of music teachers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

WEBER'S MANNER OF COMPOSING.

WEBER'S manner of creation and composition was in itself too remarkable to be overlooked. Many a time in the autumn might he be seen on the Brühlische Terrasse, or in the Grosser Garten, at hours when the fashionable world of Dresden was not there, with some closely-written pages in his hand, which he stood still and read, and then wandered on muttering to himself. He was learning by heart the words of "Euryanthe." He studied them until he made them a portion of himself—his own creation as it were. His favorite pupil Benedict has done the world the service of putting down on paper, at the time, the few remarks which fell from the great master, in confidential moments, as to his own creative process. According to these notices, the genius of the composer would sometimes long lie dormant during his frequent repetition of the words; and then suddenly the idea of a whole musical piece would flash into his mind like a sudden gleam of light into the darkness. It would then remain there uneffaced, gradually crystallizing itself, as it were, into a perfect shape; and not till this process was attained was it put down on paper. His first transcription of his ideas took place early in the morning, after a very frugal breakfast, as he stood at his desk. The completion and instrumentation of all the various elements of an idea were undertaken in the evening. In his first sketch he generally noted down the voices fully, and only marked here and there the harmonies, or the places where the wind-instruments were to be introduced. Sometimes he indicated by signs, known only to himself, his most wonderful and characteristic orchestral effects. These sketches, nevertheless, were so incomplete that neither Meyerbeer, with all his profound experience, nor Marschner, with all his similarity of feeling, was ever able to comprehend the scattered scores of "The Three Pintos," so as to complete the work; although both the great masters had heard Weber play considerable portions of the opera. In fact, he was accustomed to play to his wife, to Benedict, and others, great fragments of any work on which he was engaged; and such fragments invariably possessed the form they afterwards maintained. The whole was already so firmly stereotyped upon his brain, that his instrumentation was little more than the labor of a copyist; and the notes flowed to his pen with the indications of all the shadings of expression, such as the pianos, the fortes, and the pauses, as if copperplated on the paper. From the nature of this peculiar mental process may be comprehended the enormous quantity of work which Weber was able to get through in an almost incredibly brief period. The whole transcription of the complete opera of "Euryanthe," from his sketches, occupied only sixty days of labor. Not that the composer, when once the last note was put on paper, considered all that he had written was perfection: on the contrary, he frequently bestowed the labor of many days upon alterations in his score, after first representations, or in accordance with convictions which had forced themselves upon him during rehearsals. Thus the finale of the second act of "Euryanthe" was three times remodelled; and the overture was modified by the introduction of the spectral passages, after the first rehearsals of the orchestra; and upon these corrections the same neatness was bestowed as on his wondrous "copperplate" scores.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH BEETHOVEN.

Early in the year (1828), a correspondence, forming an event in Weber's life, took place. The Dresden capellmeister had been so fortunate as to secure for his own theatre—not without much trouble, annoyance and counter-intrigue of the customary kind, however—the services of Wilhelmine Schröder, who was now quickly ripening into one of the most dramatic singers of her time. With such a prima donna he at last saw a chance of giving, with effect, the great dramatic work of the giant Beethoven, "Fidelio." This opera, which Weber often spoke of as "one of the greatest that mortal mind had ever created," he had long desired to give; and he would not have professed that reverence for all that was great in art, which was one of his distinguishing characteristics, had he not sought to obtain, by all the means in his power, every advantage that might enable him to give the most perfect effect to the music. For this purpose, Weber resolved to address the great musician himself: and a voluminous correspondence, upon the subject of "Fidelio," ensued between the two celebrated composers. It may be considered a serious loss to the artistic world that this remarkable correspondence should have hopelessly vanished, through the negligence of those who had the care of Weber's papers after his death. One little fragment of Weber's rough sketch of his first letter, in which he expresses his high admiration of the great German composer's genius, and begs his assistance in the production of his work, alone remains. Beethoven, in spite of his habitual rudeness and inaccessibility to advances, seems to have received Weber's proposition in the most friendly spirit, and to have entertained towards him the most amiable feelings. At all events, the rough old man, who was incapable of the slightest taint of hypocrisy, in a subsequent letter to Könnertiz, in which he acknowledges the receipt of a remuneration of forty ducats for the performance of "Fidelio" in Dresden, speaks of Weber as "my dear friend." A subsequent personal acquaintance between the two great men added strength to this mutual feeling of friendship: and all that has been said and written respecting the antipathy and even bitter acrimony of one towards the other has been invented either by ignorance or malice.

The score of "Fidelio" was sent by Beethoven himself to Weber; and the opera was produced upon the Dresden boards, on the 27th April, after fourteen rehearsals, conducted by the capellmeister with even more than his customary zeal and care. Wilhelmine Schröder, in the principal part, although she had not yet attained the artistic maturity of the time when she was universally hailed as the one and the true representative of the heroic Leonora, surpassed all expectations, and contributed greatly to the enormous success of the opera.

ODD FELLOWS.

A strange society had been for some years established in Vienna. It consisted of almost all the literary, scientific, and artistic "men of mark" of the day, and was accustomed to meet at the "Blumenstöckel," a small inn in an obscure street of the capital. This society had gradually acquired a great European reputation, under the name of the "Ludlam's Höhle," although its drift and avowed tendency were only to encourage "the art of divine nonsense." Harmless as it was, it was destined eventually to meet its death by the hands of the police. But in these days it flourished, and carried its avowed art to the sublimest pitch of perfection. A naked Bacchus bestrode the pot-house door; a narrow winding stair led down into a sort of cellar-room, where the profane were allowed to eat and drink in their own low way: but through this public room was another long, low, dark, smoky chamber, which was the holy sanctuary of the illustrious "Lud-lam's Höhle." As the society increased in numbers, the further wall had been broken down and the narrow space enlarged. And in clouds of the densest tobacco-smoke, at bare deal tables, on bare deal benches, was wont to sit all the art, science, wit, and learning of Vienna. The Ludlamites called themselves "bodies;" all other mortals were mere "shadows;" and a neophyte was obliged, on being admitted into the sanctuary, to lay aside his "shadow" name, and take a "bodily" designation. Its chief, or "Caliph" as he was called, was the actor Schwartz, who sat on an elevated seat, as on a throne, with his round red stolid face. All the leading men of the day took fancy names of the wildest and strangest description, but all bearing some analogy, however remote, to their standing, character, temper, or past life.* Although nonsense, and in modern parlance "chaff," were avowedly the objects of the society, it followed naturally from such an assemblage of eminent men, that, in the midst of the production of comic music, drawings, caricatures, and equivocal wit, it was impossible that art, and science and literature should not be discussed. In its influence in this respect the "Ludlam's Höhle" was looked up to as a mighty engine of power; although never was this power known to have been misused. It was into this awful and semi-mysterious society that it was determined Weber should be inducted.

Weber was led into the crowded, tobacco-smoke-reeking assemblage by the caliph himself, accompanied by Benedict and Holtei, amidst the usual grand chorus of honor, the only words of which were "dumm! dumm! dumm!" A member rose to move that the neophyte should be admitted without the customary free-masonic trials; and the motion was accepted by the usual response of "Eins! zwei! drei!" After a pause of thoughtful silence, Weber was hailed under his new Ludlamite name of "Agathus the bulls-eye-hitter," the "Agathus" being an allusion to the heroine of his opera, the adjunct to the fact of his having hit the mark by his "Der Freischütz." Upon Benedict was bestowed the designation of "Maledünntus," as the reverse of the syllables forming his name, with the addition of "Wagner der Weberjunge" (Weaver's apprentice); the first name in honor of his being the famulus of the great Faust of music. All that wit and jest and song and extravagance could invent, was lavished with spendthrift hand in honor of the occasion. But poor Weber, whose weak chest was affected by the dense tobacco-smoke, and whose delicate nerves were shattered by the noise, was more shocked and repelled by the new honors awarded him, than pleased with his reception. "It must have been the devil that thrust me into that wasps' nest," he said, on returning home, to Holtei. "Were it not for the necessity of keeping well with the critics who wallow in such filth, Satan himself could never drag me there again." But after a time Weber began to change his note. "They are certainly very jolly fellows," he said. After having been dragged to the "Höhle" a few times, and getting accustomed to the manner in which "the divine art of nonsense" was cultivated, he used to look forward to a Ludlamite evening as one of the greatest joys of his Vienna life. The magic spell had worked its due effect. Not only was Weber's spirit roused and animated by his intercourse with his new associates, but they in turn formed a band of the staunchest friends, to rally round him and support him during the troublous times of the production of his "Euryanthe."

WEBER AND BEETHOVEN.

Meanwhile, a remark made by the old giant Beethoven respecting Weber's new work, in Steiner's establishment, and brought to the composer's ears by Benedict, made him resolve no further to postpone the visit, which he had longed to make to the mighty master, but from which he had been constantly kept back by the rumors always rife respecting Beethoven's rude and uncouth manners to his visitors. Weber was encouraged at the same time, by the friendly tone of the letters which he had received from the great composer of "Fidelio," on the subject of the production of his opera in Dresden. He took courage; and, after having been duly announced, he drove out, on the 5th October, along with Benedict and Haslinger the publisher, to Baden (by Vienna), where the old lion was wont, until late in the autumn, to have his den.

Weber's fears as to his reception had been, in a great measure, groundless. Beethoven was no longer the growling ogre, which so many had described in years gone by. By nature and education he was reserved, morose, and irritable. The death of the girl he loved in early years had rendered him misanthropical; and his ascetic devotion to his art had naturally made him averse to mixing with the world. His life had been one of a martyr of the old legends, or an iron-bound hero of the antique. Even when sitting as a disciple at the feet of Father Haydn he had vowed himself to eternal celibacy, in order that no joys of the world might divert him from the revelations of his art. To the minds of men he became a mere musical abstraction. A Beethoven, who could eat, drink, and love as other mortals, would have appeared an incomprehensible anomaly to them. This abnormal condition of humanity had naturally led to a state of the most profound melancholy, when that fearful evil, so hard for all to bear, but to the musical creator worse than death itself, suddenly fell upon him, and, at the age of little more than thirty, Beethoven was completely, hopelessly, incurably deaf. He then had crept into his lair alone, like a wounded beast of the forest, to hide himself from humanity. "Conceive my deep humiliation," he had written to his brother in the year 1802; "a creature stood by my side, and heard the distant tones of the flute; but I heard nothing! He heard the laborer sing in the fields; but I heard nothing! Despair fell upon me. I was nigh on taking my life with my own hands. But she—Art—held me back. I could not leave the world until I had revealed that which lay within me; and I lived on my hateful life." During this dark period came the "Fidelio"—that "Fidelio" which Beethoven never heard himself—and it failed to attract. It was modelled again, and re-modelled; but still the public of Vienna was cold to Beethoven's dramatic effort. When he himself attempted to conduct his work, that pitiless public laughed. He crept more and more deeply into his cold, cheerless solitude. Fortunately for the world, he never lost the conviction of the might of his own genius.

But those days had gone by. Habit, like nature, had done much to drape over the rough edges of Beethoven's rocky temper. He had begun to forget the loss of real sound, as his own heavenly orchestra played more clearly to his soul. A softer and more human spirit had once more taken possession of him. He had again found sympathy with mankind. He would have been no real artist, had he not been cheered also by the growth of his colossal fame. And thus it was that Beethoven, without wholly shaking off the evil demon which beset him, had, at the period of Weber's visit, already peeped more complacently into the outer world, with that strange mixture of openness and shyness, repose and restlessness, flashing animation and deep melancholy, friendly garrulity and dull apathy, which so strangely characterized him up to the last days of his life. In the house where he was wont to dine, when surrounded by known faces, he would even lead the conversation, and express his political opinions in his usual rough, straightforward manner, but generally in terms borrowed from musical phraseology. Metternich's police actually pricked up its long ears at Beethoven's political opinions; but its president, Sedlnitzky, had said, "Let the old bear growl; he can't bite." And the old bear growled on, unheeding. But he was still "The Solitary of the Mountain." He lived alone, walked alone, created alone and shut up in himself. In this respect he was still in the eyes of the Viennese, who saw and heard nothing of him but his works, the invisible "cloud-comPELLER" of the musical heavens—a mystery and a myth!

About the period when Weber's "Der Freischütz" had appeared, Beethoven had again begun to interest himself in the music of his day. He visited the noted "musical emporium," took scores upon his knees and studied them ardently. When "Der Freischütz" became so celebrated, Beethoven even took the score home with him. "I could never have believed it of the poor weak little mannikin," he was heard to say, banging on the score with his fist: "Weber must write operas, one after the other." The finale of the second act was still too strange for him. "I see what Weber means," he exclaimed; "but he has put such devilish queer stuff in here! When I read the wild hunt, I can't help laughing; and yet I feel it is the right thing. That is music which must be heard—heard only—and I—I—" and then a heavy sigh.

Weber knew then, that he had earned Beethoven's respect before his visit. But he felt strangely moved when he entered the great man's poor, desolate-looking room. All lay in the wildest disorder—music, money, clothing, on the floor—linen from the wash upon the dirty bed—broken coffee-cups upon the table. The open pianoforte was covered thickly with dust. Beethoven entered to greet his visitors. Benedict has thus described him. "Just so must have looked Lear, or one of Ossian's bards. His thick gray hair was flung upwards, and disclosed the sanctuary of his lofty, vaulted forehead. His nose was square, like that of a lion; his chin broad, with those remarkable folds which all his portraits show; his jaws formed as if purposely to crack the hardest nuts; his mouth noble and soft. Over the broad face, seamed with scars from the small-pox, was spread a dark redness. From under the thick, closely compressed eyebrows gleamed a pair of small, flashing eyes. The square, broad form of a Cyclops was wrapped in a shabby dressing-gown much torn about the sleeves." Beethoven recognized Weber without a word, embraced him energetically, shouting out, "There you are, my boy; you are a devil of a fellow! God bless you!" handed him at once his famous tablets, then pushed a heap of music from the old sofa, threw himself upon it, and, during a flow of conversation, commenced dressing himself to go out. Beethoven began with a string of complaints about his own position; about the theatres, the public, the Italians, the talk of the day, and, more especially, about his own ungrateful nephew. Weber, who was nervous and agitated, counselled him to tear himself from Vienna, undertake a journey through Germany, to convince himself of the world's judgment of him, and more especially go to England, where his works were more revered than in any other country. "Too late! too late!" cried Beethoven, making the pantomime of playing on the piano, and shaking his head sadly. Then he seized on Weber's arm, and dragged him away to the Sauerhof, where he was wont to dine. "Here," wrote Weber, afterwards, "we dined together in the happiest mood. The rough, repulsive man paid me as much attention as if I were a lady to whom he was making court, and served me at table with the most delicate care. How proud I felt to receive all this kindness and affectionate regard from the great master-spirit! The day will remain for ever impressed on my mind, as well as on that of all who were present." At table Beethoven turned the conversation to the subject of "Euryanthe," which Weber strove to avoid. "How is the book?" he asked. Weber hastened to reply, "Full of good situations." But Beethoven had caught sight of Haslinger's shake of the head, and burst out laughing: "Ah! the old story!" he shouted; "these German authors never know how to concoct a good opera-book." "But how about 'Fidelio'?" rejoined Weber. "Oh! that was derived from the French," said Beethoven; "and was translated into German out of the Italian." And so the two great composers communed together. And the others sat by, and saw these two heads so closely bent together—from the one of which had sprung the "Eroica," the "C-minor Symphony," and the "Fidelio"—from the other the "Freischütz," "Leier und Schwert," and "Preciosa"—and thought how many treasures of the beautiful might still be there, and compared Weber's long, narrow, scantily-covered head, and refined, spiritual, tender face, with the mighty lion-like facial mass of Beethoven, over which rose a very forest of hair, and reflected how the widely-contrasted genius of the two was so wondrously mirrored in each man, although both glowed with the same artistic fire, and both had the halo of immortality upon their brows. But the time came for departure. Again and again Beethoven embraced Weber, as though he could not part with him. It was long before he would relinquish Weber's long, thin, delicate hand from the grasp of his bulky fist. "Success to your new opera! If I can, I will come on your first night," he cried; and so they parted. Weber returned to Vienna deeply moved.

Thus had a friendly intercourse been established between the two celebrated composers, who never quite understood each other's genius, but who might have loved each other as artists and men. Unfortunately, malicious mischief-making came to cool the friendship. A criticism on Beethoven, written in Weber's very youthful days, was laid before the musical giant as a crime of weight; and the cordiality was strangled in its birth, although enmity there never was between the two.

Handel's Organ Accompaniment

It has been an often-expressed wish of musicians that Handel's manner of playing the Organ-accompaniment to his Oratorios could be ascertained. In the scores hitherto published we see nothing but the word "Organ" standing at the same line with the violoncellos and double-basses, with sometimes, and that rarely, a mark of Tasto solo. Even the best musicians of later times have been in doubt about his stenographic method of indicating so principal a part in an oratorio. A plain bass-line played by the organ in unison with a body of basses, with perhaps the occasional liberty of filling up a chord here and there, seems indeed to present to the eye nothing better than "a slight skeleton," as a judicious musical writer had expressed it. This meagre indication, so carelessly marked, was long conceived to be so mysterious, that the distinguished composer Mendelssohn earned the gratitude of a portion of the musical world by writing, (with a modest apology for his venturing on a task of such extreme difficulty,) an Organ-part to one of these oratorios. This deferential hesitation was creditable to him as a true artist, and his labor is a gain to the domain of music. He, perhaps, has done more than Handel intended, but it was with a praiseworthy motive. Handel had neglected (or his copyist for him,) to be explicit, and it is only in one of his manuscript copies (of the oratorio of Saul) that he has for the first time satisfied us on the long-interesting point and divulged to us his usual method of organ accompaniment. It is in many particulars so precise that we may consider the cloud dispelled, or at least the light made clearer than before.

It is an enormous supposition that Handel played the organ during the whole performance of an oratorio. He principally used it in the choruses, and we have to admire his sensitively discriminating judgment as much in the omissions of the organ-accompaniment as in the excellence of the effects produced by his employment of it. We are at once satisfied that his performance was not mere self-display, or meant to interfere with the various other instruments for which, with such masterly skill, he has written distinct parts. His department was with the multitude of voices, to guide them, and keep them compactly together, (the shepherd of his flock,) so as not to have their attention caught or distracted by what he had assigned to the instrumental band. With the Solo of the latter he did not interfere; not having any intention, by an unceasing monotony of one instrument (however great) to spoil, or rather nullify effects of beauty which he himself had studiously imagined for the very purpose of variety and peculiar expression. When the effects of the Full Organ, which were only occasionally required, were fulfilled, he confined himself to the bass range, and pursued the Tasto solo, (the plain bass notes without harmony) till the next gradual gathering, or full burst, of the choral voices. He, in fact, understood perfectly what few composers understand, the idiosyncrasy of the instruments he wrote for, and no one knew better when and how to employ them. His manuscript of "Saul" contains numerous directions of "Tasto solo," "Tasto solo e ottave bassa," "Tasto solo e ottave colla man destra," "Organo pieno," "Organo pieno come sta nelle parti," "Senza Organo," &c., &c. Many may write organ parts to his oratorios, but very few will accordingly to the model here discovered. For, with a vastly inferior judgment to that of this great master, they will adopt the conclusion that the organ is to embody and swallow up every other instrument; thus making its properly distinctive part a mere pianoforte accompaniment, devoid of light and shade, and finally becoming wearisome by its individual monotony. Such an arrangement dispenses altogether with the necessity of employing an instrumental hand; and if that be a desideratum, it is fully accomplished by such a voracious organ.

It is now manifested also, that Handel employed two organs in his oratorios. His double choruses are marked with a first and second organ, the responses of each party being given with its individual accompaniment. His own solos, played between the acts of the oratorios, are marked "Senza Organo Secondo." In the same manner, he employed a first and second harpsichord in his Operas; and it appears that the harpsichord (Cembalo) also accompanied various songs in the Oratorios.

The original scores from which Handel himself played or conducted his oratorios, and which are now in possession of Mr. Victor Schœlcher, were never prepared for publication. They were the first copies drawn out clearly from the hastily scrawled and confused manuscript of the composer, which are quite useless for the purposes of conducting; but it was in these clear copies, and not in the original manuscripts that Handel afterwards made his final arrangements, alterations, and additions. To a great number of the pieces in these copies no instruments whatever are mentioned, the distribution of the several parts for the band having been left to his experienced and well-informed copyist; while some instruments are only named when they are to cease playing, an evident proof of their usual employment, though not regularly marked. The simple word Tutte, marked over a "skeleton" score of four lines, was quite enough to employ his entire and very numerous orchestra, all the treble instruments playing together in unison with the violins (first and second,) while the family of basses were classed according to the same rule. When there was no distinct part for the violas, or the words "senza viola" were not marked, they played with the violoncellos; and the single bass-line often comprehended not only the usual violoncellos and double basses, but the bassoons, the harpsichord, the theorba, the lute, the harp, and the organ. The bass, being figured, was held to be sufficient for such instruments as usually played more than the plain bass notes. A practical musician of ordinary discretion would know in what cases the rule was to be relaxed. The above comprehensive rule, established and well-understood at the time, saved the composer an immensity of labor; and, in the way of publication, it is evident that a score with all these different instruments separately and fully drawn out, in the fashion of more modern times, would exceed in size any musical work ever yet published. The double lines required by the harp, the harpsichord, the theorba, the lute, bassoons, and the organ, added to give more lines for the bow instruments with space for the wind instruments (including three trombones) and the drums, and for the eight voices of a full or of a double chorus, would reasonably appeal the most daring publisher of music. Handel went to the opposite extreme, and some of his scores have been published with a miserable paucity of instruments. If the laconic marks in his manuscripts had been more generally known or attended to before now, his works would have had still greater justice done to them in the performance, and we should have heard fewer diatribes against the meagreness and poverty of his instrumentation. It is scarcely too much to say that, from what has been occasionally discovered in his various manuscripts, we have just grounds for concluding that there is scarcely a score of his yet published but would require re-editing, in order to be in accordance with the original state of its production.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

A CHAPTER FROM LAMPADUS.

His great oratorio of "St. Paul," begun in Düsseldorf, was finished at Leipzig during the course of this winter (1836). The author seems to have been bound by a promise to produce this work at a musical festival of Lower-Rhine artists, to be held at Düsseldorf. At any rate, the chorus-parts were engraved at Bonn by Simrock, after the piece was completed, and sent to Düsseldorf. Under the direction of Julius Riets, the rehearsals were carried on with great enthusiasm; and when, on the 8th of May, 1836, Mendelssohn arrived in person, he found the work all ready for the public performance. On Whitsunday, the 22d of May, occurred the introduction of the oratorio of "St. Paul" to the world. The solos were Madame Fischer-Achten, Miss Grabau (now Madame Bünan), Messieurs Schmetzer and Wersing, the latter as St. Paul. As a curious fact, it may be remarked, that the two false witnesses in the unimportant duet at the opening, "We have heard him utter blasphemies," could not find their voices when their turn came to sing. The success of the piece was decidedly brilliant. Mendelssohn's sister, herself only and hardly second to her brother in musical genius, — Fanny Hensel, whose tragic death her brother Felix was soon called to deplore, — and the younger brother, Paul Mendelssohn, had come from Berlin to be present at the first performance of "St. Paul." On the second day of the festival, Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," and the first overture to "Leonora," then freshly produced, Mozart's "Davidde Penitente," and a great psalm in E flat, by Handel. On the third day, Mendelssohn played, with Ferdinand David, the great "A-minor Sonata" of Beethoven; and as the music was not at hand, and this piece had not been specially indicated for the occasion, he played from memory. The Committee of Direction signified their gratification at Mendelssohn's signal success by presenting him with a magnificent copy of the oratorio of "St. Paul," adorned with elegant drawings of the leading scenes in the sacred drama, executed by the first artists of Düsseldorf, — Schröter, Hübner, Steinbrück, Mücke; to which one was added by Mendelssohn's brother-in-law, the court-painter Hensel.

After the first representation of "St. Paul," Mendelssohn made so many and so great changes in the work, that the great number of printed parts was rendered useless. Ten pieces he left entirely out; and the first great aria in B flat he reduced to about a third of its original length. On the other hand, he composed, some days before the festival, the short soprano solo in F major, in the second part; not to speak of innumerable smaller changes.

After this festival was past, Mendelssohn went to Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in order to direct at the public celebration of the "Cecilia" (Cäcilien Verein) in the place of his friend Schellie, who had been very ill, and was trying the restorative effect of sea-bathing. This society afforded great delight to Mendelssohn, in consequence of its large number of fine voices, and the secure mastery which it had acquired of the most difficult motets of Sebastian Bach. The city and suburbs of Frankfurt, which he had seen and known only as a child, or when he flitted through it on his journeys, pleased him exceedingly. He enjoyed himself so well there, that he has left on record, in a sportive letter, that, if he should stay much longer in Frankfurt, he should certainly become a devoted gardener. During his cheerful occupations there, he discovered one blossom so fair, that he took it to himself, to adorn the garden of his whole future life. He was introduced by a friend to the Jeanrenaud Family, and there made the acquaintance of the youngest daughter, Cecilia, who afterwards became his wife. When the nuptial band united them, there was no one who thought that it was so soon to be sundered. She was worthy of such a husband; and she showed it not only through their whole married life, but most of all by the heroic fortitude with which she bore her loss.*

On the advice of his physician at Leipzig, Mendelssohn took a journey to Scheveningen, after his duties at Frankfurt were concluded, in order to enjoy a course of sea-bathing. There he remained for some time; and with nerves much strengthened, and his general health improved, he turned back, in the autumn of the same year, (1836), to renew his work at Leipzig. On the 2d of October, we see him re-instated in his old place as director of the concerts at the Gewandhaus.

Meanwhile, there was an admirable opportunity in Leipzig to learn the marvellous power of Mendelssohn as a leader, and to test at the same time the extent of musical resources in that art-loving city. "Israel in Egypt," that master-piece of Handel's, whose great effects are in the chorus parts, was studied. Upon these choruses Mendelssohn began to work, having rehearsal follow rehearsal with great rapidity; and, as the singers were promptness and loyalty itself, he soon wove the most discordant elements into unity, and brought about a very perfect result. He did a good service in other respects; for he wrote out in full notes Handel's figured organ bass, which is not read with ease by organists of our day. On Nov. 7, 1836, it was magnificently brought out in St. Paul's Church, with a chorus of more than two hundred and fifty voices, assisted by the organ and a strong orchestra. The success of the oratorio well repaid the patient care and skill of preparation. The greatest interest in the work was manifested by the immense audience which filled the spacious church. Thus Leipzig celebrated its first great Musical Festival, and with no common splendor.

Of the other musical performances and concerts of this winter when Mendelssohn was the conductor, and which were therefore directed with matchless skill, I will refer to only one. It was the last concert of 1836, and took place on the 12th of December. It was to have been on Thursday; but out of love to Mendelssohn, and out of regard to his yearning after Frankfurt, it was given on the preceding Monday. After Mendelssohn had played, with rare skill, Beethoven's "E-flat Major Concerto" for the first part, and closed in a storm of applause, the second part opened with his own "A Calm at Sea, and a Happy Voyage;" then followed some solo performances, and then the happily chosen finale of "Fidelio." The reader will remember that the great chorus of "Fidelio" has the words, —

"Who'er a lovely bride has won,

Let him now join our glad some song."

Mendelssohn being called to the piano by the repeated applause which followed this chorus, seated himself, and began to extemporize on the theme, working it up in the most brilliant manner. It seemed like a great family party, to which he had invited the guests to share in his own private joy. Every one who had a heart rejoiced with him. All knew what his errand to Frankfurt was.

It is also worthy of remark, that, this same winter, a friend of Mendelssohn, remarkable both for his performances on the piano and also for his own compositions, visited Germany, and awakened much enthusiasm by his brilliant talents. William Sterndale Bennett had come from England in order to study musical composition under Mendelssohn for a season.* He displayed the value of the instructions he received in a delightful piano-forte Concerto in C minor, and also in a very attractive overture, written in Mendelssohn's manner, but still pleasantly remembered. Later, we heard from the young composer a second overture, "The Wood Nymph," which was one of the most charming pictures of natural scenery ever presented, and captivated all hearers. And, lastly, it may be remarked, that, at the last subscription concert of this season, Beethoven's grand "Ninth Symphony" was given, even more perfectly, if possible, than at its first performance.

And now had come the time when the tried and proved musical resources of Leipzig could be fitly put to a fine test of their reach and compass; and that was on the occasion of bringing out Mendelssohn's oratorio of "St. Paul," now widely known, and in many countries. The chorus began their rehearsals in February, 1837; and every thing that the director's skill, zeal, and thoroughness could accomplish was done, and all that the thorough co-operation of the singers could effect was conjoined with even greater spirit and willingness than at the representation of Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The noble choruses and chorals, although accompanied merely by a wretched piano, wrought powerfully upon the choir, and, despite the repeated necessary rehearsals, raised public expectation to its height. Most impressive of all were the choral, "Sleepers awake! a voice is calling," whose imposing effect, with the tremble accompaniment, could only be conjectured when sung to the piano; the sublime preceding chorus, "Rise up! arise! for thy light comes;" and the voice from heaven, in the blended soprano and alto, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" But scarcely less effective and moving were all those passages which bear the stamp of a Christian's joy, of pious self-renunciation, and untroubled confidence: as, for example, that first chorus, which rang out like a psalm of victory, "Lord, thou alone art God;" that choral, full of inward humility and the love of God, "To thee, O Lord, I yield my spirit;" and those two precious, sadly joyous choruses, "Happy and blest are they who have endured," and "The Lord will wipe away all tears from their eyes, for he hath spoken it;" the first of which, with its gently swelling wave-like accompaniment, moved every heart to its depths. There was not in the whole oratorio a single chorus which we did not take delight in singing; and Mendelssohn understood, as hardly any other director has equally done, how to make his singers sing with their whole souls. This appeared in the perfect execution of the pianos, only breathed out; the crescendos and diminuendos, whose possibilities, significance, and effect he first revealed to us.

After such thorough drill, not only in the choruses, but in the solo and the orchestral parts, the public performance of the work, which took place on the 16th of March, 1837, could not fail to be successful in the highest degree. It was a disappointment that the bass soloist, who was to take the part of St. Paul, was obliged to be absent in consequence of illness; but the gentleman who took his place sustained the part well. In the recitative, Mlle. Grabau was especially excellent. I do not remember who the other soloists were. The choir consisted of over three hundred voices, with a correspondingly large orchestra. I must let another speak for me regarding the general effect; for I was one of the performers on the occasion. The critic of the "Musical Gazette" says, "Under the skilful leading of the composer, the great orchestra did its work masterly; and the choruses, already thoroughly studied under Director Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy, were given in noble style, so bright, powerful, full, round, and shaded to every nicety of expression, that I never saw the effect in so large a choir equalled. Whoever was present at the representation of that brilliant work will be compelled to confess, that the larger share of the credit which the choir gained for itself is owing to the matchless skill of the conductor and the power of the piece itself. With simple justice has the management of the subscription concerts offered its public thanks to the honored leader, the soloists, the orchestra, its conductor David, and the entire body of singers, for their unwearied patience in preparation, and their brilliant performance on the night of representation."

To give an opinion or an analytical criticism, nay even merely to enter upon a detailed characterization of a work which has made its way through nearly the whole civilized world, and met everywhere with the most lively appreciation—of a musical composition, the remembrance of which, but lately renewed, still lives, as it were, in all hearts and all ears, would neither be in place, nor form a part of my duty. I only ask leave to offer some apologetic observations and hints. Viewed in a formally æsthetic light, there may certainly be many weak features in the work. The individuality and effectiveness of Paul are certainly thrown somewhat into the background by the martyrdom of Stephen, and the Second Part is inferior to the First in dramatic interest. But the idea running through the whole work is too high and general to require to be strictly bound up with a single individual; we have the glorification of Christianity, with its humility, and with its joyous alacrity to live and die for the Lord, as opposed to the stubborn self-righteousness of Judaism, and the sensually cheerful view taken of life by Heathenism; we have the antagonism of these two principles (more obstinate certainly in the case of Judaism) to the first, and the triumph of the first through the revelation of eternal light, and the immediate influence of divine love. This idea is bodily represented in the person of Stephen, Paul, and Barnabas, and concentrated in what is really the central point of the whole oratorio, the conversion of Paul. Some persons have felt inclined to blame the composer for having given the single voice of the Lord to a chorus of female voices, that is to say, perhaps, angels; he should rather, it has been asserted, have merely suggested this voice by means of a powerful blast on the trombone. But it is this very medium between the material employment of words spoken by a man, and a mere suggestion by means of a blast alone, that strikes me as a most happy hit of the composer, for the phenomenon is thereby rendered supernatural without losing its character of reality. All arguments, however, it strikes me, must yield to the powerful impression undoubtedly produced by this angel chorus on every heart with the slightest claim to susceptibility. Who is there, who on hearing it, has not felt a shudder as it were run through him at finding himself face to face with the omnipresence and omniscience of God! And how is this impression strengthened by the powerful chorus, "Rise up! arise!" that flashes like the very lightning from Heaven into the darkness of earth! What a forcible admonition to conversion is contained in the following highly solemn choral, "Sleepers, wake! a voice is calling," and what a triumph of the future victory and also of the approaching judgment is contained in the majestic notes of the trombone, which accompany every phrase, and remind us of the magnificence of old Zion, illumined, however, by the light of the New Covenant! How strikingly, too, is the difference between the Christian, Jewish, and Heathen element expressed in the choruses! Let the reader only compare the choruses: "Happy and blest," No. 11, and: "O great is the depth of the riches," No. 22, with the two Jewish choruses: "Now this man ceaseth not," No. 5, and: "This is Jehovah's temple," No. 38, and these again with the choruses, No. 33 and 35: The Gods themselves as mortals have deccended," and: "O be gracious, ye Immortals," and he must confess how characteristically the three different elements are treated.

A most original and magnificent embellishment to the oratorio are the chorales, which are always introduced in the right place. While we find concentrated in them the most intrinsically pure expression of pious Christian sentiment, their power is materially increased by the addition of the most pleasingly constructed harmony. There can be no doubt that, in the case of many persons who perhaps had not for a long time taken part in any sacred melody, the magnificence of the Christian and especially the Evangelical psalmody was once more rendered clear and carried to the heart. This effect may possibly have only been imitated from the great Sebastian Bach; but is the composer, on that account, less deserving of our thanks for reviving, after the lapse of a hundred years, the Christian chorale, in all its fervor and dignity, and, moreover, beautified by the resources at the command of modern art? Finally it is impossible to speak in terms of too high praise of the pious and masterly skill with which the artist, working up a text selected from the words of the Bible itself into a well proportioned historical picture, possessing the richest variety, has executed a most difficult task. Though, in our opinion, the great strength of the oratorio consists in the choruses and chorales, we would by no means wish to undervalue the solos. The recitatives are all magnificently treated, and, for instance, it is impossible to conceive anything more dramatically effective, and, at the same time, more in accordance with the style of sacred composition, than the two airs for Paul, the thunder-air: "Consume them all. Lord Sabaoth," and the air of repentance: "O God, have mercy." Similarly, in the soprano air: "Jerusalem," the arioso for contralto: "But the Lord is mindful," and in the air for Paul: "I praise thee, O Lord," no one, most assuredly, will fail to recognize the depth and vividness of Christian feeling presented in the most finished musical form. In one word, the whole oratorio produces an "edifying" effect, and that, too, in the highest acceptance of the epithet; it fortifies, it elevates, it ennobles our minds; by the happy exhibition of religious feeling in the garb of the Beautiful. Whenever, as is the case in this instance, the Eternally-Beautiful and the Eternally True join hands, the highest result of art has been attained, and success can never fail to follow.

Decorated with the fresh laurels which the performance of St. Paul in Leipzig brought him, figuratively and actually (a wreath of laurel was laid upon his conductor's desk), Mendelssohn now hastened to Frankfurt, to entwine the wedding myrtle in the chaplet of fame. In the spring of 1837, the bond uniting him to Cecilia Jeanrenaud, second daughter of a deceased clergyman of the Reformed creed, was consecrated by the church. "Ach, es war wohl schöne Zeit!"—In the August of the same year, accompanied by his bride, whose beauty and amiable disposition everywhere produced a most favorable impression, and by her mother and sister, he paid a visit to his old friends in Düsseldorf, with all of whom (Immermann excepted) he had always remained on the very best terms. As a rule, he was very fond of staying in Düsseldorf. According to his own statements, his visits to that city were among the happiest events of his life. When there, he gave himself his full swing, was in tip-top spirits, nay, absolutely frolicsome, and responded indefatigably to all demands upon his professional skill. On the present occasion, his St. Paul was again performed, in his honor, under the direction of his pupil and friend, Riets. He himself was enabled to show his friends, as fresh fruits of his industry, the manuscripts of the 42d Psalm, Op. 42; a second Concerto in D minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 40; and the Violin Quartet in E minor, Op. 44, No. 2; the last having been written before the other two. Thus even the first happy period of married life had not any influence in diminishing the rich vein of his artistic productivity. From Düsseldorf, also, he sent all ready for engraving, to Simrock, in Bonn, his three Motets for Female Voices, which he had partly written at Rome. From Düsseldorf, he proceeded, without his family, direct to England, being expected at the Birmingham Festival for the performance of his St. Paul (from the 19th to the 22d September). The oratorio was given on the second day of the Festival before a most numerous assembly, but with some omissions in the Second Part. The entire work met with unanimous approbation, the choruses being rendered with unusual force, if not, invariably, with perfect accuracy. Mendelssohn's appearance in the orchestra towards the conclusion of the performance, was greeted with tumultuous applause. In September of this year, St. Paul was given for the first time in Berlin also. * * *

Scarcely had Mendelssohn returned to Leipzig, when he learned the existence of a very strong wish, expressed even at the first performance, for St. Paul to be repeated. He complied with this wish, and conducted the rehearsals with his accustomed care. When, however, the day of performance, the 15th September, 1838, arrived, he did not make his appearance, having been suddenly attacked with the measles. David had to undertake the duties of conductor in his place, and executed his difficult task so strictly in accordance with the spirit of his model that the impression produced upon the many of the audience appeared even more profound than at the first performance. We must mention that, after the chorale, No. 9: "To thee, O Lord, I yield my spirit," a new air: "Der Du die Menschen lässt sterben, und sprichst: Kommt wieder, Menschenkinder," was interpolated. The most important soprano solos on this occasion were undertaken by a fair and amiable artist, who, after giving up a brilliant public career and retiring into private life, dedicated her magnificent natural gifts almost exclusively to the sacred art, more especially as represented by the muse of Mendelssohn, and who, up to the most recent period, understood more thoroughly than any other singer the spirit of his creations and rendered them with greater felicity. After this performance of St. Paul, there was only one more in Leipzig, that one being the last the composer conducted; on Good Friday, 1847. We may remark that no other work of art ever found such general acceptance in so short a time. The years 1837 and 1838 might really and truly be entitled in the history of music: "St. Paul's years." A musical amateur has endeavored to determine the number of its performances, and finds that, in a period of a year and a half, and at 41 towns, they amounted to no fewer than fifty. In Germany, in the Tyrol, and in Switzerland, in Denmark, in Holland, in Poland, and in Russia, in England, and in America, St. Paul was everywhere given, and, in some towns, two or three times.

VERDI.—A letter from Paris, to the New Orleans Picayune, gives the following as the latest pen and ink portrait of M. Verdi: "Quite tall, spare rather than fleshy, a strong, energetic head, which reminds one of Salvator Rosa's brigand chiefs—such is Verdi. His glance is fatal and legendary, thick eye-brows cover his eyes with their mysterious shade. His nose is thick rather than large; from it two wrinkles come down to the chin like a furrow ploughed by diadain. A beard black as jet hides an ironical smile. His broad virile brow is crowned by hair which frizzes like sea weed. The general expression of his face is hard, severe, haughty; it denotes will, courage, distrust. Verdi is a man of untarnished honor and proverbial shyness. He has, besides his art, three affections lodged alone in his heart of hearts: His country, reading, and his country seat Saint Agatha, which is really a palace. Fleeing contact with society, parties, dinners, balls, execrating compliments, puffs, and, above all things, la clique, he is truly an odd, bizarre and puzzling character. One Verdi is the Verdi who is the same with everybody; the stiff, rough, abrupt, restless, scowling man; icy to mere acquaintances, never expressing an opinion, especially about musical matters, shivering at the sight of an album and at the demand of a portrait; in fine, an odd stick. Nobody can come near him at rehearsals, and he quarrels outrageously three times a day with the manager. He has not the least mercy on singers; pitiless and hypercritical, he makes them begin again and again, until they are utterly exhausted. The least thing throws him into a passion and excites his nervous irritability. He is the nightmare of the orchestra of the opera. Nevertheless, as, after all, his object is a perfect performance of his work, the artists who accuse him of brutality, and by yielding to his exigencies and by uniting their seal to his sacred fire. He will not allow the least change to be made by them in his work. At the rehearsal of "Les Vêpres Siciliennes," Mons. Obin, discontented with his part, returned Verdi as good as he gave, whereupon Verdi suspended everything until Obin wrote him a letter of excuses. The obstinacy on both sides lasted a month—a whole month without a rehearsal! 'Twas not Verdi who yielded. The other Verdi is a gentle, amiable man; perfectly courteous, fond of talking, but only with his most intimate friends—but this Verdi has never been seen excepting by three or four friends—for these he would do anything."

"POETRY BY WEIGHT; A MIDWINTER NIGHT'S DREAM." A correspondent of the Examiner, who signs himself "Quevedo Minor," and heads his communication as above, thus addresses the Editor of the Examiner.

"Messrs. Moxon's 'Miniature Poets' are to be purchased at the following prices: Wordsworth, 5s.; Tennyson, 5s.; Browning, 5s.; and Tupper, 10s. 6d. The latter book is really an extraordinary bargain, and no doubt will reach its 'tenth thousand' in an incredible short space of time. Having this pretty volume in my hand yesterday evening, I happened to fall asleep, and forthwith dreamed a dream. I saw on one side a literary Inferno, where, among many other unfortunate spirits, was that of a proverbial philosopher, from whose vexed bowels streams of lava were roaring and rolling. High on the other side was a happy abode, divided from the first by a deep gulf called Bathos, into which wretches attempting to gain the higher region continually fell, scrambling back in a woeful plight to their proper place. Prominently seated in the Paradiso I beheld the spirit of Mr. Browning resting his head on Father Chaucer's bosom. To him, soon after my arrival, the vexed philosopher cried aloud, begging that Mr. Browning might bring him one drop of Castalian dew to moisten his dry imagination. 'No, my sonne,' said Father Chaucer, 'you in the other worlde solde your 100,000 copies, and my sonne Browning botte preciously few; and now you are in the dompes, and he is gladd. It is trewe,' added Chaucer, affectionately tweaking the great spirit's ear, 'he squeakes and grontes now and agen, I wol nat lie: and namely, I canne nat understonde the halfe of thatte he bath writte: botte, natheless, he is my trewe sonne.' The proverbial spirit then entreated that Mr. Browning might at least be given leave of absence to go and warn —, and —, but Father Chaucer replied that they had Shakespeare and the poets, and if not warned by them, would not stop writing even though one returned to Paternoster row. The lava roared and rolled again, and I awoke."

SALE OF A COMIC SINGER. A novel sale, by public auction, took place within the rooms of Messrs. Hutchinson and Dixon, West Mile Street, Glasgow, on the 23d ult. For several days placards may have been observed in the city, announcing the coming sale of the services of Mr. James Taylor, described as "The Champion Comic of Great Britain." On certain conditions Mr. Taylor proffered his services for four months, from November next, to the highest bidder, engaging to sing twice every lawful evening in any establishment, and in any town to which he might be sent. The novelty of the affair doubtless excited a good deal of curiosity amongst Mr. Taylor's professional brethren in the city, who crowded into "The Mart" as the hour of sale approached. At five o'clock, Mr. Hutchinson moved himself into a chair which was placed at the top of a table, and was soon afterwards supported on the right by Mr. Taylor, for whom similar accommodation in this elevated position had been provided. The gentlemen who were expected to become bidders stood or were seated in front of the auctioneer. Many of them were smoking cigars, and an array of champagne glasses which studded a green baize-covered table gave promise of pleasures yet to come. Mr. Hutchinson opened the proceedings by explaining the circumstances under which he came to occupy the chair; but before advancing to the real business of the day he caused the champagne to be handed round, while the company smoked and chatted, chaffed Mr. Taylor, in a quiet way, and quaffed his health with fraternal fervor. Thus comfortably circumstanced, the bidding began. The first offer made was £100, immediately increasing to £110; but it was evident that this was intended merely as a start, because the bidding went up with a rush through all the intermediate tens till £230 was reached. Offers were now advanced more cautiously; and when £315 was gained, the bidders became so shy that a cunning suggestion was made that some champagne bottles should be uncorked. The hint was acted upon, and the sparkling beverage again went round. After a brief interval, and what seemed a grateful refresher, Mr. Hutchinson again went to work, but it appeared still to be a stiff up-hill struggle with him. At £325 the "last call" was threatened by the auctioneer; but two additional bids were faintly ventured upon, and at £335 the services of four calendar months of "the Champion Comic" were secured on behalf of the proprietor of the White-bait Concert Rooms. The bidding, as it seemed, was confined to one or two gentlemen representing the proprietors of concert rooms in the city. After being knocked down, Mr. Taylor sprang up with characteristic alertness to thank the company for their patronage, and, descending from his perch, was lost amongst the crowd. —Era, 3rd inst.

London.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The following notice from a London critical journal of the 10th inst. confirms what we said in our last of the growing appreciation of Schumann's music in England. Ten years ago "Paradise and the Peri" was hooted at by the Athenæum, the Times and all the critical authorities. Only two years ago his Symphony in C major received the same treatment, Orchestra and Musical World "consenting," like the young man named Saul at the stoning of Stephen, but not as yet, like Saul, repenting. These continue to decry the "Peri." But all are not like those, for here is one who writes discriminatingly:

The elder Philharmonic Society commenced its season on Monday with a performance of Schumann's elaborate cantata, "Paradise and the Peri," which occupied the entire evening. This work had already been heard at one of the concerts of the same society some ten years since: but at that time there was small chance of any recognition of a composer who is only just obtaining occasional and partial hearing. "Paradise and the Peri" is a work on quite as ambitious a scale as Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht," and is therefore open to the criticism which a composition of such pretension inevitably challenges. While holding that Schumann's music has hitherto met with most unjust depreciation in this country, we would by no means assert that in every instance, fulfils all that might be expected from its intention. To admit this, however, is simply to acknowledge that Schumann's genius was not of the first order. It certainly was not so vast and profound as that of Beethoven, so universal as that of Mozart, so dramatic as that of Weber, or so complete and well balanced as that of Mendelssohn. Still, Schumann was a genius, and the wholesale depreciation of him which ignorance in some cases, and ill-will in others, has dictated to this country, is as unreasonable as it would be utterly to ignore and condemn one of our secondary poets or dramatists because inferior to Milton, or Shakespeare. "Paradise and the Peri" contains much music of great beauty and masterly power, with, it must be confessed, some that is dull, monotonous, and unworthy of the rest. Schumann, during his comparatively brief career, wrote so much and so rapidly that he seems to have neglected those processes of revision and excision which the greatest men have exercised on their works. Hence the inequality to be found in some of his larger compositions. His genius tended towards the abstract, the ideal, and indefinite—it possessed a strong tinge of the romantic, but it was the sombre side of romance—mountain gloom and forest shade rather than the brighter tints of fairy fancy.

Thus it follows that his treatment of Moore's Oriental poem is frequently wanting in sunny brightness and lightness of touch, such as Mendelssohn so felicitously imparted to his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Notwithstanding its many and great beauties, it is doubtful whether "Paradise and the Peri" will ever interest a general audience without some reduction and retrenchment of the music. Most of the movements are such as only a consummate master could have produced. Among others may be specified a splendid chorus "But now thy plains" (No. 6 in the German score), with the massive effect of the vocal unisons—the soprano solo for the Peri, and chorus at the end of the first part, the climax of which is truly grand, although the fugal movement is somewhat out of place, being too ecclesiastical in tone for the spirit of the poetry. In the second part is a very fanciful and imaginative chorus of the Genii of the Nile, the instrumentation of which is masterly in its elaboration. Perhaps, however, the gem of the whole work is the lovely quartet introduced by the short tenor solo, "The Peri weeps"—a sufficient refutation in itself of the assertion that Schumann did not possess deep musical sentiment. The third part commences with a charming chorus of Hours—full of a grace and lightness of touch which it were to be wished were more frequent. After this occurs some of the least effective and most labored music in the whole work, and here the task of retrenchment should be chiefly exercised in any future performance. The final chorus, however, "We welcome thee," is truly magnificent, and wrought up to a climax of grandeur that few composers besides Beethoven have ever attained.

The production of the work does credit to the Society and its conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett; although its performance might have been more efficient, especially on the part of the chorus, which evidently required more preparation, some of the lighter and more graceful portions of the music being coarsely sung. The principal singers were Madame Parepa, Miss Robertine Henderson, Miss Emily Pitt, Messrs. Cummings, Whiffin, and Thomas. Much of the effect of the performance was owing to Madame Parepa's brilliant execution of the most difficult music allotted to the Peri.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The third of the season offered Mendelssohn's first Quintet; Beethoven's A-flat Sonata (with the variations and funeral march); Mozart's Trio Divertimento in E flat (one of his latest works), for violin, viola and cello, played by Messrs. Strauss, Webb and Paque; and Beethoven's Sonata in G, op. 30, for violin and piano. Charles Halle was the pianist. For vocal relief, Miss Ida Gillies sang a "very dry bravura" by Leonardo Vinci and the prayer from Mr. Leslie's Ida. St. James's Hall was crammed.

The fourth concert began with Schubert's Quartet in D minor (fourth time), played by Strauss, Ries, Webb and Paque, who also played a Haydn Quartet in E flat. Madame Arabella Goddard, the pianist, played Dussek's "Farewell" Sonata, and, with Herr Strauss, Beethoven's Sonata-Duo in F. Miss Banks sang Russian Glinka's "Lullaby" and Schubert's "Barcarole," Mr. Benedict, as usual, accompanying at the piano.

The hero of the fifth Monday (Feb. 12) was the great violinist Joachim, who took part in Mozart's G-minor Quintet, in Beethoven's Sonata in G, op. 96, with Arabella Goddard, and in a D-minor Quartet of Haydn, to whose music he is partial, though he is greatest in the rendering of Bach and Beethoven. The solo piano-forte pieces were Handel's greatest Fugue, in E minor, from his Suites, and the Prelude and Fugue in the same key by Mendelssohn, with the "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations for an encore. The singer was Mr. Patey, who gave an air from Faust (Gounod, of course) and "the irresistible song of the Pedlar from Mendelssohn's operetta Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde."

Of the following concerts the Musical World's reporter, confessing himself "behind-hand," thus hurriedly and exultantly remarks:

Signor Piatti to his post has restored Mr. A. Chappell's quartet to its normal state. This most admirable of violoncellists was never in finer play. The performance of Beethoven's quartet in F major—the last of the immortal "seventeen"—on the night of Piatti's return, was a brilliant augury of what is to come. The incomparable Joachim, as first violin, that genuine artist, Ludwig Strauss, as tenor, and Piatti as violoncellist, with so competent a second violin as L. Ries, formed a truly model-quartet; and Beethoven's "Muss es sein?" was never asked more eloquently, or answered with more emphatic clearness. "Es muss sein!" was the unanimous verdict, while this marvellously fine performance of a wonderful work went on. "So muss es immer sein!" The wish was father to the thought. On the same evening Signor Piatti played to admiration the violoncello sonata in F (Op. 5), by the same "immeasurably rich master"—with Mr. Halle, both performers being rapturously called back at the end. On the Monday following, when Mozart's newly revived Divertimento was "interpreted" by Joachim, Strauss, and Piatti (imagine how!), and Mendelssohn's fiery second trio by Arabella Goddard, Joachim and Piatti (imagine how!), Joachim took the tenor part in one of Haydn's most vigorous quartets, yielding the first violin to Strauss. The act was graceful and artistically brother-like; but the compliment was richly merited. Never were these excellent entertainments more prosperous than now and never did full tide of prosperity flow in a worthier direction.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—These are supplementary to the "Monday Populars," under the same management, and playing the same cards, only differently shuffled. We copy from the Musical World of March 3d.

Some three or four years ago it occurred to Mr. Arthur Chappell to give a complete course of Beethoven's sonatas in a series of eight concerts. The idea was a happy one, and seemed to be particularly appreciated by pianoforte professors, who, music-book in hand, attended the concerts in large numbers. Mr. Charles Halle was the pianist; from him Mr. Clement Smith, of Islington, and Mr. Cramer Jones, of Turnham Green, took lessons, which they afterwards no doubt, communicated at so much an hour to their pupils. The pupils too, were themselves attracted.

The Beethoven sonata concerts were soon replaced by a series of imitation "Monday Populars," which only differ from the originals in being given on Saturday mornings instead of Monday evenings. The "Monday Popular Concert" of Saturday last (to employ the exact title under which these entertainments are advertised, and which, however incorrect in a verbal sense, at least serves to indicate their nature) was an excellent specimen of its class. The quartet was led by Joachim; Madame Arabella Goddard was the pianist; and Signor Piatti the violoncellist. In one piece, Beethoven's trio in C minor, these three admirable artists were heard together. In the opening quartet, led, as before stated, by M. Joachim, and in which the violoncello was of course taken by Signor Piatti, the intermediate parts (second violin and viola) were assigned to Messrs. Ries and Hann. The one vocalist was Mr. Patey, and the short, well-chosen programme was as follows:

Quartet, in D minor, No. 2..... Mozart.
Song, "The Valley"..... Gounod.
Sonata in G. Op. 58 (to Count Waldstein)..... Beethoven.
Song, "The Bellringer"..... Wallace.
Trio in C minor, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello..... Beethoven.

ORATORIOS, &c. Glancing at the record of the Oratorio Societies for the past two months, we find that they have been occupied with Judas Maccabeus, Haydn's Seasons, the Lobgesang and Rossini's Stabat Mater (in which Mme. Parepa's voice was found brighter and larger than ever, after her visit to America), and Elijah (also with Parepa, Sims Reeves, &c.).

Under this head also we name the first performance of Gounod's Tobias—"petit oratorio," as its author calls it; and the Times (Feb. 16) says: "Perhaps the work of the smallest pretensions that ever bore the title"—from which opinion of course Mr. Chorley differs. The Concert was eked out with other hitherto unknown works of Gounod: a Symphony in D ("an early composition, full of weak imitations of Mozart and Beethoven"), an Ave verum ("devotional and beautiful"), an O Salutaris, for tenor voice (Reeves), also admired; "By Babylon's waves," a paraphrase of the 137th Psalm, and "Bethlehem," a Christmas Carol, with drone basses in the 15th century style.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. The winter concerts interrupted by the Christmas holiday entertainments, were resumed about the first of February, when we find the zealous conductor, Herr Auguste Manns, treating the visitors to Beethoven's 8th Symphony, Bennett's Naiades overture, and Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto;" also a new Swedish singer, more at home in Lindblad's songs, than in Mozart's Tito. Mr. Manns has since and before, in various concerts, been battling with prejudice by performing several of the Symphonies and Overtures of Schumann (not without effect, it seems). Other points of interest have been Mendelssohn's Melusine overture; Reinecke's Overture to Calderon's Dame Kobolt; Hiller's "Loreley" Cantata, Mendelssohn's Loreley fragment, and the overture to Wallace's "Lurline,"—all in one programme; Spohr's overture to Der Berggeist; Gounod's "Irene," an English version of his opera "La Reine de Saba," occupying a whole concert; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Schumann's Manfred overture; Beethoven's C-minor Concerto, played by Mlle. Agnes Zimmerman; and many smaller things. A new Symphony, by young Arthur Sullivan, is promised.

Concert Review.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. (Thursday Afternoon, March 22). For once a beautiful Spring day! The audience was by several hundreds larger than before. But this was also partly owing to the character of the programme, which, though not the richest nor the rarest of the series, was one of the most attractive and appreciable to the greater number.

The opening piece, however, was one of which few knew how to form any anticipations, except from the name of the author. It was Schubert's Overture to "Fierabras," one of the dozen operas of his, some of which were never performed at all, and most of them never outside of Vienna, and there only once or twice. None of them, it may be presumed, lacked merit or traits of real genius, and more than one of them may yet be destined to a public career. Those of our readers who may be curious to know something of their plots and musical contents will find a brief account of each in a translation of Herr von Kreisler's sketch of Schubert's life in Volumes XX and XXI of this Journal. "Fierabras" is a grand heroic romantic opera; King Charles has won a bloody victory over the Moors and taken the young prince Fierabras prisoner, takes him to Rome, where he falls in love with King Charles's daughter, &c., &c. A story in which love and battle's changeful tide and barbarous revenges are mingled in much the same lurid colors as in Trovatore,—more relieved, we should hope, in the genial German's music. The Overture, at all events, is a noble one. Those tremolos in the depths of the orchestra, with which it opens, strangely modulating, enchain the imagination at once and fill the mind with a certain pleasing awe. The leading theme of the Allegro, entering in the minor, short and tragical, is exciting as well as mournful, but is mingled throughout with bold heroic passages which relieve it, and the whole worked up with grand artistic symmetry and progress. It is the unmistakeable Schubert! And such an Overture is an addition to our stock.

Mendelssohn's "Serenade and Allegro Gioioso," in B minor, op. 43, for piano-forte, with orchestra, was the next piece, modestly selected by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, in his desire to bear a part with other Boston artists and other members of the Harvard Musical Association in these its concerts. Not so bold an undertaking as a Beethoven Concerto, such as we had had in three successive concerts, and yet one which required an artist. The piece is beautiful in itself, and was well suited to Mr. Parker's quiet, conscientious, refined style of execution. An artist of another temperament might have put more fire into the latter movement and have brought out the rapid figures with more palpable sonority in the large hall; but it was beautifully rendered and gave general pleasure.

Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra (of 55 instruments) achieved about its finest triumph of the season in its rendering of Gade's first Symphony, in C minor,—a work which we have not heard since the days of the "Germania" concerts a dozen years ago. To full half the audience, therefore, its charm was entirely fresh; and those who had enjoyed it keenly in the old time now found it to be better than they knew. No wonder that Mendelssohn and Leipzig were so smitten with its beauty when it was new there. The only wonder is that the young Danish author of a work so original, though accidentally so much in the Northern, dreamy, seashore vein of Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, should have gone on composing symphony upon symphony, overture upon overture, and all kinds of smaller things, and yet never once again have produced a work of equal consequence. From the time of this first Symphony, and of the "Ossian" and "Highlands" Overtures, his individuality has grown monotonous and gone on repeating itself in ever fading colors. But here is unquestionably a masterpiece, fresh and welcome alike to musicians and mere music-lovers. The charm lies mainly in its poetic tone, in the unbroken unity preserved throughout all its movements despite their contrast, and in the consummate skill with which the same thoughts are repeatedly held up in other and richer colors, whereby they are as it were transfigured and made new continually. Examine the first movement and we find that the principal theme or motive which pervades it is not even "worked up" at all, it is only transposed and set in other lights and other keys. In a piano-forte arrangement it must needs be monotonous, but in this wondrous orchestration you forget the lack of contrapuntal art which commonly lends progress and variety, developing the whole tree from the little germ. The hint of the whole is contained in the first two measures of the slow and pensive introduction, a breath of solemnizing seashore melody that steals over you. The dominant theme of the Allegro is not the first theme, with which it sets in, that tumultuous, almost barbaric rhythm, with a strange hitch in it, the accents falling on the weaker parts of the measure; this soon subsides, only to return once more for a brief spell near the end of the movement. The second theme, which is essentially identical with those first two bars of the introduction, is the one which pervades the whole piece, the fibre out of which it is all woven; it comes now in longer, now in shorter notes, now in bright and now in sombre colors, but the figure runs through the whole pattern; even the bright, crisp little answering phrase chirped out so gaily by the reeds, and passed about so glibly, is still the same theme quickened and compressed within half the time, a dancing image of itself, as it were, flung from a wavering mirror.

The Scherzo is a delightful episode, poetic and original. Those madly hurrying triplets in the strings, rearing their crests like waves, and breaking against the bold headland of the tutti; this repeated over and over; then the lull, broken by the mysterious sobs and gusts of reeds; the loud call of the clarinet tone, conjuring up that quaint dream of water-sprite or fairy revels, where the muted violins rush up and down the while with a harp-like figure in sextoles, like the wind sweeping through the pines; this interrupted ever and anon by those wild, loud breakers, whose crescendo finally absorbs all the forces of the orchestra, flooding all else out of sight:—is not this a Scherzo for which the poet listened to the wild waves themselves?

The slow movement, Andantino grazioso, has a sustained and lovely melody, of a musing, tender character, first sung by the oboe, and gradually warming through the whole. Very beautiful is the effect where three figures are combined, the softer wind instruments all singing the melody, while the violins divide in harp-like chords, and the violoncello keeps up a monotonous little eddy in an under-current. Those heart-felt obligato passages for the 'cello in the latter part may almost have been written for Wulf Fries. The Finale, Allegro con fuoco, is the wildest, strangest and most thoroughly Northern of the whole; it is full of tumult and heroic grandeur; summons up the Vikings and the old mythology; there is a something like a march of giants in it, and with what a rich broad arpeggio accompaniment of all the strings! At length the original theme of the introduction and first Allegro comes back and completes the circle. The whole Symphony was remarkably well played, (the great bass tuba adding to the effectiveness of the gigantic passages.) and it seemed to be fully appreciated by the whole audience.

The Second Part consisted of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, conducted by Mr. LANG, who had drilled the chorus of some eighty ladies. The Overture was marred in the opening chords by an instrument or two being not quite in tune, but for the most part the instrumental pieces sounded very well, including: the Scherzo, which introduces Act 2, so significant of Puck and fairies; the labyrinthine Intermezzo, so suggestive of the bewildering pursuit and flight of the lovers in the woods, then of the falling to sleep exhausted, and then the invasion of the stillness of the place by the comical bombastic march of Bottom and his stage-struck comrades; the lovely Nocturne and the Wedding March, which sounded statelier than ever. The Duet and the Song, in connection with the two choruses of fairies, were very nicely sung by Miss HOUSTON and Mrs. J. S. CARY. The choruses, however sweet and visionary, were hardly enough palpable to mortal hearing; it may have been the timidity of amateurs, or it may have been the manner in which the little choir was placed back in one corner of the stage. Yet all the music was delicious to all ears, and left a sense of airy grace and lightness, of true soul's poetry and freedom, associated with the whole concert, which indeed was short and seemed much shorter.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The eleventh Afternoon Concert opened with the brilliant "Tell" Overture, followed by the great Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which is always edifying. Then came a long, old-fashioned, florid flute solo, by Furstenau, played with rare perfection of execution by Mr. GÖRRING. This of course tickled many ears. But a deeper interest was felt in the appearance of the young ALICE DUTTON, who played (for the first time here with orchestra,—a day before the Symphony Concert) Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Gioioso, and played it wonderfully well for one almost a child. Her hand hardly spans an octave, so that the opening chords were weakened by being struck somewhat arpeggio; but with this allowance she went through the difficult piece with unflagging firmness and precision, and with intelligent shading, so that it was enjoyable. The girl has talent and the air of being sincerely absorbed in her art.

The twelfth concert, last Wednesday, brought the series to an untimely close,—for the reason, that the Music Hall is pre-occupied for about the whole of April to the exclusion of things musical! This last programme was admirable, and it was creditable to the very large audience, as well as to the performers, that the whole seemed so well appreciated. First came a repetition of Norbert Burgmüller's Overture "Dionysus," which we enjoyed even more than before. Then Gade's C-minor Symphony, in answer to the demand created by the fine impression it made in the last Symphony Concert. It was keenly relished. And it was a happy accident, we thought, which substituted for the Serenade by Reissiger, announced on the bills, the witching and quaint Allegretto from Mendelsohn's Scotch Symphony. It followed naturally after Gade, suggesting close affinity of subject with interesting contrast of artistic power.

Mr. HENRY SUCK showed the earnestness of his direction by choosing for his Violin Solo the Andante and Finale of Beethoven's Concerto. His rendering lacked vitality, imaginative fire, a certain magnetism (such as Joachim has) which would have redeemed the otherwise literal and home-spun character of that Rondo theme, for instance; but it was skilful, conscientious and correct, and Mr. S. by this and former efforts places himself among our best violinists.

HAYDN'S "SEASONS." Mr. B. J. LANG deserves well of the republic for having given us, for the first time in Boston, a hearing of all four parts of Father Haydn's genial and delightful Cantata, Pastoral, or whatever it may be called. He had gathered together a crowd of heartily interested singers, some 250 voices, fresh and telling, and drilled them well; a full orchestra for the rich and graphic instrumentation; and secured competent vocal artists for the three characters that individualize a large part of the poetry, which follows mainly in the beaten track of Thomson. The performance last Saturday evening was extremely interesting; the Music Hall almost crowded, in spite of the East wind.

The "Seasons" was the last work of Haydn, composed about the year 1798, when he was nearly seventy years old, and certainly displays a marvellous degree of vigor and vivacity of fancy. In some respects it is more interesting than the "Creation," though many of its passages are only reproduced from that and sound, with all their elegance, but too familiar. As a whole, it plainly suffers from its ambiguity of character, being secular, pastoral, almost operatic in its real inspiration, prompted by the impulse to paint the changing phases of Nature and the simple joys of country life, while at the same time striving to secure some of the dignity of Oratorio. It is in just these graver and would-be grander parts that it is weakest. The more elaborate contrapuntal choruses certainly do not compare with "The Heavens are telling" and the other grander moments in the "Creation." But in the lighter and descriptive portions, which form nine-tenths of the work, we find it richer than the Oratorio. And what variety and contrast!

The Overture, portraying the passage from Winter to Spring, is a fine orchestral piece, answering its purpose well; though less quickening to the fancy than Mendelssohn's treatment of the same subject in the prelude to the "Walpurgis Night," (for the hearing of which also Boston is indebted to Mr. Lang). The chorus: "Come, gentle Spring," is simply perfect, the very breath and soul of Spring is in those fresh, delicious harmonies. (Was it not sung a very little too fast?) The homely bass air of Simon, describing the husbandman in the field, old as it sounds, recalls the character to the life; all the more that its phrases are familiar, that the tune is almost the same that Rossini caught again from nature afterwards, at a quicker tempo, in his Zui, zitti, and that the orchestra, so richly occupied (how friendly the bassoon runs along by the side of the voice!), borrows a hacknied subject from the "Surprise" Symphony. The Trio and Chorus: "Be propitious," the Duet of Jane and Lucas: "Spring, her lovely charms unfolding," the chorus of girls and youths, in short all of this Spring music is delicate and full of Spring; and the closing chorus of thanksgiving is impressive in spite of what we have said above.

In the "Summer," the salient point is the Thunder Storm, so skilfully prepared with recitatives and lowering accompaniment, and worked up to a terrific climax with chorus and orchestra. The transition to the softer chorus after the passing of the storm: "Welcome, gentle sleep!" seems too abrupt, and lacks the true sense of Beethoven. But the "Summer" has many very fine traits. The bass air about the shepherd driving out his flock, the glorious mounting of the Sun (trio and chorus); and especially the tenor Cavatina and recitative about the intense heat: "Distressful nature fainting sinks," are, taken with the instrumental figures, singularly graphic.

In the "Autumn" we have the most stirring of hunting choruses, followed by the still more rousing Wine chorus, with the imitation of the bagpipe and the fiddle: is there not wonderful vivacity and power here for an old man of seventy! But perhaps the original thing of all is the song and chorus of the "Spinning Wheel" in the "Winter"; the "Wheel moves gaily," but the mood is minor and the pensive mind broods on. The instrumental picture of the approach of Winter, and the tenor air describing the traveller perplexed and lost amid the snow, are quite as characteristic as the music of the other seasons.

On the whole, the work was very fairly rendered for a first time, considering too that the fear of its great length must have made the conductor somewhat nervous. There was some uncertainty in the "Thunder Storm," which had been less rehearsed, but most of the choruses were made quite effective; and the instrumentation, except now and then in the delicate fitting together of fragments with the recitative, came out satisfactorily. Some of the recitative dragged, and indeed there was an uncomfortable amount of it for the singers, wisely curtailed as it was. Miss HOUSTON in all the music of "cheerful Jane" sang admirably; we never have heard her bright, clear, musical soprano to more advantage; the style refined, the declamation good; the only weak points being now and then in the nervous and uncertain beginning of a piece of fragmentary recitative, particularly in the lower notes. The dialogue of her humorous story at the winter fireside was given with great spirit. Mr. SIMPSON, from New York, is certainly the best tenor (outside of the opera) that we have heard here for some years. His voice is truly musical, pure, sympathetic, and his delivery we should call refined but for that one bad habit of false portamento, which sounds so lack-a-daisical, and grows so tedious in his recitative. Pray, let him reform that altogether, and he must be in great demand wherever oratorios or other noble concert music needs a tenor. His voice, however, is rather delicate than powerful, and was rather overshadowed in some of those beautiful Trios. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN sang like an artist as he always does.—Mr. Lang should feel rewarded for this brave effort, and we trust the "Seasons" will come round again.

IN PROSPECT. To-morrow (Easter) evening, the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are to give us the long promised "St. Paul" of Mendelssohn, which ought to be as well known here as "Elijah," and is sure to interest nearly if not quite as much. Mr. ZERBAHN has drilled his forces very carefully, the chorus singers have steadily kindled to their work, the solos will be by Miss HOUSTON, Miss ANNIE CARY, Mr. CASTLE and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the orchestra is large, Mr. LANG will preside at the Great Organ, and there is every omen of success.

The sixth and last SYMPHONY CONCERT will be on the 19th of April, when young ERNEST PERARO, the gifted boy of eight years ago, will make his debut here, on his return from Germany, as a full-grown artist, playing the piano part in Hummel's Septet. Schubert's great Symphony in C, Bach's Toccata in F, arranged for orchestra, and the Harides Overture will also be heard. Mr. PERARO will give a Chamber Concert at Chickering's, probably on the following Saturday.

About the same time will come Mr. DAUM's second concert, when he too will play Hummel's Septet. Of his first concert, which was highly interesting, especially that Schuman Quintet, we have yet to speak.

Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZ, with whom all good memories of orchestra and Quintette Club have been so long associated in this city, proposes for the first time to claim an evening for a concert of his own. It will probably be in the Melodeon, in the latter part of April, and will no doubt offer a rich treat.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB are preparing to give the lovers of classical music in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, &c., a taste of their quality. More anon.

CINCINNATI. The third Concert de Salon of Messrs. KUNKEL and HAHN, (Feb. 1) offered Trios (for piano, violin and cello) by Reissiger, in D minor, op. 25, and by Mendelssohn, also in D minor, played by Kunkel, Hahn and Brand; Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, played by Kunkel; No. 1 of Stephen Heller's "Promenades d'un Solitaire," and Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, op. 14,—also played by Kunkel; and songs by Proch and Marschner, sung by Edward Herrmanson, baritone.

St. Louis. At the fourth Philharmonic concert, under the direction of E. Sobolewski, Gade's Oriental Cantata, "Comala," was sung. The other items of the programme were: Solo, Quintet and Chorus from Wallace's "Amber Witch;" the first part of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; a Cavatina, "Hope in Absence," by Wallace; Overture to Don Juan.

Fifth Philharmonic Concert: Overtures to La Gazza Ladra and Egmont; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Choruses: Nos. 1 and 2 from Haydn's "Last Seven Words," and "Summer Songs" by Sobolewski; Violin solo, Rondo Russe, De Beriot; and Scena from third act of L'Africaine.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS. On the 15th ult., the Choral Union of this place, assisted by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and other artists from Boston—enough to make up a small orchestra (Ribas, oboe; Goering, flute; Ryan, clarinet; Stein, bass; Hamann and Holm, horns, and Eltz, bassoon)—gave a concert at the Town Hall. Mr. T. W. Meekins was director; Miss K. E. Prince, pianist. The First Part consisted of Beethoven's Mass in C. The Second Part included Aubert's Overture to "Le Lac des Fées"; Rossini's Quis est homo (Mrs. Meekins and Miss Shepard); Adagio and Rondo from Spohr's Nonetto; Pirate's Chorus from Balfe's "Enchantress;" Schubert's "Elegy of Tears" (orchestra, with horn obligato by Hamann); Aria from Herold's Le Pré aux Clercs (Mrs. Meekins); Duet from Huguenots (orchestra); and Inflammatus from Rossini's Stabat Mater (Mrs. Meekins and Chorus).—Not a bad beginning!

PROVIDENCE. The Orpheus Club gave a concert at Roger Williams Hall, on the 9th ult., Mr. Wm. V. Greene directing. The Club sang: Becker's "Ruined Chapel;" "Wanderer's Night Song," by Lens; "Swell high the choral song," by Speyer; a Waltz, by Vogel; and a chorus from Cinderella. They had furthermore artists from Boston to enrich the programme. Miss Houston sang Guglielmi's Gratias agimus, "Impatience," by Curschmann, and a song by Macfarren. Mr. B. J. Lang played a Rondo Brilliant by Hummel, and a couple of pieces of his own. Wulf Fries played a Fantaisie on Scotch airs by Kummer; and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, besides accompaniments, contributed Suppe's Overture to "The Peasant and the Peasant," and the Andante and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, op. 44.

WASHINGTON, D.C. The national capital, never before blessed or bored with an Oratorio, has got the start of Boston this time in the bringing out of "St. Paul." To be sure, there was only a Steinway grand piano (with a "Professor" presiding) to do duty as orchestra; nevertheless a local critic, in a paper of the 8th inst., says:

"The concert of the Philharmonic Society, given last night, marks an epoch in the musical history of this city. Though many abortive attempts have been made to establish a permanent musical society here, the Philharmonic is the first one that has succeeded in maintaining an existence, and last night was, we believe, the first time that a full oratorio was ever performed in our midst. The one selected was Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' and it was given to a full house and a very intelligent and critical audience.

"The society had been rehearsing it for several months, and the manner in which they rendered the choruses (some of which are most impressive) was very creditable to their industry and musical talent, eliciting, as it did, the intelligent applause of the discriminating audience. The solo parts for male voices were taken by Mr. George Simpson (tenor) and Mr. J. R. Thomas, (basso), of New York, who each gave the sublime passages entrusted to them with fine effect.

"The soprano solos (mostly recitative) of the first part were given by Mrs. Butts, with more than her usual feeling and skill. Miss Daniels did well in the solos of the second part, and the same may be said of Mrs. Caulfield.

"Dr. Caulfield used his baton with energy and grace, and deserves great credit for the good discipline under which he seems to have brought his singers."

The Society, it seems, are invited to repeat "St. Paul" in Baltimore; then they go to work upon "Elijah."

Mr. Grover's German troupe have been doing quite well in Washington, giving, among other things, William Tell, in which Herr Wilhelm Formes did not particularly please as Tell.

BALTIMORE. Carl Wolfsohn's second soirée occurred on the 14th. He played Beethoven's great B-flat Trio (Mr. Jungnickel being the 'cellist); Songs without Words, by Mendelssohn; Schumann's Andante with Variations for two pianos, with Mme. Weiler; and Reminiscences of Robert le Diable, by Liszt. Miss Eichberg sang Schubert's "Gretchen at the spinning-wheel," and two songs by Mr. Wolfsohn, called: "I wept while I was dreaming," and "The Water Lily."

PHILADELPHIA. Last week the Germania Orchestra gave, at their public afternoon rehearsal: Overture to Zampa; Serenade, for violin and horn, by Reissiger; Waltz, by Lanner; Andante from the "Pastoral Symphony;" Overture, "The Hebrides;" Mendelssohn; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance;" and Indian March from L'Africaine.—This week, being (as the "local" suggests) Holy Week, the programme was to be "of a different character" and include, for once, a whole Symphony, and that the longest one known, and certainly one of the best, Schubert's in C.

Of Mr. Wolfsohn's seventh Beethoven Matinée (March 20), the Bulletin says:

The group of sonatas presented yesterday by Mr. Wolfsohn is not, perhaps, as interesting a selection of that portion of the composer's works as were those upon the last programme, which included the "Pathétique," and the sonata in A flat op. 110, the latter a majestic work, undoubtedly greater in conception and design than the "Pathétique," and of which there are numerous passages which the piano is inadequate to present justly. Mr. Wolfsohn's last programme also included the sonata in E flat, op. 7, scarcely known here, yet a work thickly crowded with passages of marvellous beauty, and which occasioned a regret that such an inspiration should have remained so long unknown, or it may be, forgotten.

The Sonata in F sharp major, op. 78, performed by Mr. Wolfsohn, yesterday, is not to our mind, a work that can add much to the fame of its composer; and were there not circumstantial evidence of its being Beethoven's, we should feel justified in hesitating to place it (!) among his Sonatas. It is, by no means, a grateful task to perform such music, but Mr. Wolfsohn made the Sonata as interesting as may be, and his manipulation of the very difficult Allegro assai did not elicit the applause that it deserved. The Sonata op. 27, No. 2, in C sharp minor, known as the "Moonlight Sonata," is tolerably familiar to the musical public, although we fancy that to many, who knew it only through the inartistic performances of boarding-school misses, many beauties, hitherto concealed, were revealed by Mr. Wolfsohn's careful and complete rendering of this divine composition. The other item of the programme, the Sonata in E major, op. 109, interesting as being dedicated to Bettina Von Arnim, is in the master's latest style, having been composed in 1824. The most interesting movements are the Prestissimo and the Andante molto, the theme, with its six magnificent variations, at the end of which the ear is delighted with the recurrence of the theme. The subject of these variations is exquisitely beautiful, and was reproduced by the pianist with a rare attention to the details of expression that added greatly to its effect.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Gentle dove! Song. Ch. Gounod. 30
One of the very sweetest of recently published songs. It is the invitation of a gentle lady to a white dove to "sip with me," and "sip pearls of dew from cup of amber." Music very pretty, and all easy.
- Swift o'er the glassy tides. (Bon à ridicolo.) A. Ruedegarr. 50
One of the best Italian songs of the year, with Italian and English words. The melody is smooth and flowing, and not too difficult for common singers. The English words constitute an evening gondola song, well suited to a sail on the Bay of Venice. For Soprano.
- Cheer up, Sam! or Sarah Bell. Song. C. C. Willis. 30
It was quite kind in the poet to administer consolation to Sam (-bo) in this melodious manner. Good melody and fine chorus.
- He cares for us all below. Song. W. Kittredge. 30
Very simple, and quite pretty. Commences in charming style.
- Keep thy tongue from evil. Q't. J. H. Southard. 40
Another of the well-known and excellent series.
- Sooner or later. Duet. Lenta Vese. 30
Easy and pretty.
- Father's come to bless us. Song and chorus. J. W. Turner. 30
- Fairy's song in Danse des Fées. C. A. White. 30
Easy and melodious, and by good composer.
- Sing birdie, sing. For Guitar. S. Winner. 30
O ye tears. " " " " 30

Instrumental.

- The Gazelle Polka. L. P. Gerville. Four hands. 50
A brilliant composition, of easy medium difficulty. Good for practice and for exhibitions. Arranged by G. W. Hewitt.
- The Long, Long Weary Day. A. Brumback. 40
No. 28 of the "Crown Jewels" and is uniform with many of the others in excellent, tasteful arrangement.
- Kurek's celebrated Funeral March. Arr. by J. W. Kennedy. 30
Quite simple and easy, but of massive harmony, and among the best of its class.
- Sans Souci. Galop de Bravoure. Four hands. J. Ascher. 75
Very brilliant. Not difficult, and a good show piece.
- La Norvegienne. Caprice for Piano. E. Ketterer. 60
An original kind of melody, probably of Norwegian origin, well arranged and extended, so as to form a piece decidedly interesting.
- La plainte des Sylphes. Nocturne. S. Smith. 60 Chant des Oiseaux. (Morceau de genre. S. Smith. 75
Characteristic of the composer, who has, so far, not composed anything noticed in these reports, which was not good.
- With a dash. For Cornet and Piano. C. Koppitz. 75
A splendid solo, with accompaniment. It has made quite a sensation in Boston.
- Arab song. For piano. B. Richards. 50
Das Bächlein. (Rivulet). For piano. Fararger. 35
Two elegant pieces, of medium difficulty.
- Congress grand march. For guitar. W. L. Hayden. 30
Caroline schottisch. J. H. Seipp. 40
Fannie schottisch. C. R. Dodworth. 35
Emeline galop. J. R. Hamilton, Jr. 40
Homewood galop. Polka mazurka. Wanelick. 35
Good and useful pieces, but cannot, for want of space, be noticed separately.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The Austrian Nobility and Music.*

In the old musical history of Austria the Privatcapellen, or private bands, of rich noblemen, constitute a most important element, the value of which has not yet been properly appreciated. Though the musical doings of the aristocracy excluded, by their very nature, the idea of publicity, they still directly affected musical matters generally, because, to a certain extent, they supplied the want of the system of concert-giving, a system which did not then exist, and strongly influenced the course of its subsequent development. The most wealthy and most prominent members of the Austrian nobility, the Schwarzenbergs, the Liechtensteins, the Thuns, the Lobkowitzes, the Kinskys, the Grassalkowitzes, the Esterhazys, &c., formerly had "private chapels," that is to say: musicians whose services were exclusively theirs, and who were officials or officers of their households. Spending the winter in Vienna, and the summer on their estates, these nobles were followed, in both cases, by their private bands. To possess an especially good private band was an object, and certainly not the worst one, of aristocratic ambition. Whoever could boast of such a band was fond of having it play in Vienna, for the amusement of his high-born guests. These private performances were enjoyed by only a privileged few, but the fame of them sometimes forced its way far and wide. One of the most celebrated private bands was that of Field Marshall Prince Joseph Friederich of Saxe-Hildburghausen (born, 1702; died, 1787). This passionate admirer of music, a favorite of Maria Theresia, gave concerts, or "academies," as they were called, every week, to the leading members of the nobility in his palace, now that of Prince Auersperg, on the Josephstädter Glacis, Vienna. Bonno, the Court Capellmeister, was engaged at an annual salary to conduct these grand concerts, which took place every Friday evening during the winter. When Gluck returned from Italy in 1751, his services, also, were secured. The evening previous to the concert, there was always a rehearsal, when the band was strengthened by a number of the best orchestral players in Vienna, for there was then no theatre open on Friday. At the head of the band was Dittersdorf (then simply plebeian Ditters) as first fiddler. If any celebrated virtuoso visited Vienna, Bonno had first to arrange the terms of remuneration, and then invite him to play. When the Prince quitted Vienna in 1759, the Imperial Court Theatre engaged Dittersdorf together with the best members of the band. The excellence of Prince Esterhazy's band at Eisenstadt, and its importance in musical history, are well-known; in winter, it followed the Prince to Vienna. It was for this band that Haydn wrote most of his instrumental works, nay, even operas, after having composed, when in the service of the Bohemian Count Morzin, and consequently for another private band, his first Symphony. Private bands like those of Hildburghausen, Esterhazy, Lobkowitz, and Schwarzenberg, were regarded as integral parts of musical life in Vienna; the city was proud of them, though deriving little or no advantage from them. We may consider the last part of this musical chain to have been the "Rasumowski Quartet," that obtained such celebrity for Beethoven and through Beethoven. It is the final link, smaller it is true, but hardly less valuable than the others.†

* From the Berlin Echo.

† A last, a latest, echo of this state of things was the admirable stringed quartet of Prince Cantoryski, which—with Maymader as first violin—though certainly not "in his service," regularly assembled once a week for many years, at the residence of the grey-haired Prince, and performed before him and such of his acquaintance as were really fond of music.

The palmy days of these bands maintained by noblemen spread around the middle of the last century; towards its termination they gradually set. The Musical Register (Jahrbuch der Tonkunst), for the year 1705, informs us that, in Vienna, "there scarcely exists any longer a private band, except that of Prince Schwarzenberg." Prince Grassalkowitz had reduced his orchestra to a mere reed-band, and Baron Braun maintained another to play when he was at table. At the same period (1795) in Prague, too, all private bands had ceased to exist, except the reed-band in the pay of Count Pachta. Yet there is not the slightest doubt that private bands had been more numerous in Bohemia than anywhere else, because the national talent for music, and the power, found even in the lowest classes of society, of playing some instrument or other, supported so efficiently the practice of having such bands. Bohemian gentlemen had no need of engaging musicians at a high rate, merely for music: they only required a knowledge of music from their agents and servants. The Büchsenspanner, or attendant whose place it was to load his lord's rifle, in noble families, was not allowed to don the livery until he was a proficient on the French horn.* Gyrowetz relates, in his Autobiography, how, when he was with Count Fünfkirchen at Chlumetz, he began composing Symphonies and Serenades "because, at that period, all the servants, all the upper officials, and even the chaplains were obliged to be musical." Such private bands drew forth hidden talent from obscurity, while the execution of table-music and serenades, as well as the giving of concerts, soon directed attention to the best performers.

The part played by Bohemia, at the time noblemen had private bands, was a highly important one. At the most flourishing period of the Italian orchestra and opera in Dresden, a number of Bohemian artists were attracted thither. A great many did not even wait to be summoned, for, as they were often treated and paid by their masters as if they had been mere servants, the most skillful among them made their escape at the most favorable opportunity, and, with their instrument under their arm, went out into the wide world. An educational principle attended by far-spreading results was involved in this practice of keeping private bands. Everybody who supported one desired, of course, to obtain as many new and effective compositions as possible for it to play. These compositions had either to be furnished by the musician who was "engaged" as composer, or they were ordered of some composer of repute. The result was to give a great impetus to musical productiveness. Continuous consumption and constantly fresh demand occasioned constantly fresh production. Such men as Haydn, Gyrowetz, and Dittersdorf, never felt the want of artistic impulse; they had no necessity to look about for an orchestra, a public, or a publisher. Being able to command, at any moment, the services of instrumentalists and vocalists, who knew them intimately, they learned the technical part of their art as though in mere play; they learned how to compose practically, and effect a great deal with small means. But this state of things was, on the other hand, attended by many disadvantages. In the first place, there was the fact of composers having to write rapidly and often. They were called upon to meet an enormous want, to be satisfied rather by agreeable change and amusing occupation than by depth and grandeur of composition. As a rule, the composers did not follow their own inspiration, but the commands of their own "master," or the orders of a stranger. As they did not write for a large and independent public, but always for small circles alone, they were able to take things easily, and repeat themselves with impunity. A nobleman wrote and ordered at one and the same time six symphonies, twelve trios, twelve quartets, &c. Productivity on this extensive scale prevented profundity in the separate works, and is the cause of numberless instrumental compositions by Haydn and Mozart—to say nothing of those by Dittersdorf and Gyrowetz—being rapidly and irrevocably washed away by the stream of time. Beethoven, who served no master, and had not to supply a private band, was the first composer who did not, like his predecessors, send forth such vast quantities of music. The relative positions, too, of the composer or chamber-musician, and his high-born lord, involved, according to our notions, something inappropriate and sometimes degrading. The "patriarchal" element has always two sides: the pleasing one of kind and fatherly care, and the unbecoming one of arrogant guardianship. Without a doubt, in the subordinate relations of artists to their masters and patrons there were many elements of geniality, just as a patriarchal charm was not altogether wanting to the government of Friedrich the Great, or to that of Duke Charles of Wurtemberg.

Artistic, and more especially musical, matters were, during the eighteenth century, and in the commencement of the nineteenth, closely interwoven with the forms of political and social life; for our part, we cannot desire the return of either. The princely lord was accustomed to act as guardian not merely of art but also of the artist himself. Mozart was obliged to obtain permission from his Archbishop to play at a public or private concert, and often complained bitterly of its being capriciously denied him, though the refusal sensibly affected both his professional reputation and his income. On the other hand, he was "commanded" by the Archbishop to go and play in noblemen's houses, to-day in one, to-morrow in the other. Nay, sometimes, noblemen, though not possessing sovereign power, assumed, without the slightest scruple, a perfectly independent right of punishing their chamber virtuosos. Thus, not only did Prince Hildburghausen cause the fugitive Dittersdorf to be apprehended in Prague and brought back to Vienna, but, on his own authority, subjected him there to arrest for a fortnight, with nothing but bread and water every fourth day. Servile dependence upon a haughty magnate generates but too easily undignified humility. When Dittersdorf was appointed Capellmeister and chamber-composer to the Bishop of Grosswardein, his first request was that the latter would call him "Du."* He had not been accustomed to anything else from his previous masters. We all know how much Mozart was expected to bear, and actually did bear, before he finally succeeded in breaking out of the "patriarchal" cage. But even at a much more recent date do we behold artists voluntarily wearing their masters' livery before the general public. Nothing would have induced them, when travelling about as virtuosos, to omit on their posters: "Chamber Musician of Count So and So," or "In the Service of his Grace the Archbishop of Dash." They believed that this aristocratic collar raised them far above their colleagues who roved about as they chose. Even after the first twenty years of the present century, Schuppanzigh, Linke, and Weiss always described themselves as "In the Service of his Excellency Count von Rasumowski;" Moscheles gave concerts as "Chamber Virtuoso to Prince Esterhazy," and Tomascheck, the composer, of Prague, after he had not been in any one's service for many, many years, ever attached so great a value to the title, "Composer to Count Bouquoy," that he appended it to his name on every sheet of music.

* "Du," "Thou." The second person singular in German is indicative of great respect, such as that entertained by man for the deity; of great intimacy; or of immeasurable superiority. It is used, in the last sense, by masters in addressing their servants.—Ed. M. W.

The custom followed by great people in the last century of having celebrated composers or virtuosos in their service, contributed more than ought else to render an artist's position a very humiliating one for a considerable time afterwards. Even Spohr was required, in 1805, to perform at the Court of Stuttgart while the grand personages there were playing cards. We may assert that it was Beethoven who first broke through this ban of submission, and restored the musician his full, free dignity as a man. Though attached by many a bond to the highest aristocracy, though friendly with and indebted to them, Beethoven preserved the proud consciousness of being an artist, behaving himself as their equal, and allowing himself to be as little led by them in his actions as in his musical ideas. We perceive, from many instances, how caprice, how the dishonestly patriarchal element in this musical ancien régime was manifested in the thoughtlessness and lax morality with which high born musical amateurs distributed the most different offices and places, merely to turn to account the musical talent of the persons appointed. The Prince Bishop of Breslau, for whom Dittersdorf had become indispensable as a composer and violinist, but who did not want to pay much in this capacity, first gave him the place of a forest-ranger, and then that of a Amthauptmann and Regierungsrath,† in Freiwaldau, where he had to decide "Politica, Publica, et Judicialia." Dittersdorf, however, always resided with his master at Johannisberg, and a "substitute" performed his official duties in Freiwaldau. Moreover, as the office was one that had always been given to members of noble families, the Prince Bishop procured a patent of nobility for his melodious High Constable. When Gyrowetz was tired of leading the life of a musical vagrant, they could not give him for the moment a place as Capellmeister at Vienna. They made him, therefore, Concipist to the Imperial Court, and attached him to the main army. In this capacity he sometimes performed the most important duties as courier. Having been sent from headquarters with despatches to Vienna, he received an offer from Baron Braun of the place of Capellmeister at the Imperial Court Theatre, and naturally at once accepted it. Of C. M. Weber's labors as secretary to the Duke of Wurtemberg, his Biography, written by his son, relates some strange things. We believe that if Mozart had, in the year 1781, made his being created a member of the Consistory of Salzburg the condition of his returning to the Archbishop's Court, his desire would have been gratified.

But these princely patrons were even more fond of exercising an arrogant privilege over the works than over the person of the chamber musician. Everybody who ordered compositions for his own band, and paid for them with his own money, wanted, as a rule, to keep them for himself exclusively. Music which, as free as the elements, should delight all mankind, became the private property of certain counts and princes. It required especial magnanimity or indifference on the part of the aristocratic customer, or a lucky chance, for the compositions he had purchased to become known to the world at large. The history of music has rendered us acquainted with numerous remarkable cases of this description. Thus, one of the greatest admirers of Gassmann's music was Count Dietrichstein. He always paid the composer a hundred ducats for six Symphonies or Quartets, but then he insisted upon their being exclusively his. Gassmann carried out the agreement to strictly, that he would not even give these compositions to the Emperor, Joseph II., though the latter repeatedly expressed a desire to hear them. After Gassmann's death, the Emperor wanted Dietrichstein to have them engraved, but Dietrichstein would do nothing of the kind. A great number of compositions by Haydn, Mozart, and others, were never printed and never known, because they were kept as private property by those who ordered them. Nay, examples of this system, which strikes us, now-a-days, as so strange, are to be found at a very recent period. Thus, during his stay at Vienna, in the years 1812, 1813, Spohr was painfully dependent upon a rich manufacturer of the name of Trost. This vain musical amateur paid a considerable sum on condition that all Spohr wrote should be his for three years. During that period none of the compositions were to be published or played anywhere without the express permission, and in the presence, of Trost.

From the art-loving aristocracy, the cultivation of music passed into the hands of dilettanti of the middle classes. The one period merged without exciting remark into the other. But, when dismissing their private bands, the Austrian nobility by no means ceased to cultivate music altogether, or patronize it in a most liberal manner. On the contrary, towards the end of the last and the commencement of the present century, they are found forming the uppermost and most brilliant stratum of musical dilettantism in Vienna. They no longer supported bands of their own, but they played themselves. Not without satisfaction and patriotic pride may an Austrian look back to that period, when there was the greatest love of music in the highest circles, and when nobility of birth was so fond of allying itself to nobility of education and talent. Whenever anything was to be done for the advancement of music, the Viennese aristocracy were always to be found at the head of the movement. They did not, it is true, follow the example set by the nobles of Prague, in 1808, and found a Conservatory, but they can boast of doing other deeds which weigh down the establishment of such an institution. Everyone knows what are the monuments the Austrian nobility set up for themselves in the history of music; the one was their purchasing and being the first to produce Haydn's Creation and Seasons; the second was their assuring Beethoven an independent existence, free from pecuniary care, by settling on him an annuity of 4000 florins, without calling on him for aught in return.

We learn from Mozart's Letters what a prominent part was played in musical matters at Vienna by the nobility there subsequent to 1780, as well as the interest invariably evinced by that amiable lady, the Countess Thun, by Count Hatzfeld, Prince Lichnowsky (afterwards the friend and patron of Beethoven), and others, in Mozart personally and in his productions. Mozart did not give many public concerts, but the number of things he produced at the concerts of the high aristocracy was extremely large. Even in the winter of 1782, he was engaged at all the concerts of Prince Galitzyn. The next winter, also he played regularly there, as well as at Count Esterhazy's and Count Zichy's. In a letter written in 1784, he informs his father that, from the 26th February to the 3rd April, he had to play five times at Galitzyn's and nine times at Esterhazy's. His performance at these aristocratic circles constituted the principal source of his income. From 1780 to 1803, the nobles elected as their chief in musical matters, so to speak, Baron Gottfried van Swieten, a tall, serious, solemn man, who enjoyed almost the reputation of a high priest of music in Vienna. The musical performances given at his house on Sunday mornings, and in which Mozart took part, were not intended for a regular audience. The sole object of the master of the house and of those engaged in them was to become acquainted with classical compositions, especially those of Handel and Bach, which could not be then publicly heard in Vienna. Of far more general influence, on the other hand, were the grand performances of Handel's oratorios, for which Van Swieten engaged a considerable number of vocalists and instrumentalists. Many musical amateurs belonging to the principal nobility declared, at Swieten's suggestion, their readiness to bear their share of the expense; they were Princes Lobkowitz, Schwarzenberg, Dietrichstein, Counts Apponyi, Batthyani, and Franz Esterhazy, that is to say, partly the same circle of musical noblemen whom we see combining, ten years later, to get up a performance of Haydn's Seasons. The concerts took place generally in the Hall of the Imperial Library, Van Swieten being at the head of them; sometimes however they were given in Prince Schwarzenberg's palace in the Mehlmarkt. The admission was free, but none except specially invited guests were present. The rehearsals were held at Swieten's, and Swieten displayed very great assiduity in making the various preliminary arrangements. The performers belonged mostly to the Emperor's Private Band and the orchestra of the Opera. At first, Joseph Starzer was the director, and, after his death, Mozart. Young Weigl accompanied at the piano. For the performances of 1788-1790, Mozart made his well-known arrangements—for a long time the only ones used—of Handel's Messiah, as well as of his cantatas, Acis and Galatea, and Alexander's Feast, and the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day. Connected with these entertainments in the Imperial Library were separate grand performances in the Schwarzenberg Palace, such as the celebrated first performances of The Creation (1799), and of The Seasons (1801). Admittance was obtained only by special invitation to these performances also. They were not given periodically but, as a rule, there were some every year. They were established by a society of leading noblemen, Van Swieten being their "perpetual secretary." Another offshoot were the "Concerts of noble Amateurs" or "Gentlemen's Concerts" ("Adeliche Liebhaber-Concerte" or "Cavalier-Concerte") as they were called. They were established in 1806 under the patronage of Prince Trautmanndorf, and brought to a close by the memorable performance of The Creation in the Hall of the University, on the 27th March, 1808, when Haydn appeared for the last time in public. With this ended any active part taken by the leading members of the Austrian nobility in grand musical performances. With rare exceptions, they withdrew their patronage from the larger forms of orchestral and choral compositions and directed it exclusively to pleasing chamber music. We all know with what influence and benefit their cultivation of music in this form also was attended for Beethoven. It was in the houses of Lichnowsky and Rasumowsky, of Counts Fries and Brunswick that the majority of his Quartets, Trios, and Sonatas met with the most enthusiastic reception when first performed.

A most lively picture, painted from life, of musical affairs in the aristocratic circles of Vienna is to be found in the Confidential Letters of Herr J. T. Reichardt, Prussian Capellmeister, who resided at Vienna in 1808 and 1809. It was at this period that the dying flame of aristocratic musical patronage blazed forth in one last brilliant effort. Reichardt went from one aristocratic concert to another. But concerts were not the only entertainments. At Prince Lobkowitz's, Italian operas were performed most satisfactorily by amateurs. Reichardt, whose opera Bradamante was entirely rehearsed there, calls the Prince's mansion "the true residence and academy of music." Beethoven's Eroica was first executed there, the Prince having purchased the score from the composer. "There," says Reichardt, "rehearsals may be held at any hour in the very best places for such a purpose, and very frequently several rehearsals are going on in different rooms at the same time"—a convincing proof that the Prince did not care about mere pomp and show. Finally, can we have a more pleasing picture of the manners of the time than that presented by Prince Lichnowsky at the rehearsal of Christus am Oelberg? "It was a frightful rehearsal," Ries tells us. "It began at eight o'clock in the morning (in the Theater an der Wien); at half-past two, every one was worn out, and more or less dissatisfied. Thereupon, Prince Carl Lichnowitz, who had been present from the commencement, had large baskets full of meat, bread-and-butter, and wine brought in. He kindly invited all present to help themselves, which they did with a will, and the result was that everyone was restored to good humor. The Prince then begged them to try the oratorio once more so that everything might go off quite smoothly in the evening, and Beethoven's first work of this kind be presented to the public in a manner worthy of it—and so the rehearsal began again." Such zealous patronage of music would be deserving of all praise even had it educated and entertained only the aristocracy themselves. But its beneficial effect extended beyond this. It was plainly seen (having been rendered possible and advanced by the French revolution, that had preceded it) in social matters, connecting the artistic world and the educated middle classes with the great nobility. Music brought about this free approximation of classes in a degree of which our own time, democratic as it is, has no longer an idea. The mere fact that Reichardt, a simple Capellmeister, and by no means a first-class celebrity, should be eagerly invited to, and feted in, the highest circles, speaks volumes for the interest felt for art and the kindness of those composing them. At Prince Lobkowitz's soirées, Reichardt repeatedly met Arch-Dukes, especially Rudolph and Ferdinand, besides composers, scholars and virtuosos—all associating with each other without any restrictive etiquette. The Arch-Duke Rudolph (Beethoven's generous friend and patron) did not hesitate to amuse the guests at these parties by his admirable pianoforte playing for hours together; the Countess Kinsky sang, etc. If there was a musical party at the house of any of the bankers, Pereira, Arnstein, or Henikstein, the visitors might reckon upon meeting some of the very highest aristocracy, such as Lobkowitz, Kinsky, Dietrichstein. There is no doubt that, in this respect, we have retrograded, and can no longer boast of assemblies where music exercises so pleasing a power in bringing people together and levelling social distinctions. The love and cultivation of music do not play among the aristocracy of the present day the part they once played; we no longer hear of grand concerts in the houses of noblemen, far less of concerts in which the latter themselves take an active share. We cannot certainly be so prejudiced as to blame them for the latter fact. While the system of concert giving, too, has been carried to its greatest extent in public, music among the middle classes has been reduced to the narrowest limits. Concerts in the houses of private gentlemen, concerts which used to fill old Vienna with their echoes, have been discontinued just as in the palaces of the nobility. People go to concerts, but they no longer give any; they listen to all the new quartets and symphonies, but they no longer play those quartets and symphonies themselves. Formerly, even the Imperial Court, with a total absence of all ostentation, set an admirable example. We well know what decided musical talent and accomplishments were possessed especially by the Emperors Carl VI., Leopold I., Joseph II., and the Arch-Duke Rudolph, and what a large margin was assigned in their daily arrangements to their own musical practice. Though the Imperial Court has never absolutely withdrawn its patronage from music, we must go back to a time long since past to see the Emperors and Arch-Dukes of Austria themselves distinguished as musicians, and deriving a pleasure from the active part they took in their regular musical parties. The concerts at the summer palace of Laxenburg, with full band, so frequent under Salieri or Weigl's direction, when the Emperor Francis played the first violin, and the Empress (Maria Theresa von Naples) sang, were totally discontinued at her death in 1807. The Emperor then devoted his attention to quartet-playing. The string-quartet, consisting of the Emperor Francis, Count Urban, Field-Marshal Butcher, and the Kapellmeister, Herr Eybler, at the Castle of Persenber, to which, on calm evenings, the boatmen listened on the Danube below, was the last faint echo of the time of Imperial musicians.

But even without any material obstacles, the pleasing concert system patronized in the palaces of the nobility at Vienna would have gradually disappeared before the growing power of modern public musical life. Political calamities, especially the war of 1809, so painful and humbling for Vienna, had, however, an especial share in definitively putting an end to this pleasant season of musical amusements. We may consider 1809 as the decisive turning-point of these agreeable aristocratic pleasures—as the year in which they died out. H.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The promised Symphony by young Arthur Sullivan was performed on the 10th ult.; with what success may be judged by the following account in the Times of the Monday following:

The Crystal Palace concert of Saturday afternoon was one of the most interesting ever given since Herr Manns, backed by those in authority, began to work in right good earnest, and lay the solid basis of what may now be fairly regarded in the light of an institution. Besides spirited performances of overtures by Beethoven, Weber (Fidelio, No. 4, and the Jubilee), some excellent violin playing, by Herr Carl Rose, a German artist to whom we shall, doubtless, have other occasions of alluding, and singing of the best by Miss Edmonds and Mr. Santley (whose reception was just as cordial and unanimous as on the night previous at Exeter Hall), there was a new orchestral symphony written expressly for the Crystal Palace Concerts by Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, who, if we are to expect anything lasting from the rising generation of native composers, is the one from whom we may most reasonably and on the fairest grounds expect it. Mr. Sullivan, by his music for Shakespeare's Tempest, became suddenly "a name" in the musical world; and ever since that music was first heard he has been looked to for something to raise the English school of music from the dead level of vainly aspiring mediocrity at which of late years it has for the most part remained. His Kenilworth, produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1864, can hardly be said to have done this, in spite of beauties that are incontestable. The symphony produced on Saturday, however, and received in the most flattering manner by one of the largest audiences we remember to have seen crowded together in the Crystal Palace Concert-room, is not only by far the most noticeable composition that has proceeded from Mr. Sullivan's pen, but the best musical work, if judged only by the largeness of its form and the number of beautiful thoughts it contains, for a long time produced by any English composer. We shall not attempt here an analysis of a symphony which cannot fail to be brought forward again, and that speedily, by one or other of the great metropolitan societies; but it requires little courage to say that a second hearing will be still more favorable to it than the first—inasmuch as, although there is so much genuine melody that it cannot fail to strike at once, the beauties are not on the surface. The delicate texture of the work, revealing the care with which it has been designed and carried out; the happy manner in which, while evidently finding it impossible to get entirely rid of the irresistible fascination of Mendelssohn's manner, the composer has been able in a very great measure to vindicate his freedom; the fanciful and quite unhackneyed shape into which he has thrown a scherzo built upon themes not otherwise strikingly new; the absolute loveliness of a slow movement (andante espressivo), in which—though again the leading theme cannot be praised for original freshness, while the epical matter has seemingly been inspired by a very characteristic passage in the Trumpet Overture of Mendelssohn—the melody moves on with unimpeded and serene placidity, set off and enriched by an orchestration of the most piquant; a first allegro, led into by a brief introduction (andante), which, as it were, strikes the key note, always subsequently more or less in evidence and itself marked by a breadth of outline and an ingenious complication of detail that make it interesting from first to last; and, to conclude, a finale which starts with a spirit and vigor sustained with undiminished power to the very end—one and all declare the new symphony a work of uncommon merit, a work which, if no more, is a guarantee for the value of what surely must follow, a work to the consideration of which it will be a pleasure no less than a duty to return. Mr. Sullivan should abjure Mendelssohn, even Beethoven, and above all Schumann, for a year and a day—like the vanquished knights errant, who, when conquered, foreswore arms for a like period. Not that Mr. Sullivan has been conquered, but that he must conquer; and the best way to do this is to study the most legitimate and natural models, in the works of Haydn and Mozart, trusting to himself for the rest. Mendelssohn is apt to cause young aspirants to mistake the utmost polish for original production, what in that very great master was a second nature becoming in his imitators simple mannerism. To follow Beethoven is something like endeavoring to traverse the wide ocean in a cock-boat; while the anxious contemplation of Schumann, that musical Sisyphus, forever striving at the impossible, engenders a tendency to abstruseness in the abstract at the expense of finished workmanship and genuine expression. The works of Haydn and Mozart in one sense, Bach and Handel in another, should be the text books of every young composer, who, ungifted with the genius of a Beethoven, is incapable of declaring himself, like Beethoven, independent of all precedents. Meanwhile, Mr. Sullivan, who, though young, is already shrewd enough to have steered clear of that dangerous quicksand, Spohr, the most mannered of all mannerists, has composed a first symphony which, or we are greatly mistaken, will, for some time hence, engage the attention of the musical world, and lead to a second that may possibly fix it for at least a generation. Beyond this we do not care to portend. The execution of the new work was marvellously good—all credit to Herr Manns and his admirably trained orchestra; and never do we remember a more spontaneous outburst of feeling than that which brought forward the composer at the termination of the performance.

"PARADISE AND THE PERI" AGAIN.—We have already copied one criticism suggested by the recent performance of Schumann's Cantata—the most favorable that we have seen; it was from the London Review. As further evidence that the English are slowly conquering their prejudices, we now give the notice of the Times of March 12, in which the valiant Anti-Schumannite still faces the enemy, but with a decidedly retreating movement; witness the passages we have italicized.

The first concert of the Philharmonic Society was wholly taken up with Robert Schumann's cantata entitled Paradise and the Peri. Nearly 10 years ago, (June 23, 1856), with Madame Lind-Goldschmidt as the Peri, this work was given by the same society in presence of the Queen and a brilliant company, Professor Sterndale Bennett, who at the beginning of the same season had been appointed to the post he has ever since held so ably, conducting. On that occasion, though Madame Goldschmidt sang as none but herself could sing, and every pains were taken to secure a generally efficient performance, Paradise and the Peri created no impression beyond one of extreme weariness—in short, it was an unquestionable failure. During the period that has elapsed, thanks to the persevering efforts of some devoted adherents, Schumann has made decided progress in this country. Of recent years our amateurs have been hearing so much good music, of the mere existence of which not long ago they had scarcely a notion, and such a large proportion of this good music comes direct from Germany, that they are much better prepared than formerly, and much more willing to listen attentively and endeavor to appreciate whatever may have received the stamp of German approval. That a large number of German music-makers have, since the death of Mendelssohn, held up Schumann as a model, is known by all who care to familiarize themselves with what goes on in the way of music abroad as well as at home. That their admiration for the new favorite is in a great measure justified by his merits, only an obstinate few, who think that to prove themselves consistent is never to admit that they can have been wrong, will deny; but, because certain compositions of Schumann have, however slowly, brought conviction with them, that everything he has left should necessarily prove as fortunate is harder to admit. Ten years, well employed by his disciples, have sufficed to raise a genuine interest, if not an unqualified liking for much that he has written; but we are inclined to doubt whether ten times ten years would ever make Paradise and the Peri, to any ears but those of enthusiastic partisans quand même, sound like aught else than a laboriously complex piece of clever dulness, containing many beautiful passages (especially in Parts 1 and 2), but these not standing out so clearly from the context as to fix themselves with vividness on the memory. Never was light musical poem impressed by musician with so heavy a touch. All the faults of Schumann are here exemplified—perhaps most strongly his vagueness of melody outline, and that want of continuous power, for which twice the richness of his orchestral coloring, twice the frequent ingenuity of his orchestral method of accompaniment, would not atone. Then the solo voices—soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass—are, without exception, so written for as to tax each voice with needless severity, and to little or no purpose. That there could be any possible sympathy between Schumann and Thomas Moore, none acquainted with the genius of both could for a moment have imagined; but three hours of sombre prolixity, relieved at intervals with flashes of evanescent brightness, would scarcely have been expected from the composer of those symphonies and overtures, which, together with some less important works, have been recently gaining attentive hearings, and winning over more or less easily persuaded converts for Schumann's music. It would be unprofitable again to enter into a detailed examination of Paradise and the Peri, or at further length to discuss its general merits and demerits. Enough that the English version, sung at the Philharmonic Concerts, is a translation back again from the German translation of Moore's poem, with such modifications, verbal and metrical, as the music rendered indispensable, and for which Mr. Bartholomew, in a brief preface, makes suitable apology; that the solo-singers—Madame Parepa, Misses Emily Pitt and Robertine Henderson, Messrs. Cummings, Whiffen and Lewis Thomas—all exerted themselves with praise-worthy zeal; that the orchestra was excellent throughout; and that the chorus went through its difficult and by no means grateful task as well as could be hoped for, remembering how limited is their allowance of preparatory rehearsal. Nevertheless, Paradise and the Peri left the same impression of weariness as it left 10 years ago, the only palpable relief to which was afforded by the tenor solo and quartet, Part 2 ("Die Peri weint"), the most melodious and symmetrically designed piece, and happily the shortest in the work. This was asked for again, and repeated; but no other "sensation" was elicited.

SECOND PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.—March 19.

The programme was as follows:

Part I.—Symphony, letter Q. Haydn; Skena, "Infelice." Miss Louisa Pyne, Mendelssohn; Concerto in E flat, Mr. W. G. Cusins, Beethoven; Aria, "Bel ragazzo." Miss Louisa Pyne, Rossini; Concerto in A minor, Herr Joachim, Viotti.

Part II.—Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn; Ballata, "Quando, l'arciduca la Normandia." Miss Louisa Pyne, Meyerbeer; Overture (Masaniello), Auber.

Conductor: Professor Sterndale Bennett.

Of the Concerto playing one of the Musical World's masqueraders (or doubles) writes thus:

It is a tremendous task to perform the Colossus of pianoforte concertos even creditably, and the position of Mr. W. G. Cusins, who had to act as substitute for no less an artist than Madame Schumann, was one hardly to be envied. The audience, by their applause, however, showed a strong sense of the courage and conduct of the young English musician, violinist, pianist and composer in uno, who was thus recompensed for the spirit of self-sacrifice that had urged him to undertake a task from which many would have recoiled. Mr. Cusins, but recently indisposed, was nervous at the outset, but speedily shook off timidity and played with increased and increasing composure to the very end of the concerto, when (as also after the first movement) he was applauded liberally.

The great feature of the concert was Viotti's concerto in A minor, one of the finest, most interesting, and at the same time most effective pieces extant, for violin with orchestral accompaniments. The violin was on the left shoulder and the bow in the right hand of Joseph Joachim (I cannot "Herr" him just now), who played gigantically (the word is used in earnest) from end to end. It was colossal playing, colossal in power, colossal in style, colossal in mechanism, expression and coloring, colossal in everything. It was to be his first and last appearance this season, and he gave the audience a test of his quality such as they are not likely to forget. His task accomplished, the giant, after enthusiastic plaudits, strode back from Hanover Square to St. James's Hall, where he had still to play in a trio of Mozart's, at the Monday Popular Concerts. I had almost forgotten the magnificent cadenzas—his, the giant's own—which, like exhalations, alternately streamed forth from the Viottiian context, and vanished, as though they proceeded from it by some phenomenical process at once natural and inexplicable. Vale!—Joseph Joachim! May your shadow never be less. We shall miss you during the summer season, but live upon the hope of your return next autumn.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The rival impresarii of Covent Garden and Her Majesty's are out with their flaming announcements for the season of 1866. Indeed they have already begun their performances, the former on the third, the latter on the seventh of April. Mr. Mapleson's prospectus (Her Majesty's) occupies three columns of the Musical World; Mr. Gye comes a week later with six columns; nine columns of such solemn self-laudation, puffery and bombast as leave our Grover, Grau and Marcetek quite in the shade. At this distance the details of single representations will have less interest than a general glance at all the season has to offer. Of the Covent Garden programme let the World inform us editorially (the Manager's announcement would be more amusing, but would overflow our bounds):

The new prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera is full of interest, and just as full of novelty. In welcoming back our old friends of last year—among whom it is enough to name Mlle. Adelina Patti, Pauline Lucca, and Antoinette Frizzi, Signori Mario, Ronconi, Graziani, Tagliafico, Brignoli, Attri, Ciampi, &c.—we are reminded of the return, after a year's absence, of Signor Naudin and M. Faure, and of that of Mlle. Ariot, after a two years' absence. Then, too, we learn that Mlle. Carlotta Patti—favorite of the concert-room—will make her first appearance on the stage, the parts of Marguerite in the Huquenots, and Isabel in Robert le Diable being especially reserved for her; and that our own brilliant songstress, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, is engaged, and will make her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera as Prascovia, in L'Etoile du Nord, Mlle. Adelina Patti playing Caterina.

The programme sets forth eight singers new to the English public. These are, Mlle. Aglaja Orzeni (from the Royal Opera House, Berlin—the best pupil of Madame Viardot), destined for Violetta in La Traviata; Mlle. Marietta Biancolini, a contralto (from the San Carlo at Naples)—put down for the Goat-boy in Dinorah; Mlle. Fanny Deconei (from the Theatre Royal, Hanover)—intended for Fides in the Prophete; Mlle. Testri (from the Italiens at Paris); Mlle. Morensi, American, (from the Royal Opera, Copenhagen)—selected for Siebel in Faust, and the Page in the Huquenots. Madame Maria Vilda (from the Royal Opera House, Berlin)—to whom are assigned the parts of Norma, Donna Anna, and the grand tragic repertory; Signor Fancelli (from the Royal Opera at Madrid)—who is to play Corentino in Dinorah; and Signor Nicolini (from the Italiens at Paris)—entrusted with Fra Diavolo, in Auber's opera, and Arturo in I Puritani. Of the forgoing débütantes we only know that Signor Nicolini is popular with the habitués of the Parisian Italian Opera, and that Madame Maria Vilda (Marie Wilt) enjoys a high reputation in Berlin.

The programme announces two absolute novelties, and several revivals. The novelties are Ricci's comic opera, Crispino e la Comare—produced last year at the Italiens in Paris (and a good many years since at St. James's Theatre, by the Italian buffo company); and Donizetti's Don Sebastian. The principal character in Ricci's work is allotted to Mlle. Adelina Patti. The parts in Don Sebastian will be sustained by Mlle. Ariot, Signori Naudin and Graziani, M. Faure and Herr Schmid. Among revivals are the Nozze di Figaro—cast with almost unprecedented strength, the chief parts being given to Mlle. Adelina Patti, Pauline Lucca, and Ariot, M. Faure, Signori Neri-Baraldi, Graziani, and Ronconi; Fra Diavolo—not with Mario, but with Signor Nicolini, as the Brigand Chief, supported by Mlle. Pauline Lucca and Signor Ronconi; I Puritani, with Mlle. Adelina Patti as Elvira; and La Traviata, with Mlle. Orzeni, Signors Graziani and Mario, as Violetta, old Germonet, and Alfredo.

Pauline Lucca as Auber's Zerlina, and Ronconi, with his inimitable white hat and cane; Adelina Patti, as Bellini's Elvira, and indeed as every character she may assume; Mario, too, in whatever he undertakes; the Africaine, with entirely new appointments; Costa, with his magnificent orchestra; the host of new comers, &c., &c., &c., hold out such promise as fully to justify expectations of the brightest.

As to the "novelty" above referred to we must confess we cannot see it. The "two absolute novelties," Crispino and Don Sebastian, are old stories already in New York and Boston, and the rest of the list is made up of the hack pieces of the lyric stage for the past few years. Mozart's Figaro is the only rarity which we may envy the Londoners, so far as the repertoire is concerned; of the great singers of the world they have the first pick, as usual. And Her Majesty's Theatre falls not behind in this particular, while its list of new or rarely heard important works is far richer. It embraces Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, with Mlle. Tietjens as Iphigenia; Mozart's Scrupolo (Die Entführung), with Titiens as Costanza, Dr. Günz as Belmont, Rokitsansky as Osmin; Spontini's Vestale (Titiens, Harriers Wippen, Juncu, Mongini, &c.); Rossini's Donna del Lago (Mme. Trebelli as Malcolm Græme, Mlle. Ilma de Murka as Elena, Gardoni as James V., Juncu as Douglas, Mongini as Rhoderic Dhu); Don Giovanni, with Grist (!), Titiens and Trebelli, Santley (the Don), Scaless (Leporello), Gardoni (Ottavio); Der Freyschütz, with Titiens, Mlle. Sinico, Santley, Mongini, &c.; Weber's Oberon, with Titiens as Rexia, Trebelli as Fatima, Mlle. Bettelheim as Puck, Sig. Stagho as Oberon, Mongini as Sir Huon, Santley as Schernamin; besides Dinorah, Mirella, Huquenots, Falstaff (Merry Wives), and selections from a long list, in which we notice Cherubini's Medea (brought out for the first time in London last year), Fidelio, Il Flauto Magico, Nozze di Figaro, besides the Verdi, Gounod, Meyerbeer, Flotow, Donizetti and Bellini pieces which are everywhere in vogue.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. (Alfred Mellon conductor).—The first concert of this season was given on Wednesday. The following was the programme:—Overture to King Lear—Hector Berlioz; air from (Edippe à Colonne, sung by Mr. Patey—Sacchini; Concert solo for clarinet and orchestra; clarinet, Mr. Lazarus—E. Silas; Scena and aria, "E dunque ver," sung by Madame Parepa, Rubinstein; Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream—Mendelssohn; Symphony in C minor (No. 5)—Beethoven; Aria, "Nina jolite et sage"—(Actæon), sung by Madame Parepa—Auber; Caprice for pianoforte in E, played by Miss Agnes Zimmerman—Sterndale Bennett; Duet from the Flauto Magico, by Madame Parepa and Mr. Patey—Mozart; Overture to the Vampyre—Marschner.

GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS. So familiar have the Gewandhaus audiences become with all the best works of the great orchestral composers, so almost blasé (so to speak) with hearing of good music, that they have at last had recourse to "historical programmes" for the sake of novelty. (For, of course, it did not take long to exhaust what was found edifying in the compositions of the present and "the future.") Those Historical Concerts must have been very interesting and instructive. The specimens reviewed in the first two were as follows:

The programme of the first concert on Thursday, 18th January, comprised Bach, Händel, and contemporaries; cantata for double chorus, J.S. Bach (1685-1750); Concerto for Clairchambalo, G. F. Händel (1685-1759), played by Herr Pauer; Aria, "Oh Sleep" (Semele), G. F. Händel, sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; Sonata in G flat, for the violin, by G. Tartini, David; a Christmas Carol for Chorus, "a Cupella," by Leonard Schröter (born toward the end of the 16th century); Symphony, by Carl Phil. Em. Bach (1714-1788); "Lavinia a Turno," Cantata for Soprano, by C. H. Graun (1701-1759), sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; Pianoforte Soli: a. Fugue by J. L. Krebs (1713-1780), Sonata by Galuppi (1706-1785), played by Herr Pauer. Choruses from the Oratorio "Israel in Egypt," Händel.—Second concert, Thursday, January 25th.—Ballo, "Helen and Paris," C. W. von Gluck (1714-1780), (Aria dei Atleti, Ciaccona and Gavotta); Cantata, "Euridice," G. B. Pergolesi (1710-1736), sung by Mme. Rudersdorff. Piano forte Soli: a. Capriccio by Friedemann Bach (1710-1734), b. Sonata by John Christian Bach (1735-1782), played by Capellmeister Carl Reuecke; Aria, "Consusa, abbandonata," J. Chr. Bach, sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; Overture, "Tigranes," by Vincenzo Righini (1756-1812); Overture, "Samori," by Abbé Vogler (1749-1814); Songs with pianoforte accompaniment: a. Arietta, "Ritorneli fra poco," G. A. Hasse (1699-1783); b. "She never told her love," J. Haydn, (1732-1809); c. "My mother bids me bind my hair," J. Haydn, sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; Farewell Symphony in G flat, J. Haydn. We hear that a "Return Symphony" by Haydn has lately been found, and that it will soon be performed at one of these admirable concerts.—Orchestra.

The fifteenth subscription concert (Feb. 1) formed another historical evening, embracing the French school from Méhul (1763—1817), the school of Durante and Cherubini (1765—1842), Cimarosa (1754—1801), and the German school of Mozart (1756—1791) and Reichardt (1752—1814). Mozart was represented by his Sorenade in B flat for wind instruments and double bass and the Count's aria: Ilai gia vinta la causa; Cherubini by the Overture to Anacreon and an entr'act from his opera Medea, first produced in 1797. Signor Marchesi, "whose archaic and artistic knowledge rendered him one of the best interpreters of an historical concert," was the singer.

Feb. 22. The chapter of musical history held up in the 17th concert was called "Beethoven and his Contemporaries." The programme contained: Kyrie for chorus and orchestra from Schubert's Mass in E flat; Overture, introduction and first duet from Spohr's Jessonda; Overture, arietta of Fatima ("Arabia's lonely child") and Quartet from Weber's Oberon; Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella" by Schubert; and, from Beethoven, the Coriolanus Overture, the Quartet from Fidelio, and the piano-forte Fantasia with orchestra and chorus.

In the following concert, representing the period after Beethoven, a young Bostonian had the honor of taking part, as will be seen by the following report which we translate from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik:

"The programme of the 18th Gewandhaus Concert (March 8), taking up the historical sequence again, represented Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Schumann and their contemporaries. The pieces performed were: Marschner's Overture to the "Vampire," which builds somewhat upon Weber's Euryanthe and Oberon; two male choruses, by Friedrich Schneider and Conradin Kreutzer; Meyerbeer's Struensee overture. Besides which, Herr CARLYLE PETERSILEA (of Boston), a former pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium, who lately, if we are not mistaken, has been enjoying the instruction of Von Bülow, played the Romanza and Rondo from Chopin's E-minor Concerto and showed himself technically a finely cultivated, as well as talented and tasteful pianist. The first part closed with two choruses from Mendelssohn's Antigone ("Orb of Helios," and Praise of Bacchus), in which the composer has admirably solved—so far as it is possible to reconcile contradictory elements—the hard problem of treating antique forms in a manner that appeals to modern feeling. Schumann's Symphony in E flat formed the second part. All the performances were satisfactory; and we must add that Herr Petersilea was warmly applauded and recalled."

The 20th and last Gewandhaus Concert had in the first part, Haydn's Symphony in B flat, and the Finale of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, "Loreley," Mme. Köster, from Berlin, singing the principal character; for the second part, Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

SOIRES OF A BOSTON PIANIST.—The Leipziger Tageblatt, March 20, has the following paragraph: "The young piano virtuoso, PETERSILEA, from America, who has charmed by his masterly playing in the Gewandhaus, and more lately at the festival of the Zöllner-verein, gives tomorrow in the great hall of the Conservatorium a farewell concert and has invited many friends of art. He returns soon to America. (We are informed that his father came originally from Weimar, a descendant of the celebrated actress Petersilie, whose name Goethe changed to Sillie)." Mr. P. was assisted on this occasion by Fräulein Helene Friedländer, of Leipzig, and Herr Hermann Brandt, of Hamburg, and his programme contained: Sonata in C minor, for piano and violin, Beethoven; Bach's A-minor Fugue, transcribed by Liszt; Sonata in C-sharp minor by E. F. Richter; Song, ("Mondnacht," by Schumann, and Die Post, by Schubert); Fantasia in C, Schumann; Violin Concerto, Vieuxtemps; Polonaise in A flat, Chopin.

L'Africaine has been having its run at the Leipzig theatre as at all others; doubled prices, great enthusiasm, crowning of Meyerbeer's bust, &c., &c.—A few more items of the concert life in the old seat of Bach and Mendelssohn we find in the London Musical World:

The following was the programme of the concert given lately in the Gewandhaus for the Benefit of the Poor; Overture to Leonore, No. 1, Beethoven; Air from The Creation, Haydn (sung by Mlle. Asminde Ubrich, from Hanover); Concerto for the Violin, Litolf (Herr Dreyshock); Air from Semiramide, Rossini (Mlle. Ubrich); Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Beethoven (Herr Labor, from Hanover); Songs with Pianoforte accompaniment—"Ich hör ein Vöglein locken," Mendelssohn, "Dem Herzsallerliebste," Taubert (Mlle. Ubrich); and overture to Genoëva, Schumann. The above overture was performed, also, at the eighth Enterpe Concert, as was, likewise, Schubert's Symphony in C major. Mad. Sara Heinze played, moreover, Moscheles' G-minor Concerto; a Nocturne, Op. 15, No. 2, by Chopin; and a Polonaise, No. 2, in G flat major by Liszt. Herr Rebling sang an air from Don Juan, and Beethoven's vocal series: "An die ferne Geliebte."—Signor and Madame Marchesi were announced to give their Historical Concerts at the Gewandhaus. Their principal theme is the Italian school, especially the development of the air and the duet from 1600 to 1820. Herren Reinecke and David were to lend their services.

MUNICH.—Herr Franz Lachner has received from the Emperor of Mexico the Commander's Cross of the Order of Guadalupe. By the express command of the king, the Abbé Liszt's legend of Die heilige Elisabeth, words by O. Roquette, was to be produced, for the first time, on the 14th February at the Royal Court and National Theatre. Herr Hans von Bülow, who had been rehearsing the composition ever since the beginning of February, was to be the conductor. His Majesty has likewise ordered that "model" performances of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser shall take place during the summer months. Herr Hans von Bülow will be the conductor at these performances as well.

DRESDEN. From the report of the Royal Theatre, just published, it appears that there were three hundred and twenty-five nights between January 1 and December 31, 1865, on which the house was open to the public, and that during the year no less than one hundred and eighty-two different pieces were played, of which twenty-three were produced for the first time, and forty were what is called "neu-einstudirt." Of the one hundred and eighty-two different pieces forty-two were operas. The total number of performances (three or four smaller pieces being sometimes given on one night) was four hundred and fifty-two. Shakespeare was performed seventeen times, Schiller sixteen, Goethe five, Lessing three, Mozart twenty, Meyerbeer seventeen, Auber fourteen, Wagner thirteen, Weber eight, Rossini six, Donizetti five, Boieldieu four, Cherubini three, Beethoven two, Bellini two. There are not many theatres, we should think, where such a variety of really good performances are given.

COLOGNE. The interesting programme of our Seventh Gürzenich Concert in Cologne was as follows: (1) Overture from "Athalie," by Mendelssohn. (2) Die Grafaria, from "Nozze di Figaro," Mozart. (3) "Die Nixe" (the Naiad), a fantastic poem, by the Russian poet, Lermontoff, translated into German by Robert Sprato, music by Anton Rubinstein: Solo for contralto, female chorus and orchestra. (4) Concerto for piano and orchestra, composed and executed by Capellmeister Karl Reinecke, leader of the orchestra at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. (5) Duetto from the "Olimpiade": Nei giorni tuoi felicità, by Sacchini (1767). (6) Credo, from Cherubini's Mass, composed for the coronation of Charles Xth. (7) The Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. The well-known overture of Mendelssohn was capitally rendered and heartily received. It is a capital composition to begin a concert with, being both spirited and clear. The difficult and ever fresh aria of Mozart, sung by Signor Marchesi, was deservedly applauded. The composition of Rubinstein is a little bluette, very nicely scored, with the well-known romantic system of harp, flute, and horns, but it is not fit for a large room. The solo for contralto, intrusted to Mme. Marchesi, is very thin, besides being badly written for the voice. With the best execution in the part of the orchestra and chorus, as well as with the masterly efforts of the distinguished soloist, "Die Nixe ist nix" (nothing), as the Germans say, and did not produce a favorable impression. The concerto for piano is masterly written, but I find that the orchestra predominates over the piano itself, and in a very large room, like the Gürzenich Saale, the beautiful scoring absorbs the whole attention. In many points this composition shows that Reinecke is a great admirer of Mendelssohn. As a pianist, this gentleman belongs undoubtedly to the best school. His mechanism is perfection, and his style pure and unaffected. Herr Reinecke, who is an old acquaintance here, and has fulfilled the functions of professor at our conservatoire during many years, was loudly and heartily applauded. Highly interesting was it to hear the duetto of Sacchini. After a very expressive andante and piu mosso in E flat major, with some turn into the relative minor key, comes a most taking allegro in A flat major. This duetto, beautifully written for the voices, and delicately scored, is worthy to be placed next to the celebrated opera, "Edippo a Colonna," by the same composer. Sung to perfection by the two cari sposi, it met with decided enthusiasm, and was unanimously redemanded. Nothing is to be compared, (unless perhaps some choruses of Handel), to the grand Credo, by Cherubini, for orchestra and double chorus. The slow minor movement upon the words "Crucifixus etiam pro nobis," and the allegro, "Et resurrexit," are eternal models of beauty and grandeur in art. The execution by the very large chorus and orchestra was capital, and it closes the first part of the concert in a splendid manner. The Pastoral Symphony, which filled up the second part of the programme was wonderfully delivered, and thus I can safely say this concert was another page of fame for the great master, F. Hiller, its leader. Roger is going to sing in German a few nights at the opera here. I am afraid the great veteran will hardly stand a whole opera.

PARIS. Of the Abbé Liszt's Mass, conducted by the Abbé in person, the correspondent of the Orchestra writes:

The mass composed by the Abbé Liszt, and executed for the first time in Paris on the 15th at the church of St. Eustache, is not a new production. It was written for the consecration of the cathedral of Gran, at the request of the Cardinal Sztowski, Primate of Hungary, as far back as 1855, and published four years later at Vienna. The "Graner Messe" is I am told, the proper title. The success here was doubtful; but not the execution, which was unanimously pronounced to be wretched. Of course the special pleaders in favor of the Abbé's talent as a composer, and of his obvious tendency towards the music of the future, find "circumstances atténuantes" easily enough. For the matter of that, so do I; and I beg leave to explain. We are in Lent, and passing through a period of penitence and humiliation for the many sins we have committed. Très bien. If I am permitted to consider a careful hearing of the work as a set-off against, say, a hundred years of purgatory, I am content, though I feel I have got good and full weight; but if I am to regard it in a purely religious light, I am no longer of the same opinion, and beg respectfully to suggest to all "musicians of the future" that they should keep their compositions for the future; get them carefully packed in air-tight boxes (like those awful preserved peas we are occasionally condemned to eat), and leave in their wills a stringent regulation that no rash hand shall bring them to light until at least 1966. We shall all be dead, then, my friend, and as for our descendants, qu'ils s'arrangent.

The church was crowded, and the receipts amounted to about 45,000 francs. The orchestra was conducted by M. Hurand, the maitre de chapelle, and M. Batiste was as usual at the great organ, and improvised an entrée on a subject from the "Tannhäuser" probably with a view to be agreeable to M. l'Abbé. The soli were given by MM. Agnesi and Warot and two of the children of the choir. Madame la Baronne Caters was to have sung the soprano, but at the last moment the clerical authorities interposed and refused to allow the presence of women in the choir. Had this veto been extended to the band of the Garde Nationale, which struck up a march when the General Mellinet entered the church, and to the roll of drums beating "aux champs" at the elevation, it would have been as well.

The fourth concert at the Conservatoire, says the Revue Musicale, offered nothing especial but the habitual perfection of the orchestra, under the direction of M. Georges Hainl. The pieces were: Symphony in A by Mendelssohn, Adagio of Beethoven's Septet; Overture to Oberon, and choruses from a Mass by Cherubini. On the 11th ult., the programme was: Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Introduction to the first act of Psyche, by A. Thomas; Beethoven's piano Concerto in G, played by Mme. Szarvady (née Clauss); Double Chorus by Sebastian Bach; Overture to Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn.

The 19th Popular Concert of Classical Music in the Cirque Napoleon had for programme: Haydn's Symphony, No. 46; Mendelssohn's Melusine Overture; Dance air (Bourrée) by Sebastian Bach; the instrumental parts of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; Turkish March by Mozart. At the 20th concert the pieces were: Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture; second orchestral Suite by Fr. Lachner; Adagio from Haydn's 36th Quartet, by all the strings of the orchestra; Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

At the Grand Opera L'Africaine has had its one hundredth performance, with all the original singers. Don Giovanni has been brought out with peculiar care at the Italian Theatre, and there are to be rival representations of the same at two other opera houses.

Handel and Haydn Society.—"St. Paul."

Our old Oratorio Society have at length resolutely faced the problem of many years, have determined that they would do Mendelssohn's earlier Oratorio, and have done it. Done it so successfully, with audience so large, and so deeply interested, that there can be no longer an excuse for not allowing this public to become as well acquainted with it as it has for years been with "Elijah," which can hardly be pronounced a greater work, although it may have greater elements of popularity. It is indeed hard to say which of the two is greater. But "St. Paul" is a very grave and serious work, and must be taken seriously to be thoroughly appreciated. The music is singularly one in spirit with the subject and the text. The composer is so true to that, has so filled himself with that, that he seems hardly to have aimed at mere musical effect as such, but only at a noble, sincere, full and never overwrought expression of characters, events and sentences so full of meaning and so sacred; the expression thereof by those means and forms of musical art which had become to him an ever-ready, all-sufficient mother tongue. While therefore on the spiritual, the poetic, the dramatic side the work is so true, so earnest and so real, it is no less beautiful, original and whole as a work of art, a composition. With all its contrasts:—songs, chorales and choruses of serene, high Christian faith, turbulent outbursts of Jewish prejudice and vengeance, light-hearted, sensuous Heathen worship, it still preserves a unity of musical style which makes the beauty of all parts to be felt more or less in each part.

Like Bach in his Passion music, Mendelssohn in "St. Paul" builds upon the Chorale, the sweet, deep, heartfelt plain song of Protestantism. The half dozen Chorales which occur in the course of the oratorio, including that with which the Overture so nobly opens, form its several points of rest and of departure. Like Bach too, he entrusts the narrative, very condensed and plain, to a single reciting voice (soprano or tenor), which introduces the dramatis personæ and then lets them sing in person; now the two false witnesses, now Stephen, now Paul; now the voice from heaven: "Saul, why persecutest thou me?" which he gives to a soprano choir to make it as little earthly and (humanly speaking) as impersonal as possible. There is something quite dramatic in this arrangement, and Mendelssohn had the means of the modern orchestra and his mastery thereof to make it more dramatic still.

But if this music in its prevailing tone of color is more sombre than the Elijah, yet it is fully as exciting to the deeper feelings and strengthening to the soul. If it is less brilliant, and presents no such variety of vividly conceived and wonderfully painted scenes, yet the one theme is taken so to heart and musically developed with such consistency and such completeness that as a whole it is equally and even more absorbing—at least when one has listened to it carefully several times and studied it. There is nothing so graphic and overwhelming here as the Rain chorus, it is true; no such startling pictures shown forth on so large a canvas as the choruses: "The fire descends from heaven," "Behold! God the Lord passed by," and the like; but grand, inspiring, sometimes sublime expressions of trust in God, rising above the trials of the world, of light from Heaven, light within, illuminating the surrounding darkness, such as are found in the "St. Paul" choruses, are not surpassed in the later oratorio. Trust in God's word, sympathy with its preachers and prayer for them—this sets the keynote in the very opening chorus; and how grand it is! How well contrasted its three motives: first the strong, exulting invocation: "Lord! thou alone art God;" then, as the stately full flow of the accompaniment is broken into agitated triplets, the sense of persecution and danger: "The Heathen furiously rage;" this for the middle part, and then, the orchestra still agitated, the calm, long tones in which the voices pray that "strength and joyfulness" be granted to the preachers. And at this height how naturally comes the first great point of rest, the serene, rich, even-flowing harmony of the Chorale: "To God on high be thanks and praise!" It is the tune called in the old German hymn books "Allein Gott in der Höh sei Ehr;" and it will be interesting to compare this four-voice treatment of it with several various renderings by Bach. Now begins the stirring history: the martyrdom of Stephen and the conversion of Saul, forming the subject matter of the First Part, which closes with another grand chorus, fitly answering to that opening one, and similar in form, having a first, a middle and a final subject: "O great is the depth," clear, strong and jubilant; then, more involved in the weaving together of parts and figurative accompaniment, the thought that "His ways are past our understanding;" and the return of the first theme ushering in a quickened movement: "Sing His glory evermore," which is worked up to a climax, and the first theme: "O great is the depth," in slower tempo, ends the chorus as it began.

The opening and closing choruses of Part Second are somewhat more dry, but in the same dignified and noble style. On the other hand, looking for the present at the purely religious choruses which are outside of the action, the comments of the pious heart, which prelude to the story and at intervals relieve the strain of personal interest, what can be lovelier and sweeter than the two: "Happy and blest are they who have endured!" after the death of Stephen, and "How lovely are the Messengers" in the second part! These correspond in character to "He watching over Israel" and are quite as beautiful; the second has a melody which at once captivates and haunts every listener. These win and soothe by their tenderness; others startle and carry you away by their far-flashing, dazzling brightness. The chorus which follows Paul's conversion: "Rise up, arise," is perfectly resplendent as the full blaze of harmony bursts out after expectation has been aroused by the strangely dramatic crescendo of the orchestra, beginning with the low intermittent drum beat which forms an organ-point to the increasing, climbing harmonies, full of a sense as of a sudden reveille in the dark and a hurrying together from a thousand tents to witness the great revelation. This, and the succeeding Chorale: "Sleepers, wake! a voice is calling," with flashing trumpet interludes between the lines, are in the same spirit with "The night is departing," &c., in the Hymn of Praise, and not surpassed in that somewhat later work.

Then again, as opposite as possible to all of these, come the properly dramatic choruses, which keep up the excitement and the vividness of the scene throughout. Especially those tumultuous accusing choruses of the Jewish multitude: "Now this man ceaseth not to utter blasphemous words," "Take him away," and, terribly true to life as it is sharp and short, "Stone him to death;"—a good point, too, the repeating of the same music essentially when the cry is again raised against Paul as it was at first against Stephen; add also, in the same category: "Is this he?" and "This is Jehovah's Temple." Taunting accusation, blind rage and superstition, hatred and contempt for innovation, could not be more strongly portrayed in music, unless Bach has done it in his Passion. In still another vein and still dramatic are those choruses in which the Gentile crowd would worship Paul and Barnabas: "The Gods as Mortals have descended," and "O be gracious, ye Immortals." How full of cheerful, sensuous Greek worship, of "oxen and garlands" and flutes the latter, with its secular melody, sounds! Touchingly and tenderly dramatic is the (almost recitative) deprecatory chorus of the disciples addressed to Paul: "Far be it from thy path."

Turning now to the solo voices, we find their most important occupation here in recitative; all the narrative connecting parts are recited by a single voice, now soprano, now tenor, in few and well chosen words, of which the musical phrases set the meaning and suggestion in the clearest light, what with the aid of the always significant and carefully studied running commentary in the orchestra. The condition hardest to be realized to the successful production of the whole Oratorio is the finding of singers who have this rare art of recitative in any high degree of perfection; they must be real artists. The rounded arias are comparatively few, but they are very beautiful; these, like the first class of choruses of which we spoke, are impersonal; pious meditations, exhortations, &c., in which the whole history is looked down upon from a clear religious height. Best and most original of them all, perhaps, is the well-known "Jerusalem! thou that killest," which on this occasion was sung with fervor, sweetness and sustained nobility of style by Miss HOUSTON, who is in remarkably good voice this season, and less unsure of herself (for she always has good inspirations, passages and phrases that go right to the heart and quicken inwardly) than heretofore. She was no less successful in the other almost equally beautiful soprano Arioso: "I will sing of thy great mercies." In the trying recitatives she was often, but not always happy.

The contralto has but one air, a warm, sincere rich strain of melody (also well known in concert rooms): "But the Lord is mindful of his own," in which the large, rich voice and unaffected style of Miss ANNIE CARY told to good advantage; more animation, more earnestness, more study would do wonders with that voice.

The only air for the Tenor is in the Second Part: "Be thou faithful unto death," an inspiring and inspired piece of musical declamation, whose capacity of expression the lifelong study of a true singer could not exhaust. The clear, warm, golden voice tones are exposed in the strongest relief against the shaded background of low running accompaniment, so that the singer may slight nothing. Mr. CASTLE (who has rid himself of some bad habits since he was last here, and whose voice has even gained in reach and volume) sang it as if he felt that it meant something, and really gave an eloquent rendering. If he perseveres in his present direction of study and pursues in oratorio music a higher ideal of beauty than that found in English ballads or Italian opera, he will sing it better yet, and will in time become a very satisfactory oratorio singer. His recitatives in the First Part, especially that in which Stephen rebukes the council: "Ye hard of heart," demand the highest powers. He grappled with the task manfully and thoughtfully and with fair success, rising in one place to great energy of declamation, although the contrasts of loud and soft were somewhat too spasmodic.

There are two important arias (Bass) for Paul, both in the first part. The first is in his character of persecutor of the Christians: "Consume them all, Lord Sabaoth," and in its strong, iron weight and energy corresponds to "Is not His word like a fire and a hammer that breaketh" in Elijah, as both do somewhat to the tenor "Thou shalt dash them" in the Messiah. The other: "O God have mercy" is the prototype of the air of Elijah: "It is enough,"—the same deep, serious, tender, self-searching, brooding tone, roused to animated recitative in the middle by the resolution: "I will speak of thy salvation." Mr. WHITNEY delivered both airs in good, serious, manly style, his voice being in the main musical as well as ponderous and telling, though somewhat dry and hollow in the upper tones. His solo with chorus: "I praise thee, O God" is also one of the satisfying pieces in the oratorio. In the Second Part, his Duet with Tenor (Paul and Barnabas): "For so bath the Lord himself commanded," was one of the things which could not escape open applause. Paul also has a noble piece of recitative, where he expostulates with the Gentiles who would worship them as Mercurius and Jupiter: "O wherefore do ye these things," in which the singer may find matter for study for a long time.

The Oratorio as a whole was quite as well rendered as one could reasonably expect for the first time; indeed to those who considered the ever new difficulties which a work, so long, so taxing to physical and mental powers, presented in rehearsal, the effort exceeded expectation. The plainer choruses, especially the Chorales, went admirably,—a full, smooth, euphonious, well balanced and well blended stream of tone, refreshing and edifying to the hearer even in that hot and crowded hall. Most of the choruses, even the more complex and contrapuntal, were carried through well; save that it still threatens to take years to cure completely that chronic fault of all our large choruses, the timidity and non-appearance of scores of voices in certain difficult passages; the responsibility of carrying them through, and still more of taking them up, is generally left to the few who are more sure and confident. We think, however, that we notice a constant improvement in this particular; the only thorough remedy will be found in the same full attendance upon each and every rehearsal that is shown with such alacrity when it comes to a public performance. The joy of joining in the Festival must first be earned by study in rehearsal (and at home too).—The heavier choral passages were grandly held up by Mr. LANG's sparing and judicious use of the great Organ; and the extremely interesting orchestral accompaniments (a study by themselves), were made effective by a fuller band than usual, after good rehearsal. Mr. ZERRAHN conducted with his usual unflagging vigilance and energy, and has reason to congratulate himself upon the result of his long and faithful training of his forces to so great a task. We certainly think it a mistake of the Handel and Haydn Society not to repeat "St. Paul" at the earliest convenience; it has made a good impression once, and many hundreds of delighted hearers only wish to know it better that they may enjoy it and admire it more.

MUSIC IN PROSPECT. "St. Paul" brought the crowding musical excitements of the month past to a stately close, followed by a fortnight's lull. Another cluster of concerts shine ahead, enough to fill up the last ten days of the month. First in order comes,

Thursday afternoon, April 19, the sixth and last SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association. It can hardly fail to be as interesting as any of its predecessors. Few music-lovers need now to be told that Schubert's Symphony in C is as great a work in that kind as any man but Beethoven has ever written. This will fill up the second part of the concert; and as it is not found practicable just now to give the Choral Symphony, while the other greatest Symphonies of Beethoven are the most familiar to our public of all symphonic works, Schubert seems to be the fittest muster for a finale. In the first part the young pianist ERNST PERABO will play Hummel's Septet, the accompanying wind and string parts being taken by members of the orchestra. This will be preceded by the Toccata in F of Bach, not played on the Organ, but by the Orchestra, as arranged by Esser; and we are much mistaken if, brought out with such distinctness, such individuality in the polyphonic parts, it does not prove a new revelation to many listeners. Mendelssohn's poetic "Hebrides" Overture will close the first part.

Saturday evening, 21st, at Chickering's Hall, Mr. PERABO's Chamber Concert, which will be an occasion of rare interest. Mr. P. will play a Sonata of Beethoven seldom heard in public, namely that in E flat, op. 27, which forms the companion piece to the "Moonlight Sonata"; a very effective Concerto by Norbert Bürgmüller; various shorter pieces; and a Concerto of Bach for three pianos with Messrs. DRESEL and LEONHARD.

Tuesday Evening, 24th, at the Melodeon, Mr. WIL-LIAM SCHULTZE receives a Complimentary Concert at the hands of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of which he has so long been leader. And looking back over all our nice musical experiences of Symphony and Overture and Chamber Concert, beginning with the "Germania" times, what one of them does not at once call up with it, the pleasant face of Schultze in the fore-front, or at the head, among the strings? We all know how good an artist he is and how amiable; but he has never yet "rushed into print" as a concert-giver on his own account; this is his first concert, and we are sure it will be attended by troops of friends. He will be assisted not only by the Quintette Club, who of course will give us of their best on such an occasion, but also by the "Orpheus," now conducted by CARL ZERRAHN, who will sing "Die stille Wasserrose" by Abt, "Der Wald" by Häser, and a very striking "Reiterlied" by Liszt. Also by Miss ADDIE RYAN, Miss ALICE DUTTON, the young pianist, and by Mr. B. J. LANG. Mr. Schultze himself will play for a Violin solo the famous "Trille du Diable," by Tartini.

We had counted on an orchestral and choral concert by Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, about the same time, in the Music Hall; at which he expected to bring out a Symphony by Norbert Bürgmüller, Schumann's "Zigeuner-lied" (or Gypsy Canata) and choruses from the "Pilgrimage of the Rose"; and to have the aid of Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN from Philadelphia to play the Choral Fantasia of Beethoven. But he is obliged to postpone the project for a time, we trust not long, however.

Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the excellent basso and vocal teacher, gives a Soirée at Chickering's next Tuesday Evening. He will have the assistance of Miss HOUSTON, who will sing songs by Schumann, Franz and Hatton; Miss EDITH ABELL, one of his pupils, who will sing Donizetti's Com'e bello and Schubert's Barcarole; Mr. MERRILL, another pupil, who will sing an air from Handel's Rinaldo and Robert Franz's perfect "Schummerlied." Mr. LANG, too, who will contribute short and charming pieces by Mendelssohn, Schumann and Liszt. Mr. Rudolphsen himself will sing Schumann's "Dedication," a romance by Meyerbeer in French, an Italian aria, and an English song by Gottschalk; also, with chorus, a song from Marschner's "The Templar and the Jewess."

Mr. DAUM's second Soirée will probably occur on Wednesday, May 2d, when besides Hummel's Septet (for piano, flute, oboe, horn, violin, cello and bass), he will give Beethoven's earlier Trio in B flat for piano, clarinet and cello, a Schubert song transcribed by Liszt, and Weber's Rondo called "Perpetuum mobile." Songs by Franz and Schumann will be sung by Miss S. W. BARTON.

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, it will be seen, announce one more Oratorio performance for some time in May, for which they summon together again the great Festival chorus of last May for the performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and 42nd Psalm: "As the hart pants" (the latter for the first time); also Nicolai's Fest-Overture on "Ein feste Burg." The proceeds of the concert will go to a fund for future Festivals; so we are all interested to make it successful.

OUR NEW YORK Correspondence has again failed us; and we have waited for it until it was too late to pick up intelligence from public sources; but a résumé will do hereafter.

NEW HAVEN. The Mendelssohn Society (W. D. Anderson, M.D., conductor,) has done a good work here of late years in the production of oratorios. On the list of its performances stand Haydn's "Seasons" (three times) and "Creation"; the "Messiah" (twice); "St. Paul"; and Rossini's Sabat Mater and "Moses in Egypt." On the 9th of the present month this Society gave a miscellaneous concert, with an orchestra of 23 instruments, mostly from New York, and a chorus of 80 voices. Among the things presented were the Overtures to Fra Diavolo and Freyshütz, the Andante of Beethoven's C-minor Symphony; selections from Elijah, including, "Then shall the righteous shine," sung by Mr. Castle, Bass recitatives and aria, sung by Mr. H. W. Bryan with chorus, and the soprano solo "Hear ye, Israel," followed by the chorus "Be not afraid;" also several solos, choruses, &c., from Verdi, Donizetti, Flotow, Balfe, &c. We hear that all the music went well. Next fall the Society intend to give Elijah complete.

WORCESTER. The Mozart Society performed Elijah, for the first time, on Fast night. Mechanics Hall was almost crowded, and all accounts pronounce it a musical as well as financial success. The great Organ did the part of orchestra. The Spy says:

Particularly well were the solo parts sustained. In the character of Elijah Mr. Hammond was very successful, and showed much skill and taste in the difficult recitations and solos committed to his charge. He evidently had made his part a study, and he deserves great credit for the manner in which he performed it. Mr. Richards was in excellent voice, and sang the tenor air, "If with all your hearts" with good expression. Mrs. Hamilton sang with fine effect "Hear ye Israel," and received the hearty approval of the audience. Mrs. Allen's sympathetic voice was very effective, especially so in the recitation and air "What have I to do with thee O man of God." Perhaps we might say that as an artistic performance this was the best. The music is most beautiful and plaintively, purely Mendelssohnian in character. Miss Stone sang the air, "O rest in the Lord" with much acceptance, and also rendered valuable assistance in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels charge over thee," and in the "Angel Trio," with the assistance of Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Manning. The three voices blended nicely together and it was enjoyed by all present. Messrs. Knight, Thompson, Wilder, Merriam, Mrs. Hastings, Mrs. Knight, and Miss Bessie Stone rendered substantial aid in their respective parts. The choruses went quite as well as could be expected the first time. Some of them went smoothly where the rhythm was not complicated and the intervals not too difficult. In some of the fugue movements there was a lack of power and the time somewhat unsteady, leaving an uncertainty in the minds of those listening as to the particular ideas contained in the music. Such choruses can only be mastered by long continued practice and an individual study of the various chromatic intervals, which require close singing. Among the best of the choruses performed we would mention the ever beautiful one, "He watching over Israel," and "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." Mr. Hamilton conducted the Oratorio with grace and dignity. We were glad to see the silent rebuke he gave a small portion of the audience who had the bad taste to leave the hall before the close of the concert. It was just what was needed, and proved very effective. Mr. Allen's accompaniments were most excellent, and many fine effects were drawn out from the organ. Mr. G. Wm. Sumner played the piano parts with much credit, the full "Chickering Grand" telling with marked effect.

ROCHESTER, N. Y. On Monday, March 25th occurred the third of Mr. TRACY's soirées. Mozart's Trio in B flat was played by Mr. Tracy and the Messrs. Schaich. Mr. T. also played the "Pathétique" Sonata, and Mendelssohn's B-minor Capriccio. Mr. Carl Schaich played a Mayseder Violin Solo and Miss Brewster sang. The filling-in part of the programme being more popular than classical, the majority seemed to vote this "the best of the three."

On Tuesday evening, April 3d, the Rochester Philharmonic appealed successfully to the public on its own behalf, Corinthian Hall being completely filled. Their resources being limited by scarcity of members, they are not yet beyond the lighter overtures. They are all amateurs of social position, and having already secured the popular verdict, do much for the cause, as they have opportunity to augment their means. Their enterprise was manifest in sending to New York city for a vocalist. They secured the services of Mad. Marie Abbott, a name not before familiar here; but which will hereafter be remembered pleasantly. While she did not exhibit any uncommon executive ability, she showed what was much more to be desired, a rare power of characterization. In her ballad singing, she leaves nothing to be guessed at in the words.

Mrs. Cary of Brockport was the pianist. Her one solo was well received and in the accompaniments she evinced sympathy with the singer. She played also with the society from the Pianoforte score. Were I to suggest anything to Mr. Kalbfleisch, it would be to mark out a little from that score so that the melodic figures and their answers in different instruments shall not be marred by the constant presence of the mono-chromatic Piano. Then too those sustained tones in the wind instruments suffer by those carpet tacking, eighth divisions, the usual subterfuge of arrangers to compensate for the lack of sustaining power in the Piano.

Mr. K. wielded effectively the new baton handed him the other evening at rehearsal, because the old one could not keep them to time. It is a nice ivory handled, gold mounted affair, blazoned with numerous musical and masonic devices. T. E. A.

NEW MUSIC HALL. New York has at last the promise of a fine large concert hall. The Tribune describes the plan as follows:

The eminent firm of Messrs. Steinway & Sons, who have long had such a plan in mind, are about to erect a hall in rear of their magnificent Piano-forte warehouses, on Fourteenth St., having reserved ground for it at the time of the erection of that building, which is itself without a rival (?) in the United States. They intend that the new hall shall be as complete and elegant in its way as their ware-rooms are—more than which New York has no need to desire. It will occupy the space back of the present building, between Fourth Avenue and Irving Place, on Fourteenth St., and reaching thence to Fifteenth St. The dimensions of the hall will be 123 feet long, by 75 feet broad, and 42 feet in height—in the latter respect avoiding, we are glad to see, the excessive height, which is one chief fault (?) of the Boston Music Hall. The proposed elevation in this hall is abundant both for architectural and acoustic effects. The main entrance will be on Fourteenth St., with spacious exit, also, on Fifteenth St. There are to be two galleries on the end nearest Fourteenth St., extending on each side not more than one-third of the length of the hall—all the rest to be clear from floor to ceiling. There will be 2550 actual seats all comfortable and all affording a clear view of the stage. Probably the open space of the hall will afford standing room for 500 persons more, who may be enthusiastic enough to like that way of hearing concerts. Very careful attention has been given in the plans to acoustics—one of the points wherein halls meant for concerts most often prove defective. A matter not less important to comfort is ventilation, which also will be thoroughly accomplished. It will be possible, in this Steinway Hall, to sit through a concert without that dreadful sense of sleepiness, or those dreadful headaches afterward, which frequenters of existing music halls have sad experience of. Warming and lighting arrangements have been studied with equal care. Steam is to be used in heating and gas for light, with burners so disposed as not to fatigue the eye while brilliantly lighting every corner of the hall. The decorations of wall and ceiling are to be mainly fresco, costly, elegant and chaste. The walls of the building will be 28 inches thick, set in cement, buttresses with heavy piers, floors laid in cement, and the whole building constructed with conscientious regard to safety, as well as to splendor and comfort. An organ of great power is to occupy the stage end, constructed expressly for the purpose, at a cost, we believe, of $20,000, and as powerful as the size of the room will admit. Adjoining the hall will be another building, on Fifteenth St., devoted partly to piano studios for artists, and partly to the machinery of the organ. The estimated cost of the hall is $90,000, exclusive of the lot and of the organ. The plans are already in the hands of the builders, and workmen are now clearing the ground, removing old buildings, and making excavations. The contracts call for the completion of the work by the first week of next September—in good time for the concert season.

WHAT ORATORIO WAS IT?—Perhaps the Handel and Haydn, or the Harmonic Society would like to try something so exhilarating. A Pittsburg (Pa.) paper says:

The Oratorio on Thursday evening was a grand success. The solos were performed with surpassing sweetness and effect, while the choruses, with the majesty of the ocean wave, would rise in height and grandeur, and seem to bear everything upon their tide of sound—then die away into the softness of the evening zephyr. The alternate inspiring and soothing effect of such music reminds one of the pleasing effects of Laughing Gas, as administered by Dr. Gillespie, at 45 Fourth street.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Think of thee! (Denk ich dein!) R. Franz. Op. 21. No. 2. 30
Has the usual crispness and briefness of Franz's songs, and ends before one is tired of it; but, in most respects, is more like other German songs than others of his composition.
- O wondrous lovely month of May. (Im wunderschönen Monat Mai.) R. Schumann. Op. 40. No. 1. 25
The words are by Heine, and translated by Mr. Dwight. The ideas are very beautiful, and into the short song is woven a great deal of fine music.
- Mill May. Song and Chorus. L. V. H. Crosby. 30
A charming ballad, in which "Mill May" comes in, with a pleasant ring, at the end of many lines.
- I love the little rippling stream. Song & Chorus. L. V. H. Crosby. 30
A pretty little, Swiss-like melody, with easy and taking chorus.
- The Organ Grinder. Comic Song. G. W. Hunt. 40
Better than the average, and difficult to read through without laughing. What must the effect be, then, when it is well sung!
- The Rose or the Lily. (Die Rose, die Lilie). R. Schumann. Op. 48. No. 3. 25
Another little exquisite fragment, by Heine, set to just the music that belongs to it, by Schumann.
- We are merry troubadours. Duet. C. W. Glover. 30
A very elegant and simple piece. Good duets are not yet very plentiful, and this is an acceptable addition to the list.
- Be kind to darling sister Nell. Song and Chorus. H. P. Danks. 30
Uncommonly good of its class, both in words and music.

Instrumental.

- L'Argentine. Fantasie mazurka. Four hands. E. Ketterer. 75
Differs from many four hand pieces, in being mostly of a light, subdued character, but is quite elegant in construction, and to its softness, unites much brilliancy.
- L'Argentine. Fant. maz. Simplified. E. Ketterer. 50
The above for two hands. It is, in its present form, not difficult, and is, altogether, a charming composition.
- Night dream. Valse poétique. R. Greunwald. 50
A fine, original sort of piece. Brilliant, and of medium difficulty.
- Le Bords de L'Yonne. Valse. (Young Minstrel). Gerville. 20
Take them I implore thee. (Young Minstrel). "Norma." 20
Pierrette polka mazurka. (Young Minstrel.) Le Corbeille. 20 Pretty little instructive pieces. Easy.
- Sing, birdie, sing. Transcribed. Grobe. 50
The voice of sympathy. " Grobe. 40
The land of dreams. 6 characteristic pieces. Grobe. 40
The name of the author sufficiently describes and endorses these eight pieces; so we merely say, "Mr. Grobe, gentlemen!" and pass on.
- Fleur des Alpes. Tyrolienne for Piano. J. Egghard. 40
La Belle Styrienne. Morceau Elegante. " 40
Au bord de la mer. Nocturne. W. Kuhs. 40
Sympathie, for piano. Badarzewska. 30
Four pieces, alike in being of medium difficulty, and the "Elegante" of the second describes them all.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

A Chapter of C. M. von Weber's Early Life.*

WEBER AS DUCAL SECRETARY.

Seldom has a prince been judged so differently as King Friedrich of Würtemberg. Seldom, most assuredly, has a monarch been so universally hated by subjects of every kind and degree as he was. It is very difficult to paint a clear unbiassed picture of the man. That he far surpassed his dreaded uncle Carl in natural genius, in talent and acquirements, and in far-sighted discernment, cannot be doubted; but he surpassed him, too, in coarseness, harshness, and ruthless dealing with his subjects. True it is, also, that his political views were far keener than those of his Estates; that the Constitution of the country was antiquated in form, and unsatisfactory in its working. But what did he give in return for this Constitution, such as it was, and for the indifferent laws the Estates enacted, insufficient as they might be? Only the government of his own ruthless will. For the oppression of the patrician and clerical orders, he substituted the far more galling oppression of his coarse soldiery, his unworthy favorites, and his absurdly organized official hierarchy. Surely it was a step from bad to worse! Again were places sold to incapable creatures of his preference, from whom the country shrank as from evil spirits, or bestowed in a manner still more shameful. The judgments of his tribunals became mere forms; punishments were generally increased in rigor by the royal will. Taxes were imposed and enforced at royal pleasure. Police regulations, the severity of which was meant to throw a mask over the utter demoralization of the time, were intrusted to instruments who had obtained their posts by the darkest bye-paths, and executed their duty in the most odious ways. New monopolies were created. The property of the Universities was absorbed by the State, although new professorships were created, and some of the most distinguished professors of the day received their patent of nobility. Military conscription was carried on with a brutality, from which none were exempt as heretofore,—except, indeed, persons immediately attached to the royal service,—a brutality to which the harshest ordinances of Friedrich the Great were child's-play. The reckless hunting-expeditions of Duke Carl were again revived with all their cruel rigors, their terrors, and their devastations. In every commonest affair of daily life—in marriages, in choice of schools, in journeyings to and fro,—the royal will and permission ruled and directed all.

King Friedrich of Würtemberg, never, perhaps, raised his horse to the Consulate; but he systematically lowered even the highest of the land, who were not in his service, to a rank below his lowest menials. No man could venture to pass before the gates of the royal palaces in Stuttgart or Ludwigsburg without humbly taking off his hat, even in the wildest weather. If any dared to sin against this ordinance, which out-gessed Gessler, the sentinels were instructed to strike their hats from their heads.

The royal court, whether at Stuttgart or Ludwigsburg, was brilliant in the extreme. King Friedrich loved pomp, show, and glitter. Court-officers there were in unlimited numbers, and of every description. Of chamberlains alone, 300 swarmed in the apartments of the luxurious monarch. A conspicuous feature was formed by the hosts of handsome young fellows, in semi-official posts, as pages and youngers, with whom the King loved to associate; and who, after brief service, were generally rewarded with lucrative appointments and patents of nobility. The palaces were spangled too, like flower-gardens, with the brilliant uniforms of the young officers of the Garde du Corps, Chevaux Legers, and the other four guard regiments of the King's ridiculously expensive army. They rang, from day to night, with music, with mirth, with the uproar of the unseemly pranks of spoiled pages, in whose loose tone and manners his majesty was wont to take exuberant delight.

Friedrich had an especial predilection for exercising his sovereign rights in the distribution of patents of nobility. These favors, as well as the highest posts were generally bestowed on adventurers from other parts of Germany. It naturally followed that, whilst the King himself was feared and unloved, his ministers and favorites were hated and despised. The most remarkable, but, at the same time, the lowest and most contemptible of these detested favorites, was a General Count von Dillen, who, from a groom in the ducal stables, had risen from rank to rank, overwhelmed with honors, without one single recommendation either in military or administrative service. Dillen was the evil genius of the King. His influence over Friedrich was enormous; and, strong in this high favor, he was accustomed to enrich himself, with open shamelessness, by the lucrative trade of selling government appointments. He even invented a new method of raising money, which was afterwards carried on surreptitiously by many persons about the court of Würtemberg, and which consisted in selling to young men nominal appointments at court, which alone would free them from the military conscription. The fact of this practice was doomed to exercise a fearful influence on the fortunes of Carl Maria.

One word more as to the personality of a man with whom, for his woe, the young composer was destined to come in contact. The King was awfully fat; and his unwieldy corpulence increased so frightfully from year to year, that, even in 1807, a semi-circular space was cut in his dining-tables to permit him to approach near enough to feed himself. His face was pale; his bloated cheeks fell heavily on his fourfold chin. His eyes were small, but bright and lively; his mouth was not without expression; and his smile was even genial and pleasant. He spoke much and rapidly, at times with brilliancy and wit; but quite as frequently in a tone of coarse jocosity, not unminged with filth. His anger was terrible, maniacal in its demonstration. But his affection was even more to be dreaded than his rage.

Next in rank to the King stood his brother, Prince Ludwig Friedrich Alexander, who in 1807 was fifty-one years of age, and who had arrived about that period, after seeing his hopes of becoming King of Poland utterly destroyed, to live at the court of Stuttgart with his wife, a princess of Nassau-Weilburg, and his young family. He led a dissolute and expensive life, was continually appealing to the purse of his royal brother, with whom, on that account, he was in a permanent state of antagonism; and yet was always in the most painful pecuniary embarrassments, to escape from which he frequently resorted to the most desperate measures. It was for this reason, perhaps, he demeaned himself to affect the most intimate friendship with the unworthy favorite Dillen. Less coarsely passionate and demonstrative than his brother, he was at the same time less open and sincere in love or hate; and he was constantly engaged in misty intrigues, either to attain his ends or to conceal his delinquencies from a brother whose anger he feared. Unlike his amiable and excellent brother Eugen, he had no love for music, and only visited the opera for the sake of the pretty women he might see. This was the prince into whose service Carl Maria von Weber entered, on the 1st August 1807.

Thus, then, was the fiery young artist, his wild oats not yet fully sown, plunged into a new world, where no true sense of right or wrong was known; where virtue and morality were laughed to scorn; where, in the chaotic whirlpool of a reckless court, money and influence at any price were the sole ends and aims of life; where, in the confusion of the times, the insecurity of all conditions, and the ruthless despotism of the government, the sole watch-word of existence, from high to low, was "Après nous le déluge!"

It has been necessary to present this somewhat lengthy description of the condition of the court of Stuttgart at the beginning of the nineteenth century, as a prologue to the drama of Carl Maria's life in the capital of Würtemberg. Through a picture of such a state of society alone can it be shown how the events, which flung a blighting shadow upon the otherwise so brilliant surface of his noble character throughout existence, sprang up as the natural rank produce of the impure soil which he was now destined to tread, unwary and unheeding corruption.

It was on the 19th August 1807, that Carl Maria first paid his respects to his new patron at Ludwigsburg. Probably from the very first there was a feeling the reverse of sympathy between the two. But the young man had been recommended to the Duke as active and intelligent; and the Prince had just then no choice. To the ardent young artist his new duties were utterly uncongenial: no one study of his past life had fitted him for such a service as that of private secretary to a royal duke, and comptroller of a ducal household. Yet such were his new titles, such his new avocations. The Duke kept a tolerably imposing court of his own. The family consisted of the Princess his wife; his son by his first marriage with a Princess Czartoriska; the Prince Adam, a tall, noisy, arrogant stripling of fifteen; and five young children by his second marriage. The household was made up, besides the higher officers and ladies, of a host of paid and unpaid servants and strange on-hangers, some of whom were destined to play a part in the young musician's own drama. As secretary, Carl Maria had not only to undertake the private correspondence of the Prince, but sundry far from agreeable personal communications with people of rank, and the numerous herd of creditors. As comptroller, he had to regulate the expenses of the household, manage the Duke's privy purse, and keep the books of receipts and expenses. A strange mass are the books, still extant. They say but little for Carl Maria's talent as a book-keeper; but they speak volumes as regards the Duke's private life. The chief expenses lie in sums paid for horses, dogs, hunting-parties, journeys, play-debts, wine, endless pensions and allowances of very doubtful origin. Enormous sums are noted only in undecipherable hieroglyphics. Each month's account ends with a fresh deficit, for which a new loan is rendered imperative; and for each recurring negotiation poor Carl Maria has to be employed, often under the most distressing conditions.

The business the most disagreeable and certainly the most dangerous for a young man, was his daily communication with petitioners for favors, or clients on private matters of a questionable kind. Temptation lay ever in his path in the circle of which he now formed the centre,—a flattering, fawning set, that never looked too closely at the means of catering for his favor; a crowd, in which not only high-placed civil and military servants, but even members of the royal house, thronged eagerly around him. Well may Carl Maria, as he cast despairing looks into the chaotic confusion of all the affairs, private and financial, of his patron, have felt in his heart of hearts that he, the inexperienced, ardent youth of one-and-twenty years, who had lived till then in the atmosphere of art alone, was no Atlas to take such a world of ruin and corruption on his shoulders.

But the intercourse with purveyors, creditors, petitioners, money-lenders, and Jews, was not the most painful to which the youth had to submit. The King, as has been remarked, was in a chronic state of irritation against Duke Ludwig, on account of his dissolute life and reckless expenditure. He could shut his eyes to his own excesses; but those of his brother were unpardonable. Besides, after every controversy, it was he who had to pay all debts, in order to save the honor of the family. When these collisions took place, it was the young secretary who had, only too often, to beard the lion in his den. Some of the darkest hours of his life were those passed in the cabinet of the dreaded monarch. When private secretary Von Weber was commissioned to lay before the King some very desperate condition of affairs, in which his helping hand was needed to fill an empty treasury, or avert the consequences of a compromising scrape, it was the custom of majesty to burst into an immoderate fit of passion, and vent the foulest abuse on the unlucky head of the innocent messenger. On such occasions Friedrich let forth a torrent of words, and allowed nobody to speak but himself: reasoning or representation were wholly out of the question. The stammering, stuttering, shrieking rage of the hideously corpulent King, who, on account of his unyielding obesity, was unable to let his arms hang by his side, and who thus gesticulated wildly, perspired incessantly, and had the habit moreover, of continually addressing his favorite, generally present on these occasions, with the appeal, "Pas vrai, Dillen!" between each broken sentence,—would have been inexpressibly droll, had not the low-comedy actor of the scene been an autocrat who might, at a wink, have transformed laughter into tears. But there was a demoniacal comicality about the performance, which, if it did not convulse the spectator, made him shudder to his heart's core.

Weber hated the King, of whose wild caprice and vices he witnessed daily scenes, before whose palace-gates he was obliged to slink bareheaded, and who treated him with unmerited ignominy. Sceptre and crown had never been imposing objects in his eyes, unless worn by a worthy man; and, consequently, he was wont, in thoughtless levity of youth, to forget the dangers he ran, and to answer the King with a freedom of tone which the autocrat was all unused to hear. In turn he was detested by the monarch. As negotiator for the spendthrift Prince Ludwig, he was already obnoxious enough; and it sometimes happened that, by way of variety to the customary torrent of invective, the King, after keeping the secretary for hours in his ante-chamber, would receive him only to turn him rudely out of the room, without hearing a word of what he had to say.

The royal treatment roused young Carl Maria's indignation to the utmost; and his irritation led him one day to a mad prank, which was nigh resulting in some years' imprisonment in the fortress of Hohenasberg, or of Hohenhaufen. Smarting under some foul indignity, he had just left the private apartment of the King, when an old woman met him in the passage, and asked where she could find the room of the court washerwoman. "There!" said the reckless youth, pointing to the door of the royal cabinet. The old woman entered, was violently assailed by the King, who had a horror of old women, and, in her terror, stammered out that a young gentleman who had just come out had informed her that there she would find the "royal washerwoman." The infuriated monarch guessed who was the culprit, and dispatched an officer on the spot to arrest his brother's secretary, and throw him into prison.

To those who have anyidea how foul a den was then a royal prison, it must appear almost marvellous that Carl Maria should have possessed sufficient equanimity to have occupied himself with his beloved art during his arrest. But so it was. He managed to procure a dilapidated old piano, put it in tune with consummate patience, by means of a common door-key, and actually, then and there, on the 14th October 1808, composed his well-known beautiful song, "Ein steter Kampf ist unser Leben."

The storm passed over. Prince Ludwig's influence obtained the young man's pardon and release. But the insult was never forgotten by the King: he took care to remember it at his own right time. Nor had prison cured Carl Maria of his boyish desire to play tricks upon the hated monarch, when he conceived that he could do so without danger to himself. He contrived to insert adroitly into the letters which his duty called upon him to write from Duke Ludwig to his royal brother, and which the former was too careless to read, every expression which he knew would be likely to put the irritable monarch into a fearful passion. For a time he succeeded admirably in his design. But Friedrich was too sharp a man not to divine the real author of these abominable letters; and many were the back-handed blows which the revengeful man was able to strike, in quiet malice, at the imprudent young secretary.

But Carl Maria's life in Stuttgart was not wholly so unpleasant and so uncongenial as it might seem. After many vain, but honest endeavors to cleanse the Augean stable of finance in the ducal affairs,—endeavors which were only rewarded by the unfriendly rebuke, on the part of his patron, that "he had better not meddle with matters that did not concern him,"—he stuck to the strict letter of his service alone, and now gained time and opportunity for not only coquetting once more with his favorite Muse, but for winning himself new friends by the seductive charm of his manners, as well as by his talent. He found means to cultivate the acquaintance of many of the distinguished personages and agreeable families in Stuttgart, to reckon many of the officers and artists among his staunch allies, and also to enjoy life after his fashion, in jovial gatherings of good fellows, with his glass of wine and his guitar. The faculty for finding himself in his right place in every kind of society, and gathering from all around new food to add to his store of instruction, talent, or humor, was one of the most attractive qualities of Carl Maria's nature.

All outward progress of intelligence at this period of the history of Stuttgart, if not wholly suppressed, was at all events nullified by the tyrannical oppression of the government, and the unhappy condition of the country. But in the family circles into which Carl Maria was introduced by Prince Ludwig's physician-in-ordinary, Doctor Kellin, the cultivation of the mind and the interests of art were far from being wholly neglected. From his intercourse with literary and artistic celebrities he now began to derive fresh advantages. Among the former, he could enjoy the conversation of the brilliant Haug, the editor of the still-flourishing paper, Das Morgenblatt, and of the clever, clear-thinking Reinbeck; from both of whom he was so unfortunate as to obtain the words of some of his brightest and sweetest compositions. Among the latter,—and they were many in every branch of art,—he had the privilege of sitting in the studio of the famous sculptor Dannecker, at that time already nearly fifty years of age, and of watching the progress of his celebrated Ariadne. About the same time also he made the passing acquaintance of Louis Spohr, even then one of Germany's greatest violin-players and composers; who, as has been already stated, judged the fragments of the boy's "Rubenzahl" with little favor, but yet gave fresh animation to his aspirations and his hopes.

It was the first time that Carl Maria had been permitted to enjoy an uninterrupted intercourse with men of such importance and distinction in the fine arts and literature. He gazed up with as much surprise as admiration at this higher sphere of intellectual cultivation, in general so superior to that of the musical and theatrical worthies with whom his lot had as yet been cast. His ambition was awakened, and his aspirations to achieve the good and great gradually gushed forth in this world so new to him; although the channel in which they were to flow, in order to reach the desired end, was as yet but half revealed to him. He now began to turn a great portion of his leisure hours to account in the cultivation of his mind; and with this intent, to improve his acquaintance with Court-Counsellor Lehr, the director of the royal library; a modest, thoughtful, but amiable and genial man, from whose poetical effusions the young composer afterwards selected the words of two of his choicest songs. From Lehr he derived the most valuable hints for the improvement of his style, his habits of thought, and the direction of his critical and philosophical studies. Under the good librarian's guidance, he read Kant, Wolff, and Schelling, with care; and thus gained that precious faculty, so often half-envied, half-repudiated by his colleagues, of reasoning with logical clearness, and of giving correct expression to his thoughts. In this much Carl Maria's sojourn in Stuttgart was of the highest importance in the development of his better qualities, however much in other respects it may have exercised an influence altogether deleterious.

The Art of Musical Criticism Made Easy.

BY E. E. N., PROFESSOR OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL MANNERS.

It has frequently struck me that several things were singular. One of these is, that so few persons are musical critics.

In Painting, every one can form and give an opinion: in Politics, we are each and all, infallible; but in Music we are timid. We are afraid of others who may know better; and yet the art is very simple.

We can, in these days, easily find a royal road to learning, and even go in a carriage, if we can afford it. We can learn to paint and yet not be able to draw a straight line; we can play and never look at a scale or an exercise; and we can become musical critics and not know one note from another—or, in fact, not know anything about the subject.

Instead of studying the science, the art, or the practice, study me!

I have frequently been shocked by hearing persons of considerable culture simply express their admiration, and confess their ignorance, while they are consumed with envy of others who can fluently discuss the performance.

This need not be.

I repeat that an attentive study of my rules, and perhaps a little personal instruction, will enable any one to shine in society as a musical character, or get a position as musical critic on a newspaper.

In the first place, like—or unlike—an ancient Greek, I exclaim: "Manner, MANNER, MANNER!"

In a concert-room it is very easy to pick out the musical people, for there is no class that has a more decided style. There is an air of ease, of lack of responsibility, of owing no debts, and having no money, of being poor and not caring. They are not as a class handsome. On the contrary they are—I was going to say ugly, but that would not be polite to the ladies, so I will not.

But it is not necessary to wear old clothes, or to cultivate anything unbecoming to look musical, for on the contrary, I have noticed that musicians wear very nice clothes—though they always look like their best ones.

But to begin.

When you are going to a concert, go early and get a good seat. If you are badly placed your trouble will be thrown away. One against the wall is to be recommended, or an empty bench. "Like a star, when only one," etc. The most conspicuous seat in fact. And make it your own, so that people will look there naturally for you.

Wear glasses. They give an air of wisdom to the most inept face. As to your attitudes—simply be easy. You might study the St. Cecilia expression before a glass, and learn to throw up your eyes artistically. Look abstracted, earnest, gently nod your head at suitable intervals. Never keep time, it is vulgar. Never look around during the performance, but when all is silent and the talking buzz begins, suddenly awaken to the people around. Look around. Sigh, and then become a man of the world.

When the name of the author is obscure, relax your attention somewhat; an air of knowing too much to care for that looks well. It is a good plan to frequently carry music with you, unless you object to be taken for a music teacher, for people will often so judge you.

Two of my pupils, however, made quite a reputation by carrying a volume of Schubert's songs (Holle's edition, for it is not bound, and you can double it with the title outside) with them. They bought it for the purpose and found themselves repaid well by the remarks they frequently heard.

But one time, I was no little mortified in the Opera House, by glancing up from the parquette, and seeing them on the front row of the dress circle, busily engaged with a most extensive assortment of "Gems from Faust!" Sheet music at the opera! Horrible!

To carry a piece to a concert is very different; but never choose anything on the programme.

If you meet a friend who might look upon it as an affectation, carelessly remark: "It is a little thing for Mary!"

To an oratorio, always carry the music; to an opera, never; to a concert, rarely.

But it is of the greatest importance to have a programme; for the art of musical criticism is not founded on the music, but the composer's name: this is important to remember.

And now we will come to the names and I will briefly give you a few hints in relation to the style in which they should be used.

You wish to be discriminating as well as critical; well, you can be.

Use certain phrases, have a certain style for certain people.

Thus, of Mozart, you must speak warmly and with enthusiasm. Praise him, of course. Yet you can use a judicious "but"—occasionally. Speak of the melody, the graceful flow of his music. Allude to him personally, sigh when you speak of his early death, and as you wonder if he could have surpassed some of the works he has left. Praise his chamber music warmly, say you can never tire of it. You may never have a chance, but that does not matter. Allude freely to his earlier operas, they are so little known that it is safe. After the music is over, smilingly turn and say: "That was very Mozartish!" It is to be presumed that his music is, but it will sound as if you studied style.

Of Haydn, your tone must be calmer; you need not speak of him as if he was your dearest friend. Praise him, but not "ff"; for "mf" will do. You can say that certain passages remind you of Mozart, but you need not say which.

As for Beethoven, speak of him as if you were in church. It is unnecessary to prefer him to any other composer—some people do—but you need not; but never speak lightly of him, and never criticize him. Speak of his "wonderful harmonies," the "passion and vigor," "the amazing power" of his "grand old head," his "tempestuous soul," etc. "Grand old master—distant footsteps—corridors, etc., etc." The Beethoven style is elevated. Get up a glow of expression if you can stand it.

Of Mendelssohn you may speak as though you had played marbles, and gone to school with him. Lovingly familiar is the style. Call him pet names; say his music is "beautiful, lovely, harmonious"; say it is "the music of a cultivated gentleman, the utterance of a pure and noble soul." You may get an idea of the style in which you ought to speak of him by listening to "The Midsummer-night" music. Let your terms be as graceful and easy as possible. But be careful. Do not use the Mozart manner. Of Mozart speak con molto passione; of Mendelssohn, con molto sentimento.

As for Handel, get a dictionary of synonyms, take "noble" for your basis, and form your style from that.

Of Bach, "the old Bach," as Frederick the Second remarked, you will probably have to speak but seldom. Do not profess familiarity with his works. You have so few opportunities of hearing his music—shameful want of culture, etc. When you do hear it, be very intent. Lose your whole soul, see and hear nothing else. Never say "Bach," without putting "Fugue" into the same sentence. The terms "Dux," "Comes," "Repercussio" would figure very well.

And now to come to Schumann and Chopin. The style is "Looking into the infinite."

"Tortured by a nameless yearning,
Like a frost-fire, freezing, burning."

If you feel able to support this style, and have any tendencies to a green and yellow melancholy, be a lover of music. Let your hair grow, cultivate smiling with your lips only, keeping your eyes sad and serious. Speak under your breath of Chopin as if he were your dead love, your lost Lenore. The "melancholy, the morbidness," the "hungry cry," the "fantastic changes of feeling," the "wied character" of his music. For Chopin, condole. Never think of mentioning Schumann without adding something about his "strange unusual chords." The chord of the flat seventh does not more strongly call for the tonic than his name for this phrase. Listen to his music with the air of an undertaker. It always arouses "passionate regrets," and I would advise you to have some. Sometimes you might "doubt if it is entirely healthy music," but not in the tone as if it were dyspeptic.

Schubert, admire. One of my pupils, after dilating on his variety of expression, passion, etc., calls him the Shakespeare of music, and I have noticed that it takes well.

Thus far I have dwelt on "classical" music, for having mastered this the rest comes easy. As for opera music, study the newspaper a few seasons and you cannot fail to get the proper terms by heart. You will find that Meyerbeer is "gorgeous," "grand," "brilliant"; Weber "charming"; Donizetti, "fine"; Flotow "light"; Verdi, "effective": (you can abuse the latter if you choose; you must if you are "classical,") Gounod, "passionate," and you must be dull if you are not soon posted in opera criticisms.

If you adhere to the German school, call the Italian "degenerate, false to true art, substituting effects of scenery, etc., for pure musical ones," "sensational." Sneer, and say that Mrs. Henry Wood and Miss Braddon received their culture in the same school. Ask what Beethoven would have thought of Verdi! Still do not regret to go, and to admire even while you deplore the Parisian influences.

If you choose to join the Italian school, you must call the Germans cold and hard, devoid of pure melody and so on. The singers poor, the music unmusical. "It may suit those who like to listen with their brain." The "rich, full color of the Italians," etc.

If a Germanite, be earnest. If an Italianian, be enthusiastic. Use musical terms, have a few musical stories and facts. Assume an air of wisdom, don't delude yourself into the idea of music being a noble and sacred art, and one not to be defiled by charlatanism, nor flippantly discussed, nor ignorantly criticized, for on the contrary it is a broad and open field for jugglers or churches. He who can enter may use it: he who is blind describe it. It is free to abuse or use. There is a jargon, use it. Give lip service, and keep your soul for fine clothes and good dinners.

The Plymouth Church Organ.

I.

Somerset Club, April 5.

MR. EDITOR,—I have this day been very greatly gratified by viewing and hearing, at Messrs. Hook's Factory in this city, an organ just completed by that firm for Plymouth church, Brooklyn, (Rev. H. W. Beecher.

I have only lately arrived in this country from England, and being somewhat organ mad, have been anxious to test the quality of the instruments of this country; having, I admit, hitherto had a rather strong prejudice to the effect that, if an organ of really first class character be wanted, England is the place to go for it. I soon found that Boston is a great place for organs; and of course it was not long before I went to hear the one in the Music Hall. It is not, however, my desire to occupy your space with any opinion on that instrument. Having been so fortunate as to make the acquaintance of Mr. Willcox, whose name is well known in Boston, and doubtless not in Boston only, he kindly invited me to inspect their Factory, and afterwards took me to hear the organ built by them for the Church of the Immaculate Conception. I candidly confess that I was much struck with this instrument. The quality of voicing, throughout, could not be surpassed. The Vox Humana and the Pedal Violoncello are beyond praise; and I assure you, sir, I left the church with a firm conviction of the truth of the proverb that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing."

At the Factory was then building the organ which I have this day seen and heard completed: and I shall be glad if you will permit me to give you a description of it; which, coming from a foreigner and an amateur, will be at once seen to be disinterested, and will, I think, be read with interest not only by organists and others interested in the advance of the art (a very great art it is, few can fully appreciate it) of Organ building, but by the public in general; as it will give them an additional evidence of the enterprise and great skill of their townsmen; and will show that, when an opportunity is given, this country, nay this good city of Boston itself, can produce an Organ which will in all respects be fully up to the highest modern standard.

The Organ has four manuals, each of fullest compass, viz.: C to A<sup>3</sup>, 58 notes; and Pedals C to F, 30 notes. The key boards are made to overhang one another; which arrangement, besides affording a much more elegant appearance than the old-fashioned stair-case-like pattern, enables the player to manipulate with much greater ease and comfort. Moreover, both Manuals and Pedals are so well placed, relatively to each other, that the player can with all ease execute a rapid passage with his feet, whilst both his hands are on the highest (solo) Manual. The contents are as follows:

	Stops.	Pipes.
Great.....	15.....	1221
Swell.....	15.....	1102
Choir.....	9.....	522
Solo.....	6.....	348
Pedal.....	7.....	210
Mechanical.....	13.....	—

Total, 65 3403

8 Combination Pedals and the Grand Crescendo Movement.

The Pneumatic Lever (a beautiful invention for lightening the touch and otherwise improving the working of the various "Action") has been most extensively used; more so, I am informed, than in any other organ in this country, or any other with one or two exceptions. It is applied not only to the Manuals, and all their Couplers, but to the entire Register Action throughout the instrument, as well as to the Combination Pedals, and Grand Crescendo; so that the moving of any number of Registers is effected with as much ease as a single one. The advantages of the application of the mechanical power are very great. It not only reduces the physical labor attending organ playing, but it enables much of the "Action" to be made of a greatly lighter nature, saving much room inside, whereby parts of the organ are rendered easy of access which otherwise would be almost, if not entirely debarred, by a quantity of heavy Rollers, &c. Not only ease but promptness of movement is attained by this most clever invention, and it also admits of the introduction of Combination Pedals of easy movement, to an unlimited extent; and so constructed as to make these combinations without moving the Register handles (or Stops), or interfering with any previous combination of them; an advantage of the utmost consequence to the organist. The Grand Crescendo, to which I have referred, may be pronounced to be, without exception, the greatest mechanical improvement ever introduced into the organ. The mechanism is too complicated to be intelligible, unless described minutely; I will only, therefore, explain that there is a flat bar of iron placed horizontally behind the Pedals, having a set of studs at short distances, by which the foot easily slides the bar to the right or left. The motion is communicated to the slides one after another, in every department of the organ; so that the player can with the utmost ease, swell out the tone from the softest Stop to the full power of the whole Instrument, and vice versa; while yet not one of the Draw-stop handles is shifted. No other contrivance than this can produce the same effect. The best of ordinary Combination or Composition Pedals will only effect the Crescendo and Diminuendo by throwing out or in detachments of the Stops, a certain number at a time.

In short, I think, Messrs. Hook have in this organ embodied all the very best effects of "Action" that can be derived from English and German organs.

Wind is furnished by four horizontal bellows of the best construction, and of different pressures. There are also two large Compensation Reservoirs, on the plan of Cavallé of Paris. The Bellows are worked by a patent Hydraulic engine, set in motion by drawing a Stop.

The metals used for the Pipe-work are of the best. The Double Diapason of the Great Organ, forming the front, is of pure tin, as well as several others. 50 per cent. of tin is extensively used, and nothing less than 1-3 tin in any part of the Organ.

The Scales of all the pipes have evidently been determined by most sound judgment; hence is produced a brilliant, ringing, and at the same time very firm tone throughout. Nothing could be more beautiful than the quality of the soft Stops, or surpass the full organ in grandeur. The Diapasons, particularly, have a very fine drum-like roll. Several of the Stops, I was informed, are introduced for the first time in this country, viz: The Euphone, 16 feet; Vox Angelica, 8 ft.; Tuba mirabilis, 8 ft., and Tuba Clarion, 4 ft. The first two are free reeds. The Euphone is an admirable imitation of the Clarinet in the middle and upper Register, and of the Bassoon or Serpent in the lower. The Vox Angelica resembles the Cor Anglais.

I must make special notice of the "Tuba mirabilis," which Stop is introduced for the first time in this country. This is the most powerful Reed that is made; being of very large scale, and blown by a heavy pressure of wind. The pipes, which are of pure tin, are on two separate sound boards, one on each side of the organ, and project over the top in a fan-like shape, which has a very elegant appearance, and causes their sound to be thrown out directly into the Church. The tone of the Tuba is like that of the trumpet, but without the twang which is characteristic of the latter. The pipes are voiced somewhat differently from our English Tubas, which too much resemble a roaring mad bull. The Tuba Clarion is its octave. When these two Stops are added to the rest of the organ, it is almost as though a second organ were suddenly put in play, so grand is the effect produced.

The whole instrument may be pronounced to be a very great success, and will doubtless add in no small degree to the high character which this firm has attained. In a second article I hope to give a more detailed description of the various stops, in short the musical contents of the organ. H. D. N.

The Organ in Handel's Oratorios.

To the Editor of The (London) Orchestra.

SIR,—Respecting Handel's method of using the organ in the execution of his Oratorios, Sir George Smart, a boy singer, I believe, in the Great Handel Festival held only 25 years after the composer's death, can tell you and the public what was that way. Sir George has heard it often and often in young days, practised it often and often in his prime, and no question has it perfect in his memory. Handel's organs were small, portable instruments, having a good mounted cornet which sung out in the choruses, and a light metal stopped diapason and metal stopped flute with a sharp reedy-toned dulciana or small open diapason which carried his solo passages in the Concerto. One instrument was probably his solo Concerto organ, the other his choral organ. He supported the choir by playing all their parts when necessary, but he also played with the orchestra, and took under his hand much more of the instrumental score than is now the fashion. His organ would permit this. The huge tarrets of Exeter Hall and Birmingham are against such a use.

He possessed a clean, neat, staccato touch, which led well without smothering or impairing the general tone of the choir and orchestra.

Such directions as "no organ, soft organ, full organ, bass alone," and "bass in octaves," are in effect so many modes of expressing pp, p, mf, f, and ff, but do not immediately refer to the main thing—namely how much did Handel use of the instrumental score on his organ when accompanying his band and chorus in the performance of his oratorios? Handel played much of the score instrumental, and this was the practice with his successors.

The introduction of the heavy pedal, the double diapasons, and a multifarious reduplication of mixtures and furniture and assagialtras, and the prodigious increase of orchestral performers have rendered this practice unnecessary if not impracticable. After his death and when his oratorio of the "Messiah" became popular throughout the nation—oboes and bassoons supplied the organ in places where there was none. Six oboes and thirteen bassoons were not an unusual complement to an ordinary stringed band, and the congregation of oboes in Bach's "Passions" would not have surprised nor baffled a country choir and band in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The concerts of Ancient Music were the traditions of Handel; and Joah Bates, and Mr. Greatorex, the jealous preservers of those traditions. Sir George Smart has been equally versed in them, equally conscientious, and equally zealous in transmitting them in his day and generation.

I am, Sir, Yours obediently,
AN OLD SUBSCRIBER TO THE ANCIENT CONCERTS.

Music Abroad.

LONDON. The Athenæum, of April 7, spends not many, nor too few, words on the toujour Verdi openings of the two opera houses:

The first opera of Mr. Gye's season was "Un Ballo in Maschera," with Mlle. Fricki announced as prima donna, and Signori Mario and Graziani in the principal male characters. On Thursday the worn-out "Trovatore" was given, to introduce Mlle. Morosi as Azucena. This cannot be called a brilliant start.—To-night, Mlle. Orgeni and Signor Fancello will appear in "La Traviata."—Mr. Mapleson's season opens to night with "Il Trovatore," with a new Manrico, Signor Arvini, Mme. de Meric Lablache as Azucena, and Mlle. Sinico as Leonora.

The same journal says:

The Crystal Palace Concert this day week gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. The finale, however, was started a little too fast, by which some of its grandeur was sacrificed. We were also favored with the strained and stilted Overture to "Tannhäuser." No persuasion of those who hold, with Mr. Macfarren, that Music is forever making progress, will induce us to regard this as anything more than the pretentious mistake of a pigmy resolved to make the world believe him a giant. How strange are the inconsistencies of admiration and rivalry! When turning over the leaves of "Spohr's Autobiography" the other day, we could not but be amused and amazed, on comparing the writer's disparaging notice of "Der Freischütz" with his toleration and admiration of "The Flying Dutchman." To be sure, this is qualified by a remark identical with one made to us by Mendelssohn, that it is "astonishing how one can become habituated to bad music." It is a laughable truth, that persons who cannot "eat the leek" must endure being sneered at as obtuse under the pretence of consistency. Yet, if there was ever a time when the ear should be kept firmly fixed on the great principles of beauty in Art, it is the time present, when musical creative power is so feeble, when the appetite for novelty is so keen, both conditions tending to make the listener indulgent to eccentricity and audacity. The adagio and rondo of Chopin's Concerto in E minor were brilliantly and gracefully played by Mr. Dannreuther, who is steadily justifying every opinion of his talent here expressed. He has gained freedom and delicacy by his frequent intercourse with the public during his American tour, and now stands in the very foremost rank of pianists of the second class. A short step will bring him into the first division, and his success ought to—and we believe will—hearken him to take it. Only let him avoid such pieces of claptrap as Herr Gottschalk's "Bananiér," otherwise negro song. This may be fit for audiences of negroes or "mean whites," but not for cultivated listeners; and was as absurd, when exhibited, as this day week, in company with Schubert's lovely Impromptu in A flat, as Sambo in fantastic livery would seem if parading the streets with some thoughtful and delicate German or English beauty hanging on his arm. To return for a moment to Chopin. The adagio of his Concerto, though too diffuse and reiterative, and scored by the hand of one inexperienced in the varieties and privileges of an orchestra, contains still many touches of such original melody and pensive grace as Chopin possessed the secret of. The rondo is better; lively, freakish, and wound up with an animation charming to the hearer, howbeit taxing to the player. The singers at this concert were Mr. Santley,—who, though now the best baritone in the market, is not yet at his best, life and health permitting, we venture to assert,—Madame Parepa and Herr Reichardt. The last sang steadily flat, and in no voice is false intonation less endurable than in a tenor's. To-day Herr Pauer will play at Sydenham, and, seconding the championship of Herr Manns, will play Schumann's one Concerto.

PARIS.—On the 15th of April the Grand Opera ceased to be attached to the Emperor's Household and was handed over to a manager to carry on the speculation at his own will. More than forty applications had been made for the place of impresario, the most likely candidates being MM. Perrin, Carvalho and Veron.

No change at the Opera Comique. M. Flotow's new opera is getting on rapidly, and Gounod's charming work, "La Colombe," will be given in about a fortnight. At the Lyrique "Don Juan" and "Les Joyeuses Commères" are nearly ready. La Fiancée d'Abydos has been replaced on the bills, and met with fair success, Mlle. Daram, a young and very promising artiste, taking the part originally sustained by Mme. Carvalho.

M. Clapisson, one of our good composers, Membre de l'Institut, Professor of Harmony at the Conservatoire, and Curator of the Collection of Ancient Musical Instruments, died quite suddenly last week at the early age of fifty-eight. The deceased gentleman was born at Naples in 1808. He was a pupil of Habeneck for the violin, and studied composition under Reicha. After writing many successful ballads he gave "La Figurante," his first essay in dramatic music, at the Opera Comique, in 1838. This was successful; and was followed by "La Symphonie" (1839), "La Perruche" (great success, 1840), at the same theatre. His four or five next operas call for no particular mention; but three acts at the Opera Comique, "Gibby la Cornemuse" (1846), rank among the best of his productions. "Jeanne la Folle," opera (1848), suffered from the unquiet spirit of the time; and the "Mystères d'Udolphe" (1852), also proved unsuccessful. "La Promise," at the Lyrique (1854), with Mme. Cabell, and "La Fanchonnette," with Mme. Carvalho, at the same theatre, in 1856, were very successful; but not so "Margot" (1857). In 1858 M. Clapisson returned to the Opera Comique, and wrote "Les Trois Nicolas" for the debut of Montaubry. His last work produced was "Madame Grégoire," at the Lyrique, in 1861; but I hear of an unpublished opera, entirely finished, entitled, "Le Baron Trenck," libretto by M. Henri Tréanton. M. Clapisson was Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur since 1847, and was named Membre de l'Institut in 1854, vice Halévy appointed to the post of Secrétaire perpétuel. He was an enraged amateur of old musical instruments, and possessed the finest private collection existing. The want of such a museum at the Conservatoire had long been felt, and about three years ago negotiations were entered into with M. Clapisson, and the result was, that for 30,000 francs, the post of curator at a salary of 3,400*fr.* a year, and an apartment, the whole of this fine collection became the property of the State, and was placed in a room built specially for the purpose. Poor Clapisson did not long enjoy his new position; but I believe a portion of his salary will be continued as a pension to his widow. Of course people are already curious as to his probable successor at the Institut. The Section de Musique will, it is said, present Gounod and David ex æquo, and in the second line Bazin and Massé.—Orchestra, March 31.

A few more Parisian items, from the Athenæum, 7th inst.

The Passion Week and Easter music performed in Paris this year has been sufficiently varied; including at the Italian Opera House the "Stabat" of Signor Rossini; at the Conservatoire Concerts the "Pie Jesu" and "Agnus" from Cherubini's "Requiem," a "Benedictus" by Haydn, the Overture to Meyerbeer's "Le Pardon," a Psalm by Marcello, and "The Flight into Egypt," by M. Berlioz. M. Pasdeloup treated the Good Friday public of his Popular Concerts to the "Credo" of the Abbé Liszt's Mass, to an "Agnus Dei" of Mozart's, to Signor Rossini's "La Carità," and to an air from "Judas Maccabæus."

"Don Juan" has been revived at the Grand Opera. A new opera, by M. Massé has been accepted at the Opera Comique.—Regarding these and other Parisian matters, we have the following from a trustworthy Correspondent:—"I think," he writes, "that you may not know the real cause of the recent decree regarding the Opera. It has been ostensibly attributed to the turbulence of the orchestral players, who had made extravagant demands; but the real cause was this: in spite of the subvention, a deficit in the treasury of the Opera, to the amount of 450,000 francs—18,000,—and this during the year when the success of "L'Africaine" has been so much vaunted." (It may be recollected that we have doubted the reality of this success abroad or at home.) "The manager, M. Perrin, has, to boot, displeased every one by his disregard of the public. * * * The "Credo" of the Abbé Liszt's Mass was repeated at one of M. Pasdeloup's concerts in the midst of laughter, 'bravos' and hissing, not amounting, however, to a great tumult—simul predominating. Only imagine strokes of the gong announcing the name of Christ, in the midst of frightful discords—of a deafening fff—to which follows nothing! Two or three times this effect of hideous noise, resolving itself in a like fashion, is repeated, to the great diversion of the gamins among the audience. * * * I do not pretend to offer a final opinion of a work on a first hearing; but this one seems to me bad Wagner music. You will have seen, by the way, that the wisecracks of the Conservatoire, who last year refused admission to Schumann's Concerto, have opened their Conservatoire barriers to the 'Tannhäuser' March. This diffusion of new (!) ideas may be traced to M. Pasdeloup, who has produced with success fragments from 'Lohengrin' and 'Tannhäuser'; with a more equivocal result, music by Schumann and Gade. Signor Rossini still continues his receptions, and still composes as no one else can. The other evening we had a MS. scene in French, 'Le Lazzarone,'—a semi buffo picture of Naples,—sung by Signor Delle Sedie; then a delicious melody, 'Il Fanciullo' (also in MS.), deliciously given by Signor Gardoni. The subject is an old custom in Rome—that when a child is lost, those who wish to find it go about the town with a bell. This, and the joy of the mother when the strayed one is discovered, are treated in an exquisite fashion, worthy of the master's last days. Then, there was Signor Tamburini, singing astonishingly well; further, a prodigy, seven years old, who does wonderful things with little drum-sticks on a machine of wooden keys, called the 'xylophone,' almost five octaves in compass. His rapidity was amazing; the sound of his instrument is unequal. When I heard him I could not but recall a former evening in this peculiar house, when a 'mattaphone' was exhibited, an instrument composed of finger-glasses filled with water—of course graduated—and of Signor Rossini's saying, "To-night we are going to wash our mouths with the Prayer from 'Moses';" a week ago we were treated to the Overture to 'Guillaume Tell' on the tambores." The incomparable Italian patriarch is inexhaustible in fun and in fancy.—As codicil to these welcome notes from Paris, let us add, from another source, that the new compositions of M. Georges Pfeiffer, mentioned a week ago, "turn out well."

Paris has rarely been fuller of musicians than at the time present. Among non-residents are the Abbé Liszt, Herren Jaell, de Meyer and Hiller, MM. Sivori and Vieuxtemps.—The Observer announces that an opera, by M. Semet, founded on Madame Dudevant's "La Petite Fédette," is in rehearsal at the Opera Comique.

DUSSELDORF.—The new music-hall will be inaugurated by the Festival of the Lower Rhine. The performances will commence appropriately on the first day with Beethoven's Overture, Op. 124, "Die Weihe des Hauses." This will be followed by Handel's Messiah. It is not yet decided what are to be the compositions for the following days. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt will conduct. Madame Goldschmidt will sing some of the soprano solos, while Madame Parepa will sing the others. The remaining principal vocalists will be Mlle. von Edelsberg, Herr Stockhausen and Dr. Guns. Madame Clara Schumann, also, will play at the concert on the third day.

HANOVER.—Herr Satter lately included in one of the programmes of the Subscription Concerts, of which he is conductor, an orchestral symphony and a Symphonic Concerto for piano and orchestra, both of his own composition. Looking upon this act as an attempt on Herr Satter's part to substitute his own works for those of the classical masters, the subscribers protested and Herr Satter resigned. Count Platen, also, Intendant of the Theatre Royal, has done the same. His talent for management was decidedly limited. Despite a yearly grant of some twenty thousand pounds sterling, he could never maintain the Theatre Royal, Hanover, on a level with the other theatres in Germany, even those not enjoying a grant from Government.

The Africaine receives a rather rough handling from the hands of Mr. Bernsdorf, the musical critic of the Leipziger Signale. Mr. Bernsdorf says, that in that opera everything, nay, even good taste has been sacrificed to dazzling effect, notwithstanding some decidedly noble and majestic numbers. This criticism will not prevent the opera from being received with a kind of blind enthusiasm by the good people of Europe.

NAPLES.—Nicolai's Templario has made a fiasco at the Scala. On the contrary, Don Giovanni has been received at the Carcano with unbounded enthusiasm. The Trovatore finds Mozart's opera to comprise "tout la musique possible"—that is to say, the florid and comic style of Rossini, the pathetic Bellini, the supernatural of Weber, the terrible of Meyerbeer, the ideal of Gounod, and the invention of—Wagner. The success of Don Giovanni was enormous and promises to create a new epoch in dramatic musical taste in Italy. Some years since an opera by Mozart would have obtained merely a succès d'estime. That could hardly be withheld from him.

A three-act opera, entitled Claudine von Villa Bella, has been successfully produced in Breslau. The music is written by Count Hochberg-Fürstenstein, who at first announced himself as Herr J. H. Franz. He soon, however, dropped the pseudonym. The text is adapted by Herr M. Karte, from Goethe. Count Hochberg-Fürstenstein is not much more than twenty.

A grand musical festival is to be given about Midsummer in Coburg, with the coöperation of Liszt, Bülow, Litolf, and Raff. Herr Richard Wagner is to be the conductor.

The well-known painter and writer upon music, Herr Carl Gross-Athanasius, discovered lately at Vienna a highly interesting portrait of Beethoven, with his autograph. It represents the composer as about twenty, and dates, probably, from the time of his first stay at Vienna in 1792. It is a charming miniature. Beethoven is easily recognizable by his fine forehead, and his prominent cheek-bones. He wears his hair in powder, and is dressed in a greyish green coat. His hand is pressing on his breast. The portrait is very spirited, and was painted, probably by Kreuzingas or Hickl, and it was, in all likelihood, a present to a fair pupil, or some other favorite beauty, for at the back are the words in the composer's own hand: "L. van Beethoven." The two "v's" end very characteristically in a long flourish, but the writing is unmistakably like that of his later years.

Conclusion of the Symphony Concerts.

The sixth and last concert of the Harvard Musical Association occurred on Thursday afternoon, 19th inst., under the inspiring auspices of mild, sunshiny weather, still further increase of audience—the most sympathetic and intelligent that Boston can assemble—and this sterling and somewhat unique programme:

- 1 Toccata in F (composed for Organ).....Bach.
Arranged for Orchestra by H. Ezer.
- 2 Septet, for Piano-forte, Flute, Oboe, Horn, Viola, Violoncello and Double Bass.....Hummel.
Ernst Perabo
- And Messrs. F. Zoehler, Ribas, Hamann, Fr. Zoehler, Fries and Stein.
- 3 Overture: "The Hebrides,".....Mendelssohn.
- 4 Symphony in C major.....Schubert.

We doubt if seventeen hundred persons ever listened with such interest before to a great organ composition of Sebastian Bach. Played on the instrument for which it was composed, as we have often heard it on the great organ of the Music Hall, by Mr. Paine and others, this Toccata was very grand. But the public for organ concerts is always small, and the great majority of listeners find the great roaring flood of full organ harmony bewildering and too soon monotonous. They do not make out the outline of the interwoven polyphonic parts distinctly; the ear has got to be accustomed to such large utterance to discriminate the melodic features in what seems a confused though glorious, harmonious mass of sound. To be sure, one need not understand such music in order to enjoy it; who understands the ocean, which he watches with insatiable interest as it rolls its waves upon the shore? But we certainly hear more clearly that which we can in some degree analyze and understand. Hence it is very common experience to find a Bach fugue, played upon a thin piano-forte, with its sharp, clear accent, taking hold of one whom it only bewilders when it rolls out in all its proper grandeur from the colossal Organ.

The transcription of this great work, therefore, for the orchestra, or rather the presenting of such a transcription to that audience on Thursday, was an interesting experiment. Clearly the result verified our prediction; hundreds even of the frequenters of Organ concerts, had for the first time a clear and positive perception of its beauty, a realizing sense of its power. The groups of instruments entering one after another with the theme were indeed like so many voices and individualized it thoroughly, so that the vital complexity of form lost not its charm. The contrasts of strings with reeds and brass, of softer portions of the band with the overwhelming tutti, the opportunities of light and shade, the vitality of accent so much greater where there is a human intelligence and will behind each part, each instrument, all tended to relieve the uniform, relentless grandeur of the organ with its hundreds of voices mechanically obeying one will. How magnificently those great chords came out in the latter part!

Such advantages had the orchestra in the rendering of Bach's Toccata. The short-comings, on the other hand, were, first, the want of the great organ sub-bass, the thirty-two feet tone especially; then, the want of a stronger body of strings in all the four parts. Played with a dozen double basses, instead of five, with other strings in proportion, it would have sounded far grander and clearer, of course. Then again, in rich, round, even quality of tone the organ is superior to the droning, sometimes scratchy quality of the strings. In clearness, unity, consistency of rendering the masterly organist has his advantage: but on that score there was not much wanting on Thursday; Ezer's arrangement is well made, and it was well played, both conductor and musicians relishing the thing greatly. The piece made its mark; the audience were sincerely pleased; though with some, no doubt, the humor of the thing, the friaky elephantine tread of the basses, &c., predominated over the grandeur. After such marked exposition by the orchestra, the Toccata in F will be more appreciable when we come to hear it again on the organ.

What is a Toccata? we are asked. We can only conjecture the origin of the term. The Italian verb toccare means to touch, hence also "to hint or speak a few words about." By Toccata may have been meant in Bach's time, and earlier, a composition not in the strict, but free form, in which the themes are lightly and fancifully touched upon and not formally developed. In this sense it corresponds somewhat to our modern Fantasia, Impromptu, &c. One Italian dictionary defines it as a prelude to a Sonata for the Clavichord; another makes it equivalent to Sonata (but in old times any composition for a single instrument was called a Sonata). Matheson says it was counted, with the then undeveloped Sonata form, under the head of music in which the fingers are more stirred than the heart. Judge how far this is true of Bach's Toccatas! There is no heartier music, if it is cheerful, serene, wholesome, and as far as possible from sentimental. And no one who has heard such a piece as the Toccata in F three times, few that have heard it once, will dare to call it empty; many a Church Mass or Te Deum written in these days, many a Symphony, is emptier. As to "free" treatment, however, the law of fugue and polyphony had become so much like instinct and involuntary habit with Bach, that his freest Fantasia is stricter, his most playful touch of a theme implies more and develops more than most of the would-be classical efforts of these days.

Hummel's Septet, perhaps the best work of its author and in every way a masterwork, new to half the audience (it has scarcely been heard here with all the instruments since Mr. Scharfenberg and then Alfred Jaell played it in Mr. Dresel's early concerts thirteen years ago), was indeed a happy selection. Everybody was delighted with the composition, with the playing, and especially with the pianist. ERNST PERABO is a youth of twenty summers, with a blooming, clear complexion, deep-set, earnest eyes and heavy, thoughtful brow, with a look of manly resolution, intense concentration and much inward brooding, yet of childlike truthfulness and sweetness, who wins your sympathy by his unaffected modesty and even shyness when he is not musically occupied, but in that occupation so sincerely absorbed is he and performs the most difficult task with such complete and easy mastery, such quiet self-possession and yet so much feeling, that he appears to have lost all consciousness of himself and to be but the truthful medium of the music that for the time seeks utterance through him. His playing is remarkable for strength, firmness, perfect certainty and ease; it is not the fine poetic touch of Dresel or of Leonhard, but it is very far from dry or mechanical; he plays from a sound and healthy musical feeling, and has acquired so sound a technique that no difficulties of execution seem to cost him any effort. He has a heavy hand, which brings the chords out boldly, and does all with a large style, always neat and elegant, but never finical, and seems particularly fitted to play the piano in a large hall and with an orchestra. Certainly to Hummel's Septet he did rare justice; it was magnificent playing, and the enthusiasm of the whole audience broke out most significantly after every movement; it could hardly be satisfied without a repetition of the Trio to the Scherzo, where the lingering horn tone leads back the melody so charmingly and so often—but a repetition would have injured the effect of the remaining movements.

The simple theme of the Andante was beautifully stated, so that it seemed doubly worthy of the variations. The rapid octave passages, and all the bravura, the brilliancy as well as the breadth and richness and sweetness of the first and last Allegro (the last reminding one sometimes of Beethoven) were brought out to a charm. Many indeed thought that they had never heard such wonderful pianism, and, carried away by the freshness of the phenomenon (for it was indeed different from most playing that we have been used to), it would be strange if some imaginations did not accept it for even greater than it was. To many it was a new pleasure to hear piano-playing so admirable, yet apparently so original, at least not modelled upon anything we have here or have heard before. The warmth with which he was recalled was something extraordinary; but it was not well-mannered to insist upon his playing again, after he had timidly appeared and declined several times. The little piece by Bargiel, with which he at last complied, was not particularly effective there, though it showed him in a new light; but the interruption of the programme injured what followed, especially the great Schubert Symphony, which demanded a whole hour for itself of undivided attention. The other six instruments went nicely together with the piano, and the whole came out well blended and well shaded under Mr. Zerrahn's baton. Mr. Dresel, who had been asked and expected to play this Septet himself, but who had been much interested in the musical education, as he now was in the success, of this young man, had offered him this fine opportunity, and must have been more gratified than any one else there by the splendid and yet modest manner in which he improved it. The tender care with which the older artist turned over the leaves for him enhanced the interest of the scene.

The "Hebrides" overture closed the first part of the concert, one of the most interesting and poetic, perhaps the most so of Mendelssohn's Overtures, and not so often heard as to have lost any of its freshness. It was quite happy in the rendering and nothing could have filled the place between the Septet and the Symphony much better.

Schubert's great Symphony in C,—discovered among heaps of MS. by Schumann in Vienna, who sent the prize to Mendelssohn at Leipzig, who at once shared his enthusiasm about it when he perused the score and had it brought out there, a great event in the Gewandhaus concerts!—Schubert's posthumous Symphony, with its wonderful wealth of exquisite ideas and coloring, its exalted mood, its never-flagging lofty inspiration throughout four long movements, that "heavenly length" which Schumann counted to its sum of merits, had the honor of occupying the Second Part and second hour of the programme all by itself. It must suffice to say that it grows more glorious and more fascinating with every good hearing, and that it was this time played with spirit and enthusiasm such as it is sure to enkindle when one gets fairly engaged in it either playing or listening. It lifts one up so surely as he listens, and keeps him up; for it is pitched very high in feeling and has the strength to sustain itself there. Such music enlarges the soul's horizon and sheds a new glory over the world. It is full of glory; it would come natural enough to call it the "Glory Symphony." To what a wild pitch of insatiable enthusiasm it works itself up in that Finale! Nothing could have been fitter, unless perhaps the Choral "Joy" Symphony of Beethoven, to end a series of such splendid concerts. The only drawback was the hurrying out of a portion of the audience to make up for time lost by the recall of the pianist. Publics are like children in this matter of demanding more of the instant pleasure, with no thought of before or after. It is forgetting the programme. If a programme has unity and completeness, the insertion or repetition of anything in it may sometimes be almost as bad as putting in three eyes or doubling the length of the nose in a portrait.

And so the six Symphony Concerts are over. They will remain memorable among the musical experiences of Boston. Their success has exceeded the most sanguine hopes of the projectors, and has verified the principles upon which they were planned. To assemble and hold together such an audience, steadily growing in numbers and in interest, was in itself an achievement; the right musical sphere was thus created, encouragement and inspiration for the best efforts of any artist. The orchestra in numbers and in quality and drill surpassed what Boston out of its own resources has ever realized before. It numbered commonly fifty-five instruments, and the unity grew constantly more perfect. Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, as the conductor, never entered more heartily into his work, throughout, and these successes have added not a little to the prestige which he has so long enjoyed. To be sure, our materials for a grand orchestra are far more slender than those in New York, and at our best we cannot bring out a Symphony upon so grand a scale as the Philharmonic. But in quality of programmes, as well as in tone and character of audience, we do believe these six concerts to have surpassed any series ever given elsewhere in this country. In composing the programmes the aim was to present (so far as possible in six concerts—only twelve hours all told!) such specimens of the greatest orchestral masters as should be most significant and of their best, and yet should have the charm of freshness, leaving even such great things as the Fifth and Seventh Symphony, the Mendelssohn Symphonies, and other best known symphonies and overtures to other opportunities which seldom fail; also, to study contrast, variety, effect, to make sure of interesting and pleasing the audience always, while never once descending from the highest standard of pure Art.

Counting up what we have received, by the pursuance of this plan, are we not rich? The six afternoons have given us seven Symphonies, eight Overtures, four Concertos, to count these alone, and all of the greatest ever written. To be more particular, we have had:

BEETHOVEN: Two Symphonies (Nos. 4 and 8); two unrivalled Overtures (Leonore, No. 2, and Coriolan); the three greatest piano Concertos (in C minor, in G, and in E flat); and the Chorus of Dervishes and March from the "Ruins of Athens."

BACH: Chaconne for Violin; Toccata in F (arranged for orchestra).

HAYDN: Symphony in B flat.

MOZART: Symphony in G minor.

MENDELSSOHN: Violin Concerto; three Overtures (Melusine, Midsummer Night, Hebrides); Serenade and Allegro Gioioso (piano and orchestra); two great choruses (male voices) from the Antigone; and the entire "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

WEBER: Euryanthe Overture; E-major Polonaise for piano and orchestra (Liszt's arrangement); and the "Lützow" chorus.

CHERUBINI: two fine Overtures (Anacreon and Wasserträger), both as good as new here.

HUMMEL: Septet in D minor.

SCHUBERT: Overture to Fierabras (new); Symphony in C.

SCHUMANN: Symphony in C; Overture to "Genoveva;" "Abendlied" (arranged by Joachim)—all new.

GADE: Symphony in C minor.

FERD. DAVID: two characteristic Violin pieces.

All this, and nothing but this! The concerts, then, have demonstrated the proposition with which the Committee set out: That there is no need of catering to questionable tastes and fashions, no need of descending even once from the purest standard in the programmes of a course of orchestral concerts, in order to ensure the eager attendance and delight of the true musical public of this city; and that such public, thus appealed to and thus guaranteed against what is false or frivolous or dull, is not slow to prove itself a large one. The plan sought the sympathy, the confidence, the material support of the best kind of audience, and it has won it amply. It has been possible to do things liberally as to expense, and there is a goodly surplus, to be kept sacred to the end of making such concerts a permanent institution here in Boston, more in number and better in quality from year to year. It hoped no less to secure the sympathy and coöperation of artists, from pure love of Art; and this hope also has been richly realized. Think of the list of solo players! First, that wonderful Violin performance of CARL ROSE. Then what a succession of pianists! Could any city, or any time, in this country beat it? OTTO DRESEL, LEONHARD, LANG, PARKER, PERABO:—each in one of the greatest compositions for piano with orchestra, each in the piece best adapted to his own peculiar power, and each a marked success, so surprisingly so that there was a temptation to exclaim: "Why, each seems better than the last!" which was a great injustice to the first, and it requires the circle to come round into itself to set the judgment right. These were all voluntary contributions; it was sympathy with the cause that called them out; and more such sympathy was offered, for which no room could be found. And not the players only; the work that was done in council, in selection, in drilling of chorus, in a hundred unseen ways, the nameless labors of such men as Dresel, Lang and others, the ready participation of the chorus, male and female, all must be counted into the positive practical good effected by such a concert scheme. To set all the factors of a fine artistic enterprise so heartily, disinterestedly at work together, is not that a great good in itself? Is it not the truest kind of mutual musical education?

ERNEST PERABO'S PIANO-FORTE CONCERT. That debut of the young pianist at the last Symphony Concert was the best introduction that he could have had, and of course the seats in Chickering's small hall were eagerly filled last Saturday night. The story of the youth is simply this. He was born, of humble parentage, in Wiesbaden, Germany; came with his parents to this country at the age of five; lived here six or seven years, in New York, in Ohio, in Massachusetts, the father teaching music, the young Ernst practising the piano with passion, showing a very early fondness for great masters, Bach, Beethoven, &c., remembering every piece he learned to play, knowing nothing but music and getting at that by a sort of instinct without any habit or faculty of study of any kind; allowed to overdo the piano practice, until the nervous system of the boy was really endangered. Many will remember the bright, handsome boy of eleven here in Boston; how remarkably he played in piano warerooms and houses; how easily he mastered long and difficult pieces, and could play them by heart, may almost any Fugue or Prelude in the "Well-tempered Clavichord" which you could mention.

About eight years ago some musical gentlemen in New York and Boston, with Mr. Scharfenberg and Mr. Dresel at their head, were struck with the importance of rescuing such a talent from an aimless wild growth, or from the scorching sun of premature public exhibition, and transplanting it to a true nursery, not only musical, but intellectual and moral likewise; and by a subscription for a term of years the boy was sent to Germany. He was first placed in a quiet town near Hamburg for general schooling and wholesome strengthening of neglected or abused faculties, for four years, music being kept in the background. Then he went for three years to Leipzig, taking the highest position in the Conservatoire, praised by all the professors. He returns to us, at the age of twenty, a musician of rare and many-sided accomplishment, a remarkable pianist, an artist fully armed, and with the purest aspirations. His musical memory is extraordinary; perhaps it would take Hans von Bülow to go beyond it. On private occasions before this concert we have found him ready, on mere mention of the works, to play from memory not only Fugues, but entire Suites and Partitas of Bach; Sonatas of Beethoven, even the last movement and the greater part of Op. 106 1, arranged Symphonies too, Sonatas of Schubert, hosts of things by Mendelssohn, Bennett, Burgmüller and newer composers like Bargiel. On Saturday evening he exhibited the same faculty in all but the concerted pieces. This was the programme:

Concerto, for Two Pianos (C minor).....J. S. Bach.
Allegro. Adagio. Finale.
(The String Quartet Accompaniment arranged for a third Piano).
Air from "Il Seraglio".....Mozart.
Sonata, E flat, Op. 27.....Beethoven.
Andante and Allegro, Scherzo, Adagio, Rondo Finale.
Etude.....Bennett.
Two Pieces, by.....Bargiel.
Songs.....Robert Franz.
Scherzo.....Thalberg.
Song—"The Erl-King".....Schubert.
Andante and Finale, from a Concerto by.....Norbert Burgmüller.

A somewhat singular variety, but interesting. Perabo comes from Leipzig at a time when (as we think we have before hinted) that musical old town had grown somewhat blasé with continual hearing of the best, and when young heads were full of Bargiel and the new composers, impatient for some free, original creation, for more individuality, as Schumann and his "Davidbändler" were in their day. Perabo, too, is full of it. It may perplex his judgment for a time, but we are sure his steadfast love and homage are for the great enduring models first and last. The two Bargiel "pieces" (they are from a set of a dozen, and wear no other name) were curious novelties indeed; fantastic, brilliant and exciting; they took with the audience immensely; we too were interested, but that such music would stay by us long, affording true soul's nourishment, we are not yet persuaded. A Suite of Bargiel's, which he played to an invited circle before, seemed to us to have more in it. The execution was beyond praise. Next in point of novelty were the movements from Burgmüller's very difficult and very brilliant Concerto, to which Mr. DRESEL sketched in the orchestral accompaniment on another piano. But this, with all its fine points and its bravura, is somewhat old-fashioned in its cut; Moscheles or Hummel might have written some of its passages. The slow movement has some beautiful ideas, but hardly justifying the working out to such a length;—at least this was the first impression, it might change on further hearing and with orchestra. It showed the firm, even, quiet, finished mastery of the pianist to fine advantage. Seldom does a player impart so much charm of reserved strength even to the lightest and most airy things. There is the magnetic quality in his playing; it is real. The Thalberg and the Bennett pieces are sparkling, graceful, pretty fancies; the latter very Mendelssohnian.

The Beethoven Sonata in E flat (the mate of the "Moonlight" one in op. 27) was a singular selection, being that one of all the Sonatas which has the least of the Sonata form and unity (quasi Fantasia it is called), and one which, while one may enjoy it greatly at the piano by himself (for it is thoroughly Beethovenish), is hardly calculated to impress an audience. The spirited and genial Finale, however, with its wonderful one page of introductory Adagio, must be an exception to this remark. The whole is poetic, but moods and motives are mixed up in it in a strangely fragmentary manner, almost wilful. It was played from memory, with fine accent, and as it really seemed to us by heart. The Bach Concerto was the most wholesome, perfect thing of all, and went admirably, Messrs. PERABO and LEONHARD playing the two piano parts, and Mr. DRESEL the string parts on a third piano. It is seldom that any pianist has so won the hearts of his audience as this young concert-giver; it is equally due to his musical skill and genius, and to sterling graces of character which cannot hide themselves.

Mr. KREISSMANN was the singer, and his selections of the choicest. The tenor aria: "Constanze! O wie ängstlich," from Mozart's Seraglio, is the most heart-felt, tender and refined of love songs, inspired when Mozart had himself just found his Constanze; helped out by Mr. Dresel's arrangement of the orchestral parts for two pianos, the thing was quite complete, and it was sung with exquisite taste and feeling. Mr. Leonhard accompanied the "Erl King," and it was both sung and played so well as to revive all its freshness.

OTHER CONCERTS are rapidly following and dropping down stream faster than we can record. Mr. SCHULTZE's, on Tuesday, we could not attend, but are glad to learn that it was a success, that he played the "Devil's Trill" and other violin pieces admirably, that Miss RYAN sang the Franz songs charmingly, ALICE DUTTON played finely, and the Quintette Club and the Orpheus (under their new leader, Zerrahn) never did better. Schultze goes to Europe on a visit and this was a friendly lift from brother artists. (Kreissmann also goes to Europe this summer, and Leonhard, and Lang, and John Paine, and how many more? Joy go with them and come back with them!)—Mr. RUDOLPHSEN's concert also was a success, and much of the singing quite superior.—Most interesting of all was the concert of Mr. PARKER's singing Club; but this is to be repeated next week, giving us a better chance to say what should be said.—Mr. HENRY CARTER, with the boys of the Advent choir, was to give a concert last Thursday night.—To-morrow night a Sacred Concert at the Music Hall, in connection with the German School Fair, with the Orpheus Club, an orchestra and Mrs. FRODOCK as organist.—Miss ANNIE CART, the contralto, goes to Europe too, to cultivate her voice, and will have a complimentary concert in the Music Hall, May 5.—Mr. DAUM's second and last Piano Soirée is fixed for Tuesday evening, May 8. Another chance to hear the Hummel Septet, and other fine things.—The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY's Festival Fund concert is fixed for May 13.—Mr. PECK, pleasantly known to all ticket buyers at the Music Hall, gives his annual concert on the 19th, with Miss KELLOGG, Mr. ERNEST PERABO, Mr. LANG and other attractions too numerous to mention.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA has returned from his three years' studies in Leipzig and with Bülow at Munich, crowned with concert triumphs in both cities. Another Boston boy! He has already been heard in private and must take rank among our most finished, brilliant, tasteful pianists. He and Perabo are warm friends, and it is refreshing to see two who might be rivals so warmly interested in each other's success. His turn will soon come for fuller recognition.

The "ALLSTON CLUB" have opened an exhibition of Paintings, in the Studio Building, mostly by the first French artists of the day, but partly by their own members, such as Hunt, Lafarge, Ames, Veder, Bicknel, Furnace, &c., which in individual excellence, as well as harmonious, fascinating ensemble, has never, we believe, been equalled in this city, since the bringing together of Allston's works.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 23.—The concert season is rapidly drawing to a close. The Maretzek operatic performances are things of the past; Grover at present occupies the Academy for two weeks of German Opera, and Grau looms on the horizon of the future. Of these, further in my next. Like birds of passage, the strolling opera and concert artists leave us in autumn, and return with the approach of spring, after tours of more or less successful result, remind the metropolitan public once more of their unapproachable talents, their incomparable voices, and their unexampled achievements; and then repose on their laurels during a few weeks of dignified silence. The managers, poor fellows! condemned to roll the Sisyphean stone through hot and cold, announce their departure for realms unknown, for the territories of Brobdignag and Lilliput, the isles of Greece, and the lands of the Saracen, "fresh fields and pastures new," in search of fresher voices and newer attraction, then, quietly sitting down through the hot months in some neighboring island of non-classical renown, or some out-of-the-way watering place, laugh in their sleeves at the gullibility of the dear public, until the dance of the Seasons again brings round the time for winding up and setting a-going the operative machine, perhaps reinforced with new wheels and springs, in the shape of a few fresh-caught singing birds, and perhaps not; but well oiled at least with the complacent ointment of puffery.

THOMAS'S Symphony Soirées closed with the following programme:

- Overture, "Consecration of the House," C, op. 124. Beethoven.
 Scene and Aria, "Freischütz." Weber.
 Mrs. Lizzie Eckhardt.
 Overture, } Op. 52.....Schumann.
 Scherzo, }
 Finale, }
 Songs, { "Helden-Rüelein,".....Schubert.
 "Widmung,".....Schumann.
 Mrs. Lizzie Eckhardt.
 Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Viola and Orchestra, op. 16. Berlioz.
 1 "Harold in the Mountains; Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy."
 2 March and Evening Prayer of the Pilgrims.
 3 The Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Beloved.
 4 Ory of Brigands; Reminiscences of the preceding Scenes.
 Mr. G. Matka and Orchestra.

The Soirées were less successful with the public this season than the last. We certainly cannot say wherefore! The programmes offered were unquestionably interesting, and much care was taken to carry them out as well as possible; but it is a fact that the concerts did not "pay" either for their outlay or the work they necessitated. The press was most liberal and friendly in its endeavors to interest the public in the undertaking, but neither the subscription lists nor the attendance fulfilled expectations. We shall regret to see Mr. Thomas compelled to discontinue his Symphony soirées in future seasons, but shall not be surprised to find him turning his energies in another direction.

Can it be possible that New York is unable to support more than one series of orchestral concerts? We hardly think the city so devoid of liberality, and empty of music lovers; but there is a peculiarity about undertakings of the kind here, that should not be overlooked. Public performances by subscription, or of continuity here, must become either popular or fashionable. And they become so through private social influence. This prestige once established, then no matter how inimical the press, how inferior the performances, the public follows its leaders, and streams to listen.

During the past month, many concerts of more or less merit have been given: Mr. BERGNER's, at Dodworth's Hall; Miss BRATNARD's, at Irving Hall, where also a series of organ concerts have been undertaken on Sunday evenings, MORGAN as organist, with the assistance of CASTLE, CAMPBELL, and others. The Chamber concerts of MASON and THOMAS will close on the 25th of this month; not to mention innumerable "church concerts," where every kind of Music (!) from clap-trap opera arias down to "Five o'clock in the morning," is played and sung—except real church music. Young PETERSILEA is here, and played with acceptance before a half-private circle lately; we hope soon to hear him in public. The Harmonic Society will repeat their performance of "Samson" on the occasion of the inauguration of the new organ in Dr. Beecher's church, which event circumstances—meaning the difficulties attendant on the erection of a large instrument—may postpone until the Fall. Messrs. Steinway's Music Hall, now in progress of erection, promises to be ready for next season.

The last concert of the present season was given by the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY on Saturday evening last. The following was the programme:

- Symphony No. 7. In A, Op. 92.....Beethoven.
 Scene and Aria, for Soprano, Op. 94, "Infelice." Mendelssohn.
 Concerto for the Piano, in F sharp minor, Op. 1, (Posthumous), (1st time).....Norbert Burgmüller.
 1. Allegro ma non troppo. 2. Larghetto, con moto.
 3. Allegro moderato.
 Characteristic Overture, "Faust,".....R. Wagner.
 Aria from "Samson," "Let the bright Seraphim," Handel.
 Trumpet Obligato, Mr. Dietz.
 Overture, "Les Francs Juges,".....Berlioz.

The glorious Beethoven Symphony, as well as the two overtures, were well played by the orchestra. Miss BRAINARD sang Mendelssohn's pleasing aria, and, in the place of the air from "Samson," to the performance of which the vice-president announced "circumstances" were opposed "not to be controlled by the Society,"—a tame barcarole by Gounod, with violin obligato. Mr. WILLIAM MASON introduced Norbert Burgmüller's piano-forte Concerto to us. We had expected more from a composer once held by Schumann in such high estimation. The composition offers very few new ideas, and is not interestingly instrumented. It was, however, played finely by Mr. Mason.

We regret to say that a large majority of the persons who attend these concerts give audible and most ill-bred proof, by loud talking during the performance, that they are neither admirers nor students of music. There was a time when it was possible to hear a fine Andante, without an undercurrent of loud whispers in accompaniment, and a continuous "St! st!" in rebuke of the whisperers.

LANCELOT.

ANOTHER PIANIST of more than ordinary talent and merit (says the New York Weekly Review) has arrived in this country.

We refer to Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, a son of the well-known musician, Mr. Petersilea of Boston. Mr. Petersilea has studied for more than three years in Leipzig and Munich, and has been a pupil of Hans von Buelow, who warmly recommends him, as a highly talented pianist, to his friends in America. We had the advantage of hearing Mr. Petersilea in one of those charming matinées which Messrs. Mason & Hamlin have arranged at their warerooms, No. 596 Broadway, and where artists like Messrs. Mason, Mills, Thomas, Bergner, Fradel, S. P. Warren and others congregate. Although fatigued from the journey, and embarrassed by the presence of the most critical audience which could be found in this city, Mr. Petersilea played with great taste, vigor, and a fine execution, evincing at once his quality as a good musician. We hope to hear the young artist at an early day in public. On the same occasion we listened, with extreme pleasure, to performances of the above named artists: on the cabinet organ, piano, cello and violin, and especially to an excellent arrangement of Schubert's "Ave Maria" by Mr. Thomas. These concerts, which take place every Wednesday afternoon, and are free to every lover of music, are attended by a highly select circle of musical critics and dilettanti, and are absolutely delightful from their character of sociable entertainments.

MR. CARL WOLFSOHN having about completed his successful series of ten "Beethoven Matinées" in Philadelphia, the subscribers propose to present him with the splendid new Leipzig edition (Breitkopf and Härtel's) of Beethoven's complete works. The Committee in their appeal to the subscribers, say:

It is intended as a feeble expression of our feelings to Mr. Wolfsohn, for educating us, as it were, to the enjoyment of the sublimest classical conceptions of Beethoven; and we can now fully sympathize with him for the past years of toil, study and persevering labor, which he must have bestowed upon his art, to have arrived at the point of excellence to which he has now attained. We cordially invite his friends, pupils and admirers as an artist, to join us, so that the "Testimonial" may represent, in some measure, the musical taste of Philadelphia; and also assure Mr. Wolfsohn that his labors for many years have not been wasted upon an ungrateful and barren soil.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- I'll pour all my soul and feeling. (Ich will meine Seele tauchen). R. Schumann. 30
 I'll not complain. (Ich grolle nicht). Op. 48. R. Schumann. 30
 The broken ring. (In einen kühlen Grunde). S'g. R. Schumann. 30
 Up from my tears. (Aus meinen Thränen). R. Schumann. 25
 Whene'er into thine eyes I see. (Wenn ich in deine Augen seh). R. Schumann. 25
 Five of Heine's delicate sonnets, very delicately set to music. Schumann and Franz seem peculiarly fitted for this work, Franz being, perhaps, a trifle the most novel and striking in his arrangements, and Schumann a little the simplest and clearest.
 Softly the chimes are ringing. Song. A. Leduc. 30
 Somewhat sad, but quite pretty. The words are by Linley.
 Alice White. Ballad. L. V. H. Crosby. 30
 Mr. Crosby has shown a fine taste in this production. Words and music both good, and a pleasing little chorus is at the end.
 Dedication. (Widmung). R. Schumann. 30
 The music is of a high order, and has a pleasing melody. The words are capable of great expression.
 Evening serenade. (Abendständchen.) Op. 117. C. G. Reissiger. 40
 A charming lullaby-like serenade, with a separate part for Flute or Violin.
 Song from Ruy Blas. Duet. Mendelssohn. 40
 The words are by Victor Hugo, and the music of sterling goodness.
 Hush! Song. Dolores. 40
 An exceedingly affecting song, and very effective to sing before a company or audience. Words by Adelaide Proctor.
 Beautiful stranger. Serenade. P. R. Nichols. 30
 The music is called an arrangement, and yet in connection with the words, it is arranged into something quite novel and taking.
 Wings. Song. Dolores. 30
 Elegant and satisfying. "Wings! to bear me over mountain and vale away!"
 Early in the morning, Merrily O! Song. F. Maccabe. 30

Music Schools.

Of all the many subjects connected with the organization of a music school, none is more important than the proper selection of a director. Should this officer be a musician or a layman?

The arguments advanced in favor of the latter are, that it is more easy to find a good man of business where the choice is not limited to the musical profession, and that a layman is less likely to be an extreme partizan or to identify himself with any musical clique.

For the musical qualification it is urged that a musician must have a far clearer insight into what are the wants of musical students, and that such a man, if of acknowledged excellence, would have far greater influence over both the masters and the pupils, and would inspire greater confidence in the soundness of the system upon which the school was conducted. That all pecuniary matters, and the mere routine business, would be better managed by a layman we are ready to admit. But we are as strongly convinced that the technical direction, to be worth anything, must be in the hands of a musician.

We are quite aware that Mendelssohn, in organizing the Leipzig Conservatorium, being conscious of an insuperable repugnance to business details, placed the supreme control in a board of lay directors, reserving to himself only a right of suggesting. But what we know of the history of the Leipzig Music School seems to us to be a strong argument in favor of our own views. So long as Mendelssohn lived things worked with tolerable smoothness, though within but a few months of its opening he complained in a letter to Prof. Moscheles of the extravagance of the directors. (Letters, Vol. II., page 300.) The directors were his personal friends, and wise enough generally to adopt his advice; while his warm, affectionate nature, his respect for himself and others, and his uncontested musical reputation had so great an influence with his colleagues that they all made common cause with him, and adopted his views, so that he actually was director de facto, if not de jure. But when Mendelssohn died it was very different. The lay directors gradually assumed more and more power; the cordiality which had reigned among the masters gave way to disunion; snubbed by the directors, the professors no longer made suggestions; their authority over the pupils was not only not supported, but some of the directors actually encouraged the pupils to turn their teachers into ridicule; each master did what was good in his own eyes, and all discipline was at an end. The directors were satisfied could they but show a good balance-sheet; but to do this a large number of pupils must be paying. Discipline was therefore relaxed, and idlers, discouraging the hardworkers, were allowed to keep their names upon the books, did they but pay; the preliminary examinations for admission grew less rigid, or were evaded; and the classes were overcrowded to avoid the necessity of increasing the fees paid to the professors if new classes had been formed. That the Leipzig Conservatorium is still the best music school in Europe is due to the individual excellence of many of the masters and the musical atmosphere and traditions of the city rather than to the vigilance of the management. The directors honestly thought they were doing their best for the school, but in music they were only dilettanti, and half-knowledge blinded their eyes and deafened their ears, introducing the very element of cliquism which Mendelssohn had been so anxious to avoid. It is the essence of dilettanteism to depreciate thoroughness of technical teaching. The dilettante craves for rapid superficial progress, and has no patience for the careful stone by stone building up which must be followed in every sound system of education. Dilettanti directors will never support masters who refuse to sacrifice sound system for the sake of brilliant outside show.

Select a musician of standing and character such as to inspire respect, concentrate upon him the responsibility by giving him proper freedom of action, allow him to select a staff of teachers, not more numerous than is absolutely necessary, and pay these teachers so well, and give them such a position, that the magnates of the profession may look upon these posts as prizes to be won and kept; insist that the professors shall be always punctual at their lessons, not regarding them as to be given up if any better paying engagements offer, while their pupils, vainly waiting for the master, waste their time in the neighboring cigar divan and billiard room; maintain a proper discipline among the students, eliminating the idle and encouraging the industrious, and all will have been done that can be done to reform the Royal Academy. If it do not then succeed, it will be a proof that there is some insuperable malign influence against musical education in London; be it the want of a sufficiently educated musical public opinion, or the distracting influences of life in a large city. The latter might be avoided by a retreat to a distance; but the former, which we fear the most, would be an evil for which time only can be a remedy.

One other important question has been raised by the Committee now sitting—that relating to pupils' concerts. Our own experience would lead us to recommend extreme care upon this point. The preparations for these concerts interfere sadly with the regular course of study; the audiences attending them are naturally very uncritical, and are in such close relationship with the young performers that they applaud everything; the pupils have rarely self-knowledge sufficiently strong to appreciate the applause at its true worth; they are apt to grow conceited, and are often stupid enough to put down to jealousy the warnings of their teachers. A concert or two at the end of the term, in which only those pupils take a prominent part who are about to leave the school, is less objectionable, and, indeed is useful, as giving the pupils an opportunity of being heard—so difficult for the unknown to find. It is also of great advantage where the pupils can take part in good orchestras, in which good music is played, and in which they do not form a predominant part of the band.

In some of the foreign music schools there is an arrangement which has proved of much value, viz., weekly almost private concerts, in which all the pupils who are sufficiently advanced may be heard in turn, and may acquire confidence in playing before others. No special preparations are made for these concerts; each professor writes down in a book the names of his pupils, and the pieces, whether ensemble or solo, which they have learned; from these names the director selects a sufficient number to fill up a couple of hours. All the professors and pupils are expected to be present, and besides these a few persons who are known to interest themselves for music are permitted to be present. All applause, as also all signs of disapproval, are strictly forbidden. There is no audience more critical, especially in the sense of finding fault, than an assembly of young musical students; the players and singers soon learn to read the faces of their auditors, and are quickly made sensible if they have fallen into errors of style or execution. Such concerts, stimulating both professors and pupils, should be adopted in every music school.—Orchestra.

Spohr's Account of Beethoven.

[From "LOUIS SPOHR'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY, translated from the German. New York: J. Schubert & Co.]

Upon my arrival in Vienna I immediately paid a visit to Beethoven; I did not find him at home, and therefore left my card. I now hoped to meet him at some of the musical parties, to which he was frequently invited, but was soon informed that Beethoven, since his deafness had so much increased that he could no longer hear music connectedly, had withdrawn himself from all musical parties, and had become very shy of all society. I made trial therefore of another visit; but again without success. At length I met him quite unexpectedly at the eating-house where I was in the habit of going with my wife every day at the dinner hour. I had already now given concerts, and twice performed my oratorio. The Vienna papers had noticed them favorably. Beethoven had therefore heard of me when I introduced myself to him, and he received me with an unusual friendliness of manner. We sat down at the same table, and Beethoven became very chatty, which much surprised the company, as he was generally taciturn, and sat gazing listlessly before him. But it was an unpleasant task to make him hear me, and I was obliged to speak so loud as to be heard in the third room off. Beethoven now came frequently to these dining rooms, and visited me also at my house. We thus soon became well acquainted: Beethoven was a little blunt, not to say uncouth; but a truthful eye beamed from under his bushy eyebrows. After my return from Gotha I met him now and then at the theatre "an der Wien," close behind the orchestra, where Count Palffy had given him a free seat. After the opera he generally accompanied me to my house, and passed the rest of the evening with me. He could then be very friendly with Dorette and the children. He spoke of music but very seldom. When he did, his opinions were very sternly expressed, and so decided as would admit of no contradiction whatever. In the works of others he took not the least interest; I therefore had not the courage to show him mine. His favorite topic of conversation at that time was a sharp criticism of the management of both theatres by Prince Lobkowitz and Count Palffy. He frequently abused the latter in so loud a tone of voice, while we were yet even within the walls of his theatre, that not only the public leaving it, but the Count himself could hear it in his office. This used to embarrass me greatly, and I then endeavored to turn the conversation upon some other subject.

Beethoven's rough and even repulsive manners at that time arose partly from his deafness, which he had not learned to bear with resignation, and partly from the dilapidated condition of his pecuniary circumstances. He was a bad housekeeper and had besides the misfortune to be plundered by those about him. He was thus frequently in want of common necessities. In the early part of our acquaintance, I once asked him, after he had absented himself for several days from the dining rooms: "You were not ill, I hope?" "My boot was, and as I have only one pair, I had house-arrest," was his reply.

But some time afterwards he was extricated from this depressing position by the exertions of his friends. The proceeding was as follows:

Beethoven's "Fidelio," which in 1804 (or 1805) under very unfavorable circumstances, (during the occupation of Vienna by the French), had met with very little success, was now brought forward again by the director of the Kärnthner-Theatre and performed for his benefit. Beethoven had allowed himself to be persuaded to write a new overture for it (in E), a song for the jailor, and the grand air for Fidelio (with horns-obligati) as also to make some alterations. In this new form the Opera had now great success, and kept its place during a long succession of crowded performances. On the first night, the composer was called forward several times, and now became again the object of general attention. His friends availed themselves of this favorable opportunity to make arrangements for a concert in his behalf in the great "Redouten Saal" at which the most recent compositions of Beethoven were to be performed. All who could fiddle, blow, or sing were invited to assist, and not one of the most celebrated artists of Vienna failed to appear. I and my orchestra had of course also joined, and for the first time I saw Beethoven direct. Although I had heard much of his leading, yet it surprised me in a high degree. Beethoven had accustomed himself to give the signs of expression to his orchestra by all manner of extraordinary motions of his body. So often as a Sforzando occurred, he tore his arms, which he had previously crossed upon his breast, with great vehemence asunder. At a piano, he bent himself down, and the lower, the softer he wished to have it. Then when a crescendo came, he raised himself again by degrees, and upon the commencement of the forte, sprang bolt upright. To increase the forte yet more, he would sometimes, also, join in with a shout to the orchestra, without being aware of it.

Upon my expressing my astonishment to Seyfried, at this extraordinary method of directing, he related to me a tragi-comical circumstance that had occurred at Beethoven's last concert at the Theatre "an der Wien."

Beethoven was playing a new Pianoforte-Concerto of his, but forgot, at the first tutti, that he was a Soloplayer, and springing up, began to direct in his usual way. At the first sforzando he threw out his arms so wide asunder, that he knocked both the lights off the piano upon the ground. The audience laughed, and Beethoven was so incensed at this disturbance, that he made the orchestra cease playing, and begin anew. Seyfried, fearing that a repetition of the accident would occur at the same passage, bade two boys of the chorus place themselves on either side of Beethoven, and hold the lights in their hands. One of the boys innocently approached nearer, and was reading also in the notes of the piano part. When therefore the fatal sforzando came, he received from Beethoven's out-thrown right hand so smart a blow on the mouth, that the poor boy let fall the light from terror. The other boy, more cautious, had followed with anxious eyes every motion of Beethoven, and by stooping suddenly at the eventful moment he avoided the slap on the mouth. If the public were unable to restrain their laughter before, they could now much less, and broke out into a regular bacchanalian roar. Beethoven got into such a rage, that at the first chords of the solo, half a dozen strings broke. Every endeavor of the real lovers of music to restore calm and attention was for the moment fruitless. The first allegro of the Concerto was therefore lost to the public. From that fatal evening Beethoven would not give another concert.

But the one got up by his friends was attended with the most brilliant success. The new compositions of Beethoven pleased extremely, particularly the symphony in A-Major (the seventh); the wonderful second theme was encored: and made upon me also, a deep and lasting impression. The execution was a complete masterpiece, in spite of the uncertain and frequently laughable direction of Beethoven.

It was easy to see that the poor deaf Maestro of the Piano could no longer hear his own music. This was particularly remarkable in a passage in the second part of the first allegro of the symphony. At that part there are two pauses in quick succession, the second of which is pianissimo. This Beethoven had probably overlooked, for he again began to give the time before the orchestra had executed this second pause. Without knowing it therefore, he was already from ten to twelve bars in advance of the orchestra when it began the pianissimo. Beethoven, to signify this in his own way, had crept completely under the desk. Upon the now ensuing crescendo, he again made his appearance, raised himself continually more and more, and then sprang up high from the ground, when according to his calculation the moment for the forte should begin. As this did not take place, he looked around him in affright, stared with astonishment at the orchestra, that it should still be playing pianissimo, and only recovered himself, when at length the long expected forte began, and was audible to himself.

Fortunately this scene did not take place at the public performance, otherwise the audience would certainly have laughed again.

As the saloon was crowded to overflowing and the applause enthusiastic, the friends of Beethoven made arrangements for a repetition of the concert, which brought in an almost equally large amount. For some time therefore Beethoven was extricated from his pecuniary difficulties; but, arising from the same causes, these reoccurred to him more than once before his death.

Up to this period, there was no visible falling off in Beethoven's creative powers. But as from this time, owing to his constantly increasing deafness, he could no longer hear any music, that of a necessity must have had a prejudicial influence upon his fancy. His constant endeavor to be original and to open new paths could no longer, as formerly, be preserved from error by the guidance of the ear. Was it then to be wondered at that his works became more and more eccentric, unconnected, and incomprehensible? It is true there are people, who imagine they can understand them, and in their pleasure at that, rank them far above his earlier masterpieces. But I am not of the number, and freely confess that I have never been able to relish the last works of Beethoven. Yes! I must even reckon the much admired Ninth Symphony among them, the three first themes of which, in spite of some solitary flashes of genius, are to me more than all of the eight previous Symphonies, the fourth theme of which is in my opinion so monstrous and tasteless and in its grasp of Schiller's Ode so trivial, that I cannot even now understand how a genius like Beethoven's could have written it. I find in it another proof of what I already remarked in Vienna, that Beethoven was wanting in æsthetic feeling and in a sense of the Beautiful.

As at the time I made Beethoven's acquaintance he had already discontinued playing both in public and at private parties, I had therefore but one opportunity to hear him, when I casually came to the rehearsal of a new Trio (D-Major, 3-4 time) at Beethoven's house. It was by no means an enjoyment; for in the first place the pianoforte was woefully out of tune, which however little troubled Beethoven, since he could hear nothing of it, and, secondly, of the former so admired excellence of the virtuoso scarcely anything was left, in consequence of his total deafness. In the forte, the poor deaf man hammered in such a way upon the keys, that entire groups of notes were inaudible, so that one lost all intelligence of the subject unless the eye followed the score at the same time. I felt moved with the deepest sorrow at so hard a destiny. It is a sad misfortune for any one to be deaf; how then should a musician endure it without despair? Beethoven's almost continual melancholy was no longer a riddle to me now.

Spohr and Beethoven.*

Though I have long become indifferent and callous to all that is published in books and periodicals concerning Beethoven as an individual or as a musician, I think it my duty to say a word or two in reference to the incidents at the inauguration of the Monument at Bonn, in 1845, as far as they relate to the Missa in D, of which mention is made in No. 46 of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, in connection with some quotations from Spohr's Autobiography. The writer there refers to the anecdote, current among musicians on the Rhine and in other parts of Germany, to the effect that, at the first rehearsal of the Missa in D, Spohr declared, with a certain amount of affectation, that he did not know the work. This "anecdote" is classed in the category of "reports"—"rumors."

At the said rehearsal, I was seated quite close to the orchestra, namely, on the benches to the left, near the Royal Box, whence I had the conductor en face. The late Herr Messer, Musik-Director, came and sat next to me, in order that he might be able to read the score of the work which I had brought with me. Herr Liszt soon joined us for the same purpose, placing himself between Messer and myself. It so happened that the conductor, Spohr, was taken unawares by a change of time in the "Gloria," that is to say: he continued to beat time for several bars in the preceding measure, after a fresh one had commenced. In the second part of the "Credo," however, there occurred a similar mistake of a far more striking kind, to the extreme surprise of a considerable number of the many persons present, because the conductor, to excuse himself for what had happened, was plainly heard to say that he had first become acquainted with the work on his journey to Bonn. I must mention that he came over from Karlsruhe to the Festival. It may easily be imagined to what observations on the part of intelligent musicians this confession from the conductor gave rise, for it was impossible to conceive how any one could undertake to conduct, at a Festival of European importance, so difficult a work without having previously rendered himself completely master of it.

As this fact is still remembered by the musicians on the Rhine as well as in other parts of the country (many such gentlemen from Cologne, Herr Franz Weber, Musik-Director, among others, sat quite close to the Conductor in the orchestra); and as in the "authorized description" of the Festival, we read: "He" (Spohr) "was unacquainted with the Mass," &c., &c., no further proof of the truth is necessary.*

I must, however, add that, even at the grand rehearsal of the Mass, Spohr gave only too evident proofs of uncertainty and want of knowledge of his great task: it was not he who led; it was the enthusiastic multitude in the orchestra and the chorus, a multitude perfectly familiar with the work, who led him. That the merit of a perfect performance of the work belongs principally to the Musik-Director, Herr Franz Weber, the author has already stated at length in the third edition of The Biography of Beethoven, vol. II., p. 86, and to that statement he firmly adheres. But the same merit belongs to Herr Weber for the other vocal pieces of the Festival as well. With Liszt's slovenly, nay, devil-may-care mode of conducting, what would have been the fate of his Cantata, had not Weber previously ensured the correctness of the choral masses? All this, and, it is to be hoped, more, will be found in the "authorized account" ("actenmässige Darstellung") of the Festival.

That "Spohr was not only a great admirer of Beethoven but moreover an enthusiastic admirer of his compositions," as I read in the number of the Niederrheinische containing the above, is an assertion that surprises me (as well as, perhaps others), and I must frankly confess that this admiration—except, may be, as regards the first few quartets, and some movements in other works—is not very evident to me and a great many others, from what is said about Beethoven in the Autobiography. He who, when speaking of the Ninth Symphony, says that: "the first three movements, despite a few flashes of genius, strike him as worse than all those put together of the eight former Symphonies;" he who adds concerning the fourth movement of the Ninth: "I find in it fresh corroboration of what I remarked even in Vienna, namely: that Beethoven was deficient in æsthetic culture and a sense of the Beautiful;" he who, moreover, can say, among other things, of the Symphony in C minor: "Despite of many separate beauties, no classical whole is obtained. For instance, at the outset, the theme of the first movement is deficient in dignity;" and he who, furthermore, designates the fourth movement of this mighty epic of tone, "unmeaning noise," evidently belongs to the most infatuated opponents of Beethoven, such as Dionys Weber, C. M. von Weber, Eybler, Freindl, and a full score more of not insignificant contemporaries.

Again, how comes this "great admirer" of Beethoven to admit into his Autobiography such a fable (merely on the verbal authority of Seyfried, too) as the story of the swinging box on the ear which Beethoven administered with the full force of his right hand to a chorus boy during the performance of a new Pianoforte Concerto, after having previously flung on the ground the two candlesticks from off the piano? In his own notices on Beethoven, Seyfried mentions nothing of the sort, though he industriously collected all that appeared worth picking up. This fable is indisputably the metamorphosis of the well-known incident at the performance of the "Fantasia with Chorus," 1808, at the Theatre an der Wien, and of which several witnesses have given an account. If the statement at p. 200 and p. 201 of the Autobiography were true, the fact would not only have been vividly recollected, as a piquant anecdote, by the Viennese, but most decidedly Ferdinand Ries would not have allowed such an illustration as the box on the ear to escape him—for completing the "genuine authorities" towards depicting the character of his master and friend. The present generation and Posterity are, however, greatly indebted to the Director-General of Music, Dr. Spohr, for his care in providing a fitting place in which to preserve this fable.

The manner in which Spohr expresses himself concerning Beethoven, when at the conductor's desk, must be designated as the utmost degree of exaggeration. It should be the task of the Recensionen or the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung to answer him. There must still be some few sensible men in Vienna who saw the Master in 1819 for the last time at the conductor's desk, in the Hall of the University, with his A major Symphony before him. We shall learn from them that Beethoven was not the ridiculous figure drawn by Spohr.

When Spohr says of Beethoven (speaking, it must be remarked, of the year 1813, when Beethoven's difficulty of hearing had considerably increased): "In the labors of others he did not take the slightest interest," he is again guilty of exaggeration. Were, however, what he states literally true, we should find an excuse in the great composer's infirmity. But what if the assertion be true which is made in the Autobiography of Franz Willd, the singer, concerning exactly the same peculiarity in Spohr? We read therein: "His great fault as a musician, and especially as a conductor who influenced the repertory, was the blind hate he nourished against all foreign compositions," &c. (Recensionen, No. 6, 1860).

I will close this article with recounting the following fact which happened to myself. In the month of December, 1831, I stayed four days at Kassel, on my way from Vienna. Herr von Schm—r, then Secretary of Legation of the Austrian Embassy, and whom I knew well in Vienna, was, as especially fond of music, and also as an actual player, in constant communication with Spohr. It was he who introduced me to the latter, after first obtaining his permission to do so. But Herr v. S. warned me beforehand to avoid any mention of Beethoven in the conversation, unless Spohr himself broached the subject; he was, however, aware of the position I once held towards Beethoven. As a reason for my being thus silent, Herr von S. said that the Court Capellmeister was not particularly fond of talking about Beethoven, and it is actually a fact that, during my tolerably long visit, Spohr did not say a single word in reference to his great contemporary. Twice afterwards did I meet him at the Reading Rooms, but the name of Beethoven never once passed his lips. Let this suffice, though I could mention much more.

"Music of the Future" in Munich.

WAGNER.—LISZT.—BÜLOW.

The London Musical World translates from the Lower Rhine Musik-Zeitung the following letter on the present state of Music in the Bavarian capital:

"The Music of the Future, as it is denominated, no longer hangs, like some fearful doom, over men's heads, awaited with anxious dread by some, looked forward to with solicitous longing by others; it has begun to occupy the Present. In losing its mysterious mantle of Futurity, it has, it is true, lost a part of its nimbus, and, sacred creation though it be, must be content to take its place by the side of the poor every-day music of the Past; submit to stand a comparison with the latter; and undergo a thorough and dispassionate criticism. Well, the mighty phalanx which took up arms in its cause in Munich, and the consequent necessity of the opposite party's assembling all their forces, have, at all events, contributed to clear up the situation and shorten the duration of the schism. To which side the victory will eventually incline, the Future alone will determine. It would be presumptuous to attempt to prophecy the course of events. Still it must be confessed that, for the moment, things wear a rather bright aspect in Munich for the Music of the Future. At any rate, the present conjuncture of affairs is attended with one good result: it enables us to form a correct idea of the productive power of our would-be musical reformers, and affords us an opportunity of hearing much that is new and strange.

As yet, however, the inhabitants of Munich have still a chance of enjoying classical music and real melody, thanks to the Concerts, the Soirées for Chamber Music, the Oratorio Association, and the Opera-house. The charge of intentional exclusiveness not unfrequently brought against the various managers of the above entertainments is, however, perfectly unjustified. That Herr Lachner does not, as a rule, neglect modern music generally is proved by the programmes of the celebrated grand Subscription Concerts for the last few years, during which these programmes have been most varied. But no man in his senses would expect Herr Lachner to treat the general public with Herr Dr. Hans von Bülow's 'Réverie phantastique' arranged for a full band.

The Oratorio Association, too, a highly meritorious body of amateurs, evidently flourishing under the musicianly and strict management of Professor Rheinberger, most certainly does not do too little for the cultivation of modern as compared with older music. The programme of its very last concert included Joseph Haydn's Sabat Mater; Miriam's Siegesgesang, by Franz Schubert; Eichendorff's 'Flucht der heiligen Familie,' set by Herr Max Bruch (the first composition, by the way, from the pen of that gentleman ever publicly executed at Munich), and a 'Hymn for four Female Voices and Harp,' by Rheinberger. At the last concert but one, Schumann's Paradies und die Peri was performed.

Those, therefore, who assert that there exists a deeply felt necessity for doing something more in order to keep pace with the times would have some difficulty in proving their assertion. But an opposite opinion is patronized in high quarters, and consequently—such a necessity does exist, wherever Richard Wagner, though living in banishment, and his partisans chuckle and rub their hands with delight. They have some really good 'diggings' here, though the days of Tristan and Isolde have gone—let us hope not to return in a hurry.

Did we not know the force of a transient fashion, a passing 'fad,' a momentary caprice, we might almost believe that every one has hitherto held to be an utter and sheer impossibility, namely, that Herr Richard Wagner's music can really become popular. In the streets, the regimental bands play his 'Tunes' (?), and the Académical Vocal Union has executed his Cantata for Male Voices: Das Liebesmahl der Apostel. Nay; one band-master, Herr Hün, carried away by his enthusiasm, real or assumed, has even arranged the said Cantata for, and had it played by, a reed band. The programmes of the demi-monde concerts are literally filled with Wagner's name. To adduce only one example, the bill of a concert given the other day in the 'Westend-Halle' contained, by the side of two compositions by Weber, and one each by Rossini and Haydn, a piece from Lohengrin, a piece from Tannhäuser, a piece from Der Fliegende Holländer, a 'Huldigungsmarsch,' by Richard Wagner, and, forming a division by itself: Das Liebesmahl der Apostel!

With such a state of things, some persons might feel inclined to ask seriously: Has then Richard Wagner really become popular at Munich? To this the answer must be a most decided 'No!' Herr Richard Wagner has not found his way into family life, and to take public performances as the standard of popularity would be both foolish and incorrect. In drawing up a concert-bill, destined to be posted all about the city, many a person—swayed by considerations of pecuniary advantage—flatters what he feels is the whim of the day, though many, doubtless, are really enthusiastic followers of the would-be musical reformers. But the latter, despite everything that may be stated to the contrary, are not, and never will be, popular, not even in Munich, their great stronghold.

This was most convincingly proved lately by the performance of Liszt's St. Elizabeth. It might fairly have been supposed that the mere novelty of this work, which had been executed only in Peath, where it had been brilliantly received, would have sufficed to attract the public to the theatre in shoals. To the astonishment of a great many people, such was not the case. The execution was truly first rate, and the work was successful, that is to say: the audience applauded a great deal, and the newspaper critics praised much more. But that the house was half empty at the first performance, and three quarters empty at the second, despite the publication of the enthusiastic notices between the two, was a fact that none of the critics mentioned. The greatest length to which these gentlemen went in the way of giving the public generally a notion of the true state of matters was to state euphemistically that St. Elizabeth was a work to be understood only by the dile of musical amateurs, and, therefore, not calculated to attract the less highly educated masses. However this may be, the inhabitants of Munich have proved by their behavior in the case of the Abbé Liszt's composition that they did not consider the way in which the Abbé had set about the task of reforming oratorio the right one; that they did not think profound orchestral-painting recompensed them for the absence of melody; and that, though they might manage to put up with poverty of truly genial ideas in an opera—where the composer has the action to support him—they cannot and will not stand it in a work dependent on music alone.

This is as it should be.

Let us suppose, for an instant, Tristan or Lohengrin—which, despite the Abbé's peculiar and unconscionable appropriation of others' melodies, are really his models—performed in a concert-room! Who on earth could stand it? To Beethoven, Gluck, and Mozart, however, we can listen at all times and in all places. The fact is: in the works of these great men there burns the divine fire which has not been given to the reforming gentlemen. The want of it compels them to show their originality by their 'tone-painting,' as they cannot exhibit it in their melodies or in their harmony.

This overstepping of the limits of music, this confounding of music with the subject to be portrayed, is a fact on which Wagner himself is continually laying great stress in his critical effusions. For instance, in the preface to a translation of his librettos, he considers that the greatness of the poet depends most upon 'what he omits to say, in order that the Inexpressible may be conveyed to us even by silence,' adding, 'now it is the musician who brings forth to clear tone what is thus not said, and the unerring form of his loudly resounding silence is endless melody.'

Alas! alas! for us poor wretched sons of clay! we stretched all our senses to the very utmost even in opera to understand this 'loudly resounding silence.' But, as honest men, we were forced to confess that it was something too profound for us; how much more humbled do we not stand before it, however, when it comes haying down upon us without any explanatory dramatic action! All we can do is to console ourselves with the conviction that the Music of the Future is intended for beings of a higher organization, and that, therefore, we must renounce all hopes of ever seeing it become popular in our unenlightened and benighted age. O, nos miseros!

In order, however, to gain anything like a true picture of the efforts of the musical reformers, the reader must hear something of the course pursued by Herr von Bülow. To say that this gentleman can play the piano well is, at the present day, superfluous, and his playing is more than a faultless performance of compositions of various kinds. He penetrates the abysses of the literature of the piano, bringing to light treasures which enchant those who hear them. But there is one particular in which people do him an injustice, and that is the assertion that he presents them with a complete survey of German musical literature, and that he is guided by a certain amount of impartiality in the selection of compositions.

In the series of performances for this season, which he brought to a close a short time since with the third, we find Beethoven's name three times. Bach was represented by two compositions and Handel by one. Schubert, Joachim, Raff, and Bülow furnished one piece each (Bülow's being his 'Réverie phantastique'); Chopin was down for two pieces in succession, and Rheinberger for three small ones. Liszt heads the catalogue with eight compositions, the most very long, and some of absolutely monstrous proportions.

Where, however, are Haydn and Mozart: where Dussek, Clementi, Mendelssohn, Thalberg, Taubert, Hiller, and Carl Maria von Weber, not to speak of Hummel, Moscheles, and others? These programmes speak for themselves. It is unnecessary to cast up the sum total.

Such is a picture of what is being done by the Music of the Future. I will merely add the rumor now going the round of the papers that in the course of next month three concerts will be given in the Theatre, when compositions by Liszt and Wagner will be performed under the direction of Herr von Bülow.

Though the above sketch makes no claims either to completeness or to universal acceptance, it is, despite the numerous Pot-house laurels gathered by the gentlemen of the musical Reformation, not without justification, as an impartial protest, dedicated to the expression of the sentiments entertained by a large majority of the inhabitants of Munich."

Paris.

DON GIOVANNI.—Three opera houses have recently been giving "model performances," each in its own way, of Mozart's masterpiece; and the manner in which the Parisian critics crow over the good deed, as if the transcendent beauties of that opera had waited all this time for Paris to "discover" and proclaim them to the world, shows how insincere this admiration really is. Here is an account of one of the productions, from the London Musical World's correspondence, April 14.

Il Don Giovanni at the Grand Opera of Paris! I beg pardon; I should have said "Don Juan." That makes a difference. It is Don Juan, not Don Giovanni, which has been produced at the Opera. Had it been Don Giovanni the authorities no doubt would have shown respect for the composer. The Gallic translation of MM. Emile Deschamps and Henri Blaze de Bury allows a large licence to the manager, of which he has not failed to take advantage. Don Giovanni is in two acts; the Don Juan of the Opera is augmented into five. The finale to the first act of Don Giovanni is one of the most masterly and complete concerted pieces in music, to alter, or interrupt, any part of which is an insult—a desecration—a mockery. The finale to the Opera Don Juan is altered and interrupted with a vengeance. In the Minuet scene is introduced a newly-concocted ballet, upon which the greatest possible pains and care have been expended, and which indeed makes the sensation of the evening. To give the ballet a seeming cohesion with the opera, select themes have been borrowed from Mozart's symphonies, sonatas and quartets—the most striking being the Turkish March from the sonata in A major, which constitutes the final movement—to supply pas for the dancers. But the subscribers to the Imperial Academy love ballets and would shrug up their shoulders at so simple a thing as the minuet, and, you know, without a ballet the National Theatre could not exist; and so M. Emile Perrin is bound to conciliate the dancers.

I must needs repeat the cast of the characters. Don Juan is sustained by M. Faure; Leporello by M. Obin; Don Ottavio by M. or Signor, Naudin; Masetto by M. Carron; the Commendatore by M. David; Donna Anna by Mlle. Marie Saxe; Donna Elvira by Madame Gueymard; and Zerlina by Mlle. Marie Battu. The ladies are not well suited. Mlle. Saxe seems to think that force only is required to give effect to Mozart's music. She has strong moments certainly in the great scene of the first act, and now and then declaims the air, "Or sai chi l'onore"—which she carefully transposes—with energy and passion; but altogether her inferiority in Donna Anna to what she is in Selika in the Africaine is remarkable. Madame Gueymard bawls even louder than Mlle. Saxe, and the two roar so lustily in the trio of masks that poor M. Naudin is drowned, as to his voice, between the two. Mlle. Marie Battu is out of her element in Zerlina, but she struggles womanfully against the peculiar requirements of the music. M. Naudin is a tamer Ottavio than even Rubini, and, as he cannot sing the music a millionth part as well, and, moreover, as he is every way unsuited for the character, I shall leave you to guess the effect he produced. If M. Obin had a spark of comic humor in his composition—one spark—and if he had a tolerable voice—which I am told, without believing, that he once had—and if he could, possessing that comic humor and tolerable voice, enter in the remotest degree into the spirit of the character, he might, with exceeding care and attention, do something with Leporello. As it is, he does nothing with Leporello. M. Faure is proclaimed by several respectable judges to be the best Don Juan extant. The "best" he certainly is in the truest and most direct acceptance of the term. Never was a less wicked Don Juan than the popular French barytone. With his good-humored face and imperturbable features, with his perfectly quiet demeanor and gentlemanly bearing, he seems as if his true mission on earth was to rescue womankind from destruction instead of compassing their ruin. In this way the Don Juan of M. Faure is really and truly "best." That he sings the music admirably I need not inform you.

The band, strengthened without Mozart's permission, was excellent throughout, and the chorus, equally, sans the composer's intention, very good.

I fear I cannot chronicle Don Juan at the Imperial Opera as a great success. I would if I could. I have intimated that the artists are unsuited to the music. I may add that the music is unsuited to the French people. Abstract music is hardly after the hearts of the great dramatic nation. To please them everything must be "sensational." There is nothing of the kind in Don Giovanni, and so Mozart's opera will have but a short life, and that not a merry one.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—On Sunday last the Society of the Concerts of the Conservatoire gave its third Concert Extraordinaire. The programme was as follows:—Symphony in A major—Mendelssohn; "O Filii" (double chorus)—Leising; Overture to Leonora—Beethoven; Chorus of hunters, from Euryanthe—Weber; March from Tannhäuser—Wagner.

On the same day, at the Cirque Napoleon, was given the Seventh Popular Concert of Classical Music, with the subjoined selection: Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Beethoven; Adagio and Scherzo, from Symphony "Le Printemps," Ferdinand Hiller; Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte, Robert Schumann; Air from the ballet of Prometheus, Beethoven; Overture to Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn. M. Jaell was the pianist in Schumann's concerto.

NEW OPERAS. The correspondent of the Orchestra, April 11, writes:

Flotow is here at present looking after the repetitions of his "Zilda" at the Opera. I assisted at a rehearsal the other day, and was very much pleased with what I heard. The music is light and full of melody—as good as "Martha," and far better than "Stradella." It will probably be done about the 1st of May; and not one day sooner than was needed—novelty being by no means the order of the day with us. M. Gounod is hard at work on his score of "Romeo et Juliette"—which is now rapidly approaching completion. He has written the last act twice, the difficulty being an apothecary scene, two of which ("Reine de Saba" and "Fausse") the composer has done already, thus creating difficulties in the way of conception and freshness. I hope soon to give your readers a pretty detailed idea of how he has, in conjunction with MM. Barbier et Carré, treated Shakespeare's play; in the meantime I am able to state that he has stuck to his predilection for few people on the stage and no finales. The finale is Gounod's l'été noir. Some people think he cannot write them, but this is absurd, as a reference to his earlier operas and to the 2nd act of "Mireille" will show. But, shrewd and inventive as he is, Gounod sees he can produce better and fresher effects by substituting something for the orthodox "full stage" at the end of an act, and so you will find, in "Romeo et Juliette," the curtain come down in three acts out of five on not more than three and sometimes only one principal artist. The balcony scene, I predict, will eclipse any love music ever yet penned. (!)

Rossini has been writing some more songs. He is always writing, but never publishes. When he does die (which is however unlikely) there will be a tremendous portfolio of works to edit. The patriarch gives dinners regularly—a beautiful trait in his character—and receives as a matter of course all the musical lions who arrive for the Paris show. Thus M. L'Abbé Liszt was duly entertained at Passy the other day after the performances of his Messe at St. Eustache, and Rossini as usual made a few jokes on the occasion, which jokes (also as usual) immediately made the round of the salons and Boulevards. They are gems. No. 1, was as followeth: Said another convive present to Liszt, "The Credo in your mass is the fairest flower of your garland, M. L'Abbé." "Yes," added Rossini, "in fact a fleur de Liszt." (!) Hoping you see this, I go to No. 2. "You write masses, M. L'Abbé (continued the composer of "Tell"), to accustom yourself to say them!" But then his dinners are so good.

GRAND OPERA.—The fight is over and M. Perrin remains manager of the opera at his own risques et péril. The really serious contest was between him and M. Roqueplan; and the latter was so sure of winning that he had already prepared, and some say deposited, the cautionnement. But M. Perrin was in high favor; it was remembered that he had always been successful in his previous essays as a director; that, after passing for a short time at the Lyrique, he had twice been the manager of the Opera-Comique, and always with satisfactory results; and, supported by the Maréchal Vaillant, MM. Arène Houssaye, and Roulier, he won by a "length" in this directorial race. As for Pasdeloup, whom I mentioned in my last, he was struck off the list because he was too fat. Of course all the Monday feuilletons are full of the subject, some being for, and some against the new arrangements. Foremost among the last stands M. Azencodo of the Opinion Nationale, who finds means to bring into his article on the opera an allusion to his friend David's "Lallah Roukh," and to mention the "Système de la Méditerranée" by Michel Chevalier, M. Haussmann, California, Australia, the "Belle Hélène," music in the provinces, von Bismark, Cookery, "Tannhäuser," Meyerbeer, the first Empire, the Restoration, Shakespeare, and musical glasses, in fact all to prove that M. Perrin ought not to have been named: "a thing of shreds and patches," and something like the "tale told by an idiot" to which Macbeth alludes as "signifying nothing." It is believed that many important changes will be made in the arrangements, and that the members of the orchestra will have no reason to complain of their new chief.

CONSERVATOIRE.—The following changes have been made at the Conservatoire, in consequence of the death of MM. Clapisson, Leborne and Mme. Coche—M. Victor Massé takes M. Leborne's class of Composition; M. Savard succeeds M. Clapisson as professor of harmony; M. Duprato is named to an extra class as professor of harmony; M. Hector Berlioz, the head librarian of the Conservatoire, will in future be the "Conservateur" of the instrumental museum founded by M. Clapisson. This gentleman's widow will receive from government an annuity of 2000*fr.*, and will remain in the official lodging occupied by her late husband at the Conservatoire so long as circumstances shall allow. M. Leborne was chief librarian at the Opera as well as professor at the Conservatoire. He will be succeeded by M. Ernest Reyer, the composer of the "Salam," "Maitre Wolfram," "Le Statue," etc.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Il Trovatore, the opening piece of the season, was followed by the Ballo in Maschera and Traviata, twice each in alternation. Verdi five times in succession! Anything might be refreshing after that. The Traviata was the carpet for two debuts: a tenor, Sig. Fancelli, "what the Italians call a tenorino," and a young soprano, Mlle. Orgeni, Viennese by birth, a pupil of Mme. Viardot, of whom the Times says:

In Mlle. Orgeni, or we are very much mistaken, Mr. Gye has been lucky. As yet without experience, having only recently made her debut (at the Royal Opera, Berlin), this lady exhibits precious qualities. She is young, has a graceful stage presence, abundance of feeling, and unmistakable intelligence. Then in her voice—especially the pure soprano tones, which are at once clear, resonant, and sweet, there is a freshness which of itself is an indefinite charm. In her sustained high notes a certain effect of limpidity, if the term may pass, leaves an impression on the ear peculiarly grateful and satisfactory.

The Orchestra and the Athenaeum say equally flattering things; we quote from the former:

In person Mlle. Orgeni is elegant, and her musical method shows the advantage she has derived from having had the benefit of Mme. Viardot's instruction. Of the not very agreeable part of the heroine, the debutante gave a different reading to that generally presented, reminding those who remembered Mme. Bosio's version very much of the lady-like demeanor of that lamented prima donna, and with a tinge of sadness pervading every scene, which so well displays the questionable position of the unhappy heroine of Verdi's creation. The promise thus given Mlle. Orgeni will undoubtedly fulfil by some future effort.

After so much Verdi, Meyerbeer's Prophète was "like sunshine after rain." The Times says of it:

Mlle. Philippine von Edelsberg, who, 12 months since (April, 1865), made her debut in this opera, was again the representative of Fides, showing marked improvement both in her acting and in her singing; Mlle. Sonieri, of whom as much cannot fairly be recorded, was again the Bertha; the three Anabaptists were represented by Signors Neri-Beraldi, Polonini, and Capponi; Count Oberthal by Signor Tagliafico; and, last not least, Jean of Leyden by Signor Mario; so that the distribution of the principal characters was precisely the same as last year. It is worth noting, en passant, that Polonini, Tagliafico, and Mario, Mathisen (Anabaptist), Oberthal, and Jean, were the original Mathisen, Oberthal, and Jean of July 24, 1849, when the Prophète was first produced at Covent garden, with Mme. Pauline Viardot Garcia as Fides, and the late Catherine Hayes as Bertha. The wonder is that Signor Mario can still bear up so vigorously against the arduous task imposed upon him, of singing from end to end one of the most trying and difficult parts in the lyric drama. That his histrionic embodiment of the character should be truer, greater, and more elaborately finished now than ever is not surprising in such an artist, for while, in the natural course of things, the material physique is apt sensibly to decay, the intellect may still ripen and the æsthetic perception grow keener and more keen. But none can witness Signor Mario's Jean of Leyden at the present time—from the scene in which the perplexed innkeeper recounts his dream to the three Anabaptists to that where the sham Prophet, in the midst of an orgie, and after a Bacchanalian song, perishes, with Fidea, his mother, and only friend, in a conflagration of which he has secretly laid the train, and which wraps his enemies and himself in a common destruction—without admitting that, in his way, Signor Mario is a phenomenon. Little more need be said about the opera of Meyerboer, which seems destined to be a perennial favorite. No work exhibits to more brilliant advantage the orchestra, chorus, and general resources of the theatre.

The new soprano, Mlle. Orgeni, appears to have risen still higher in favor by her impersonation of Lucia. The Orchestra says:

This young prima donna's version of the deceived and ill-used heroine is in many respects quite new—one of the characteristics of other talent evidently being originality of thought under the influence of natural intelligence. In the early scenes she displayed the feelings of a tender-hearted and loving girl with genuine simplicity; in the second act she represented the disunity at finding herself the dupe of her brother's duplicity with a mingled feeling of shame, sorrow, and dismay; and in the final assumption of madness so imbued herself with the peculiarities of the broken-hearted heroine as to place herself very far above the level of those who had preceded her in the same character upon the Royal Italian Opera stage. Mlle. Orgeni's singing was also equal to her acting, although in the last scene she overloaded Donizetti's passages with a superabundance of floriture, so as scarcely to leave a particle of the original text to be heard. This is perhaps Mlle. Orgeni's chief fault, for in her anxiety to succeed she aims at more than is required of her.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The second performance of Il Trovatore introduced the tenor, unknown to England, who was to have sustained the part of Manrico on the opening night, but at the eleventh hour was not forthcoming. It would, perhaps, have been as well if Signor Arvini—or Monsieur Arvin, as he is known in the French provincial theatres—had further delayed his advent, for the impression he created was anything rather than favorable. His voice is neither disagreeable in quality nor deficient in power; but he rarely sings quite in tune, and it is only in loud declamatory passages that he approaches respectability.

Mr. Hohler will doubtless accept the very flattering applause he obtained on the night of his debut for what it was worth, and no more. There is not a part in modern Italian opera more difficult to sustain creditably from one end to the other than that of Arturo in the Puritani. Bellini composed it expressly for Rubini, since whom no other singer, Mario himself not excepted, has been able to give the music precisely as it was intended. The late Giuglini, perhaps, approached as near the mark as any successor of Rubini; but even Giuglini was far from being the legitimate Arturo of Bellini. It was bold in Mr. Hohler, though hardly wise, to select such a part for his debut. With a voice of agreeable quality—a “tenore leggero” somewhat, by the way, like Giuglini's—Mr. Hohler combines extreme sensibility. Indeed, voice and expression are the raw material he has at present at command, and of which he has yet to acquire the legitimate use. He must learn to control the one and regulate the other. We speak of him merely as a singer, since as an actor he yet exhibits no pretensions.

The other prominent parts in the Puritani were allotted to Mlle. Sinico, to whom Bellini's Elvira appears as familiar as Verdi's Leonora; to M. Gassier (Riccardo)—an unexpected acquisition and as welcome as unexpected; Signor Foli, to whose fine bass voice the music of Giorgio is well suited; and Signor Bossi, a more than respectable chief of the Puritans.

On Saturday Der Freyschütz, the performances of which during the extra nights last autumn were more than once described, was given for the first appearance this season of that great artist and great public favorite, Mlle. Titiens, who was, as usual, enthusiastically welcomed. The other characters were in the same hands as before, Mlle. Sinico taking that of Anna; Signor Stagno, Max (Rodolphe, Adolphe, or what not); and Mr. Santley, Caspar.

On Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia was given with Mlle. Titiens, Sig. Gardoni, M. Gassier, and Mme. de Meric Lablache, in the principal characters.

CONCERTS.—The second concert of the Musical Society of London confirmed the success of Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Symphony, of the first production of which, at the Crystal Palace, we copied an account. Schumann's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra was of course “dreary” to the London critics, and only saved by the wonderful cello playing of Sig.

Platti. The Overtures were three: to Egmont, Frey-schütz, and Mehul's La Chasse du Jeune Henri. Miss Robertine Henderson's singing of an air from Mozart's Idomeneo is much praised.

The third concert of the Philharmonic Society gave Beethoven's C-minor Symphony; Overtures to Euryanthe and Hebrides; Mozart's Violin Concerto in D, played by Herr Strauss; airs: “On mighty pens” and “Deh! vieni,” and Lieder by Mendelssohn and Taubert, sung by Fräulein Ubrich, from Hanover (pronounced “good honest singing, without the slightest meretriciousness”); a March from Egmont.

Costa's “Naaman” was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society on the 13th ult., and seems to grow in popular estimation. Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Athalie were set down for the next concert.

At the first New Philharmonic concert, Schumann's E-flat Symphony was played; also Mendelssohn's “Italian Symphony,” overtures to Struensee and “Men of Prometheus;” a Concerto for clarinet by Weber. Dr. Wyde conducted.

The Crystal Palace Concerts, says the Musical World, April 21, are more interesting and more prosperous than ever.

Since we last alluded to them there have been very fine performances of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor and Mozart's Symphony in D, composed for the Paris Conservatory. We have also had some noticeable pianoforte performances, among which may be named two movements from Chopin's concerto in E minor, and the whole of Schumann's concerto in A minor—the former played by Herr Dannreuther, the latter by Herr Pauc. Then, at the most recent concert (Saturday afternoon), Beethoven's No. 9 (the Choral Symphony on Schiller's Ode to Joy) was repeated, the execution being, if possible, more admirable than when we last had to speak of its performance under Herr Manna. This time the chorus was far more efficient than before; while the solo singers—Mlle. Parepa, Miss Julia Elton, Messrs. Cummings and Lewis Thomas (who also each contributed a song to the programme)—were more than usually lucky, it being always a chance whether these parts go well or ill. The execution by the orchestra of the three magnificent instrumental movements, and of the interludes and accompaniments all through the choral finale, was magical. Never has this colossal work been listened to with more rapt attention or applauded with more unmistakable enthusiasm.

At the next concert we are promised Schubert's very original, and in all respects remarkable, symphony in C, No. 7 (the only one from his pen which is known in this country); Mozart's too rarely heard pianoforte concerto in A major (pianist, Mr. Franklin Taylor), and Mendelssohn's overture to Athalie.

DRESDEN. The third public evening of the Tonkünstlerverein (Musicians' Union) offered an attractive programme: Trio in B minor, for two violins and cello, by Handel; Fantasia in C, op. 17, for piano-forte, by Schumann, the masterly interpretation of which by Herr Blassmann excited extraordinary enthusiasm; and a seldom heard Symphony in D minor by Haydn, admirably performed under the direction of Herr Rühlmann. On the fourth and last evening the pieces were: a Concerto a chiesa (No. 1 in A major), for four violins, viola, violoncello and bass, by Pergolese; Quintet in A minor, op. 107, for piano, two violins, &c., by Joachim Raff; Serenade in F, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, violoncello and double bass, by Adolph Reichel. All these pieces were executed here for the first time.

LEIPZIG. The Signale sums up the past season of Gewandhaus concerts. In the twenty subscription concerts, together with the two for the benefit of the orchestral fund and of the poor, the following works were produced:

a) Symphonies: Six by Beethoven (No. 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9); the four by Schumann; four by Haydn (D major, B-flat major, the “Military” and the “Farewell” Symphony); one each by Mozart (E flat), Phil. Emanuel Bach (D), Schubert (C major), Reinecke (A major).

b) Overtures: Four by Beethoven, (Op. 124, Leonore No. 1, Leonore No. 3, Coriolan); two by Cherubini (Les Abencerrages, Anacreon); two by Mehul (Joseph, Gabrielle d'Estrées); two by Weber (Euryanthe, Oberon); one each by Schumann (Genoveva), Mendelssohn (Meeresstille), Gade (In the Highlands), Mozart (Zauberflöte), Grützmacher (concert overture), Raff (Festival overture), Vierling (Hermannschlacht), Righini (Tigranes), Vogler (Samaritanen), Vincent Lachner (Demetrius), Spohr (Jessonda), Schubert (Alfonso and Estrella), Marschner (Vampyr), Meyerbeer (Struensee).

c) Other things for Orchestra: Dances of Blessed Spirits and of Furies from Gluck's “Orpheus;” Ballet from Gluck's “Paris and Helen;” Concerto for stringed instruments by J. S. Bach; Entr'act from Cherubini's “Medea;” Serenade for wind instruments by Mozart; Entr'acts from Schubert's “Rosamond;” Suite No. 3, by Franz Lachner; Suite by Esser; Overture, Scherzo and Finale by Schumann; Allegro, Sicilienne, Minuet and Epilogue by Gony.

d) Music to dramas; Beethoven's “Egmont” music; Schumann's “Manfred.”

e) Larger and smaller choral works: Ave verum by Mozart; Lobgesang, choruses from “Antigone,” and “Loreley” finale, by Mendelssohn; “Pfingsten” (Whitsuntide) by Hiller; Choruses from Handel's “Israel;” Cantata “Nun ist das Heil” by J. S. Bach; Kyrie from Schubert's Mass in E flat; Chorus from “The two Misers” by Gretry; Christmas Carol by Leonh. Schröter; Introduction from Spohr's Jessonda; “Mug auch die Liebe weinen” by Fr. Schneider; “Woher nur das linde Säuseln” by Conradin Kreutzer; “The Hunter's Return” by Reinecke.

f) Airs, Duets, Quartets: Six by Mozart; four by Weber; three by Rossini; three by Handel; one each by Mendelssohn, Glinka, Graun, Pergolese, John Christian Bach, Cimarosa, Herold, Spohr, Beethoven, Gluck, Haydn, Cherubini.

g) Songs (Lieder): Five by Mendelssohn; three by Robert Franz; two by Schubert; two by J. F. Reichardt; two by Haydn; one each by Alabieff, Beethoven, Kirchner, Hasse, Rubinstein, Gordiniani, Taubert.

h) Instrumental solos, with, and without accompaniment: 1) For Pianoforte: Six by Sebastian Bach (three of them only arrangements); three by Beethoven; two by Schumann; two by Liszt; two by Handel; one each by Mendelssohn, Saint-Saëns, J. L. Krebs, Galuppi, Friedemann Bach, J. Christian Bach, Volkmann, Rubinstein, Chopin, Reinecke. 2) Violin: Two by Spohr; one each by David, Tartini, Joachim, Vieuxtemps, Schumann (arrangement), Ernst, Beethoven, Litolff. 3) Violoncello: Two by de Swert; one each by Molique and Servais. 4) Piano, Violin and Cello: Triple Concerto by Beethoven. 5) Oboe: One by Mozart (?). 6) Harp: One each by Pönitz and Parish-Alvars.

The instrumental soloists who appeared were: 1) On the Pianoforte: Mmes. Zimmermann and Krebs, and Messrs. Saint-Saëns, Blassmann, Petersilea, Reinecke, Pauer and Labor. Violin: David, Drey-schock, Petterson, Grün, Auber, Bargheer. 3) Violoncello: Lübeck and de Swert. 4) Harp: Pönitz. 5) Oboe: Lund.

As Solo Singers appeared: Mmes. von Kotzche-toff, Schlegel-Köster, Flinsch, Rudersdorff, Marchesi-Graumann, Pögnier; Mlles. Ubrich, Scheuerlein, Savanny, Rothenberger, Borchard; Messrs. Schill, Marchesi, Scharfe, Rebling, Sabbath.

The number of works performed for the first time was twenty.

Mlle. Marie Saxe (the African of the Paris opera), whose real name is Sasse, has been compelled by the French laws to keep the latter spelling. She was sued by Sax, the horn-maker, for damages, for spelling her name his way, and hence the judgment.

The "Africaine" in Leipzig.

Meyerbeer's posthumous opera still continues to invade theatre after theatre all over Europe (and America); while it has lately celebrated its hundredth performance at the Grand Opera in Paris, the centre from which it set out in its travels. It is not likely that its career will be very soon exhausted; it has become a matter of course, a business necessity rather than an Art necessity, that it shall keep on, shall cost and make a great deal of money, and be praised and puffed and bruted all over the world as long as money-making managers can keep the ball up. In due time it will fall to the ground; for the reasons of its popularity are extraneous and artificial, not intrinsic; it lives not by its own life, musically, but by a vast deal of clever engineering into Parisian first success and notoriety. All the arts of reclame, in which Meyerbeer himself was an adept, have been set in play in its behalf; and it travels as the fashions travel, the two-headed "chignon" monster for example, without the least regard to charm or fitness. It fills one with a sickening distrust in musical criticism the world over, to see how nearly all the journals chime in with this chorus of manufactured and in many cases manifestly insincere praise. Insincere praise or compliment is the staple of five-sixths of all that passes in newspapers or Art journals for Art criticism.

Once in a while, however, it is refreshing, amid the shallow, heartless chorus, to hear the clearing of one honest, earnest voice. Once in a while amid the stereotyped big letter headings we are allowed to read in plain and simple characters a little sober truth and reason. Once in a while there comes a critic bold enough to tell aloud the "open secret" and assert the real silent conviction of true friends of Art who seldom care to lift their voices in so clamorous an atmosphere. Such an expression we are glad to find in a review of the "Africaine" in a recent number of the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, written apparently by its editor, than whom there is not a more honest or more high-toned critic in all Germany. Even in Leipzig the Africaine has drawn its crowds,—some months later than in New York and Boston. But the Africaine is a business opera, and we are a business people, so we were bound to get it before the musical old town of Bach and Mendelssohn. It gives us not a little pleasure to find our own first impressions of the opera, as we gave them in these columns after it arrived in Boston in January last, so much in harmony with what we now translate.

"Really we get on famously with our modern stage! One knows not what to be most astounded at: a richly gifted artist who can bequeath to the world as a precious legacy, as his most perfect opera, the fruit of (so they say) twenty years labor and most painfully severe self-criticism, in the shape of a work like "L'Africaine"; or a public brought up (or rather, as the example shows, not brought up) on Shakespeare, Schiller, Goethe, or Gluck, Mozart and Beethoven, and yet accepting such a work in the sense in which it is given, and not protesting loudly against the assumption that it can find pleasure in such absurdities. Verily one must wonder less about the public than about the critics, those vigilant guardians of its honor, those representatives of its head and heart, who partly yield themselves up to finding such a work divine, partly are too shy to come out with a frank confession, and partly seem to have forgotten the very conditions of a work of Art.

"A serious state of things indeed! But let us come to the object of this essay. To speak from our inmost conviction, the "Africaine" is only one more proof of Meyerbeer's artistic bankruptcy both in artistic intelligence and artistic means,—that bankruptcy which was already to be foreseen in the "Prophet" and which shows itself in full daylight in "Dinorah" and the "North Star." In artistic intelligence—for either the composer no longer thought it worth the while to create a work that could be justified from an artistic and dramatic standpoint,* or he had forgotten the first and most important principles of Art. In artistic means, for the musical invention, originally his own, is exhausted; instead of thoughts we have for the most part only commonplace phrases and, with a partial renunciation of the principles of beauty, various combinations of tones which are repulsive, nay impossible, bizarre in the highest degree, even reminding us of Berlioz, and not unfrequently of Wagner.

"The text of L'Africaine, dramatically, must be designated as a sorry, pitiable affair. The action that is chosen does not plunge us into the realm of the supersensual, does not conduct into the domain, so lawfully reserved to Art, of fable, of the Märchen, of the marvellous in general; but it is the most realistic actuality into which we are supposed to be transported; it is men, who actually have lived, or at least who could have lived, countries or regions which actually exist, events which essentially have actually occurred. So much the worse, if in the name of this firm we are asked to accept the impossible and the nonsensical as possible, and to carry away a real impression from it.

"Who is this 'Africaine'? A Queen of swarthy hue, of whom we are first told that she comes from an island beyond Africa, whereas she pops out of the chrysalis at last as Queen of Hindostan! This queen of Hindostan, it seems, before the beginning of the action, being all alone in a boat with Nelusko, was surprised by a storm and driven upon the coast of Africa, there dragged to a slave mart and, with her servant, purchased by Vasco da Gama, who had just completed an unsuccessful voyage of discovery to the Cape of Good Hope. In the first act of the opera Vasco brings them before the grand high Council of Portugal as proof of the existence of a hitherto unknown people. Being questioned about their native land, they both reply in the language of the questioners, and the spectator is required, without more ado, to find this perfectly natural. This might pass as a poetic license already naturalized upon the stage. But now we are expected to believe, that the brown queen Selika, now a slave, loves her white master, who only despises her, and loves him not only with that southern glow of sensual passion, which anyhow might be supposed possible, but with perfect resignation, which can only be the product of a high character and of peculiar respect for the object of one's love. She saves him in prison from the dagger of her servant Nelusko at the moment when he (Vasco) dreams aloud of Inez, his beloved. She pardons him for giving her away as a slave to Inez, just after she had come to believe that she had won his love. She declares him to be her husband, when the Indians wish to murder him. Nevertheless she lets him sail away with Inez, although he had shortly before actually fallen in love with her and been married with her, and finally she puts herself to death by breathing the air of the poisonous tree!

* In any case we hold the composer also responsible for the Libretto; for he is not obliged to compose such an one, and it is only through him that it becomes alive.

"And now this 'hero' Vasco! As we learn, he has bought this slave because she wrote, and bought her not with gold alone, but he has given up his arms for her! A capital fast-sailer, without doubt, he is! In the latter part of the prison scene we learn that in a few hours Don Pedro is to set sail with a fleet all ready for the Cape; scarcely (in the third act) do we find ourselves with Don Pedro's ship in the vicinity of the Cape, when lo! already is our Vasco also there with a ship, which he had not been able to get from the King before, and now of course still less, since the King has sent out Don Pedro with a squadron! Is it not wonderful how Vasco, like a Deus ex machina, suddenly appears on board his terrible rival's ship, and actually alone, to give him some good nautical or geographical lessons—but, in return for the service, only to be sentenced by Don Pedro first to death, and then to imprisonment? Wonderful magnanimity of a discoverer, to warn his enemy off from the way of danger, and put himself in danger, only to lose the goal about which he is so much better informed!—Nelusko, well acquainted with the country (although he had only been driven upon it years ago by a storm), and full of thirst for revenge, steers the ship northward upon cliffs and storm, and delivers it over to wild Indian hordes, who, it seems, must belong to Hindostan, since the 'Africaine' (!) is instantly recognized by them as their Queen!

"All these and many other not less senseless combinations were of course only invented in order to bring on in one dramatic work, if possible, the whole earth, with all that is thereon, and thereby excite the curiosity of the great multitude, and furnish opportunity for the invention likewise of the strangest and most artificially refined music possible. Only think: we have a grand Portuguese Council, with senators, inquisitors, &c.; we have a horrid dungeon near by, and then a ship upon the open sea in a tropical region; then tempest and wild troops of Indians, who storm the ship and cut down all (even to the men, although the opera has further need of them!); finally the stranding of the ship with a fearful crash, and it goes down in fire and water; then again we have Indian temples, processions, festivities, &c., and finally the aforesaid poisonous tree, of which one is not presumed to know precisely whether it really grows in Hindostan. What a pity that Don Pedro does not also make a side excursion into the Southern ice sea, what a splendid opportunity for exhibiting icebergs, battles with polar bears, seals, &c., is here omitted!

"We fear no contradiction as to the audacity and here and there the absurdity of the Libretto. But, it will be replied, one willingly puts up with it for the sake of the beautiful music, the interesting show-pieces, &c.; there are absurdities also in the Zauberflöte, nay things quite unintelligible: why shall not Meyerbeer be permitted that which is pardoned to Mozart?

"Now we might perhaps be in a state to take Scribe's text to L'Africaine with patience, if the music really were beautiful and significant. But he who can maintain this shows, that his musical taste must be truly of the most primitive sort. Some pretty things in it we will not deny, and indeed it would be more than singular if in an opera, at which a composer of Meyerbeer's various knowledge has labored for so many years, there should not here and there be found parts that sound agreeably in themselves, at any rate that can be called interesting or ingenious, nay that even bear traces of real momentary feeling. But of an opera that claims continuous attention for many hours we demand, especially when it bears so celebrated a name, not merely such isolated moments, but beauty, something characteristic everywhere, both in the whole and in the single portions. How it answers this requirement shall be shown in a second article"—which we also purpose to translate.

Concert Review.

HERMANN DAUM. This gentleman's two Soirées at Chickering's Hall claim rank among the better class of Chamber Concerts which the past season has afforded. The programmes have been choice, in some respects unique, the execution creditable, the spirit of the whole artistic, and the audience on both occasions numerous and appreciative. Mr. Daum, whom long periods of illness have hitherto put at disadvantage, has recovered lost ground by these well-studied efforts. The first Soirée occurred so far back as the 21st of March, at a time when the crowd of other matters forbade our making any detailed record of it. This was the programme:

- Trio in E flat, Op. 14, for Piano, clarinet and viola..... Mozart Andante, Minuetto, Rondo Allegro.
Messrs. Daum, Ryan and Meisel.
Der Wanderer..... Schubert
Miss Addie Ryan.
Sonata in C, Op. 2, No. 8..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio, Adagio, Scherzo, Finale, Allegro assai.
Hermann Daum.
Songs..... Robert Franz
a. Forth from the Depths of Sadness.
b. Forest Birds.
c. Darling is Here.
Miss Addie Ryan.
Quintet in E flat, Op. 44, for Piano, two Violins, Viola, Violoncello..... Schumann Allegro. In modo d'una Marcia, Scherzo, Allegro.
Messrs. Daum, Schultze, Meisel, Ryan and Fries.

At this late day we will not attempt any appreciation, further than to say, that the music was mostly well given, that that early Sonata of Beethoven was exceedingly well chosen, being one of the best; ditto of the Schumann Quintet, which it was a treat to hear at last once more; and that Miss RYAN sang the Franz songs with good spirit and expression, so that their charm was felt.

This week, on Tuesday evening, we had the second Soirée, with an equally rich selection:

- Trio in B flat, Op. 11, for Piano, Clarinet and Violoncello, Beethoven Allegro con brio, Adagio, Allegretto con Variazioni.
Messrs. Daum, Ryan and Wulf Fries.
Songs: a. Supplication..... Robert Franz
b. Now the Shades are falling.....
Miss Sarah W. Barton.
a. Transcription of Schubert's Sacred Song..... Liszt
b. Rondo, "Perpetuum mobile"..... C.M. von Weber Hermann Daum.
c. Good Night..... Robert Franz
d. Now say my little Birdie bright..... Robert Schumann
Miss Sarah W. Barton.
Septet in D minor, for Piano, Flute, Oboe, Horn, Viola, Violoncello and Contrabass..... Hummel
Messrs. Daum, Zoehler, Ribas, Hamann, Ryan, Fries and Stehn.

The Trio with Clarinet, by Beethoven, is in his earlier, Mozartish style, and just a counterpart to that which opened the first Soirée: but the variations show enough of the Beethoven individuality, being full of variety and charm, and the whole work is genial and agreeable. The players did it and themselves good justice. That Schubert transcription by Liszt was new to us, rich and deep in feeling, truly edifying; it seemed to us one of the most truthful and impressive of those "transcriptions" from the great song writer, which to our feeling ever will remain of more account than Liszt's ambitious larger works. Of course much of the charm was due to the manner in which it was played. Weber's lightly, swiftly whirling, never resting Rondo, to which he gave the fanciful title (in Latin) of "perpetual motion," exhibited the lightness of finger, the clean, facile, fluent execution of the pianist to good advantage. The piece is in the main a study for the fingers, but there is warmer coloring and some poetry in the latter part of it.

To judge from this first taste of Miss BARTON'S voice and singing, we should say that, with well directed and persistent culture, very good things are to be expected from her. She is very young, apparently, and of winning manner, natural and earnest. The voice, mezzo soprano, is rich and large throughout, warm, but a little thick and husky in the contralto region, but gloriously bright, clear and liquid in the higher tones. It was laudable to choose the little Franz songs; yet we hardly think the selection a wise one for the present. The rendering was somewhat crude and stiff, especially of the first one, "Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge," which runs too low for her best voice, and perhaps suffered also from timidity, which wore off afterwards. The selection from the Schumann songs was one of the least important,—simple as a school song.

The grand feature of the concert was of course Hummel's Septet, which we have so lately heard twice played by a younger artist. This only added to its interest, for it is a work that reveals new beauties, new splendors at each hearing. Mr. Daum had set for himself a great task, and he achieved it manfully and in the main with fair success. There was now and then some lameness in the Scherzo, but in the rest one missed but little of the accustomed power and charm. The work as a whole proved exceedingly enjoyable; the instruments went as well together (they have had practice now), as we could suppose possible without a conductor.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S CLUB of amateur singers have recently given a second brace of their delightful concerts, in Chickering's Hall, on Monday evenings, April 21st and 28th. These marked the close of their winter's faithful weekly practice, which is now suspended till the summer months are over, when the memory of such happy hours, crowned with beautiful results, will be sure to bring them to the work again with more zeal and courage than ever.

The hall, both evenings, was crowded with invited guests, an audience of the best sort. The programme was the same both times; the voices about thirty in number, about equally divided between the four parts, admirably balanced, fresh, clear, telling, every one, and trained to rare precision, musical ensemble, light and shade.

Part I opened with the 115th Psalm, to Latin words, "Non nobis, Domine," by Mendelssohn, new to us, and highly interesting, consisting of 1. Chorus; 2. Duet and chorus; 3. Bass solo; 4. Chorus. The Duet, for soprano and tenor, brought two excellent voices in play and was given in good style. The Bass solo by Mr. POWERS, was not only large and musical in tone, but refined, expressive and artistic to a degree that we have not lately heard in a bass singer. A Benedictus and an Agnus Dei, both from Hummel's B-flat Mass, were exquisite to listen to so rendered. Mrs. J. S. CARY sang a song by Franz: "Auf dem Meer," and another by Mr. Parker: "The Angel's Call," with that rich, sweet voice of hers, and a chaste fervor, that carried both songs, beautiful in themselves, to the hearts of the listener.—Mendelssohn's Ave Maria, another novelty, for tenor solo and chorus, was greatly enjoyed, and showed another amateur tenor in a very favorable light.

Part II began with a couple of part songs: a soft, poetic, dreamy one by Gade ("The Water-Lily"), and the inspiring "Hunting-Song" by Mendelssohn; both of which, especially the latter, were about as perfect specimens of part-singing as we remember to have heard. The "Hunting Song" always has to be repeated when this Club sing it. The Quartet ("Mir ist so wunderbar" from "Fidelio," though it so needs the orchestra, was made very effective. Then came two more capital part-songs: Mr. Parker's "West Wind" and Mendelssohn's "Lark" song. And now we must speak of the exquisite singing (for we so seldom have an opportunity) of Boston's best soprano, Mrs. HANWOOD,—so refined and thoroughly artistic, so natural and fresh, so true to the expression of every mood of song, whether in the larger style of the "Non nobis" duet, or the Fidelio quartet, or in the songs of Schumann and of Franz, of which she gave us this time charming specimens. Her tones vibrate as purely and freshly as ever, and power and delicacy are equally at her command. Schumann's "Der Nussbaum" was breathed out in keeping with the airy, soft accompaniment. But never have we heard the Franz tune to the little song of Goethe: "Zwischen Hecken und Dorn," &c., sung so nicely, so happily conveying all its Ariel-like delicate grace and humor. It requires a poetic instinct, as well as voice and culture, to do these little things.

One only regretted not to hear the same voice further in the solo part of Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Triumph," which is jubilant and cheering, if it is somewhat common, in the opening and closing motive: "Strike the cymbal," &c., but sublimely graphic and imaginative in the middle portions suggestive of the crossing of the Red Sea. It was the most important selection of the evening, and made each time a deep impression, the soprano solo being very creditably rendered by a young lady amateur.

ERNST PERABO'S MATINEE, on Wednesday afternoon, May 2, at Chickering's, was fully attended and confirmed the good impression already made by the remarkable young pianist. He began with the great B-flat Trio of Beethoven, which he played with rare power, brilliancy and clearness, yet with less poetic fire or fineness than we think him capable of. Mr. AUG. SUCK and Mr. WULF FRIES played the violin and cello parts. The second piece was a Partita in B flat, by Bach, consisting of six short movements: Prelude, Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, Minuet and Gigue. This was charmingly played by Perabo, especially the Gigue, showing the old fashioned forms and phrases to be full of poetry and sunshine.

He repeated the E-flat Sonata (op. 27,) of Beethoven, admirably in some respects, but convincing us more clearly of faults of conception which we did not trust ourselves to speak of before. The opening Andante moved too fast to have its full expression. To be sure there was some motive for quickening the tempo in the fact that a single leading phrase returns so many times; but the only relief for that must be in giving it more expression, not in hurrying, which only makes it seem long. The one page of Adagio, too, which preludes to the Finale, suffered in the same way; but that brilliant and delicious Rondo, possibly a shade too quick, was finely rendered.

The Barcarole by Richter, a pensive, dreamy minor strain, much in the vein of Mendelssohn's Gondola songs, and the Allegro Grazioso by Bennett, were greatly relished. Hummel's Septet there was of course a great desire to hear again, after the enthusiasm he had created with it in the Music Hall. He had the same assistants with the exception of Mr. SUCK in place of Zöhrer on the violin; Mr. ZERRAHN conducted; and the charm of the whole thing was only less (in the nature of the case) than that of the fresh surprise when he played it first, amid all the inspiring circumstances of that last Symphony Concert.

The interest in Mr. Perabo increases with every hearing, and by the solicitation of many friends he was induced to give another Matinée last Wednesday before leaving Boston. This, with a string of other concerts, we must leave for future mention.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY close their Fiftieth Season to-morrow night with a grand performance, by the Festival chorus of 600 voices and an orchestra of 60, of Nicolai's Religious Overture with Luther's Chorale, Mendelssohn's Cantata: "As the hart pants," and the "Hymn of Praise." A glorious programme. The leading soloists are Miss HOUSTON, Miss SARAH W. BARTON and Mr. HAZLEWOOD (tenor).

Mr. PECK'S concert, next Saturday evening, the 19th, must not be forgotten. He announces Miss KELLOGG, as his prime attraction; also Mrs. SMITH, Miss ANNIE CARY and Dr. GUILLMETTE, as vocalists. ERNST PERABO will play a grand Pianoforte Sonata by Schubert, a rare novelty, and a piece for two pianos with Mr. B. J. LANG, who will also play a solo.

PHILADELPHIA. The tenth and last of Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN'S Beethoven Matinees occurred on the 1st of May, when this excellent pianist finished the task which he had set himself by playing, much to the great satisfaction of his audience, the Sonata in F, op. 10, No. 2; that in E flat, op. 81, entitled "Les Adieux, L'Absence et le Retour;" and the most difficult and largest of them all, the op. 106, in B flat major.

The Complimentary Concert for the presentation of the Carl Wolfsohn testimonial (consisting of the elegant and complete Leipzig edition of the works of Beethoven) was fixed for last Saturday evening, at the Musical Fund Hall. It was to be an orchestral concert, Mr. Theodore Thomas, of New York, conducting. The programme wholly of Beethoven, including: Overture to "Egmont"; the great E flat Concerto (Mr. Wolfsohn and orchestra); the "Kreutzer" Sonata (Messrs. Thomas and Wolfsohn); and the second Symphony (in D).

The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing "The Seasons," intending to produce it at the Academy of Music on the 15th inst. The soloists will be Miss Caroline Richings, Mr. George Simpson and Mr. J. R. Thomas.

The Germania Orchestra still continue their Saturday afternoon public Rehearsals. Mr. JARVIS, one of the best pianists of the country, has added to their interest lately by playing two Concertos: one by Hummel, in B minor, and one by Mendelssohn in D minor. The last Germania programme was as follows:

Overture—Le Roi d'Yvetot..... Adam
Eulogy of Tears..... Schubert
Thoughts on the Alps—Waltz..... Strauss
Allegretto from Seventh Symphony..... Beethoven
Overture—Fair Melusina..... Mendelssohn
Quartet from Rigoletto..... Verdi
Rondo and Finale from Don Pasquale..... Donizetti

OPERA. Grover's German Company have left New York and gone to Pittsburg, Pa. They have given Gotham some of the best things, for instance, "Fidelio," "Magic Flute," "William Tell," and "The White Lady." Mr. Grau's Italian troupe was to succeed Grover's in New York, but has been detained in Havana. Boston gets no German opera this season—no "William Tell," nor "Die Entführung," nor "Waserträger," as we had been hoping, and this is verily a disappointment.

NEW YORK. The six soirées of classical chamber music of Messrs. MASON, THOMAS, MOSENTHAL, MATZKA and BERGNER, are over. Here are the last two programmes.

Sixth Soirée. Quartet in C, No. 6, Mozart; Quartet, Piano, in E flat, op. 47, Schumann; Quartet in F, op. 135, Beethoven, (which Watson's "American Art Journal" calls "a dreary, unintelligible composition," giving "painful evidence of an unbalanced mind," &c., &c.) On the other hand, the Weekly Review says: "The last mentioned quartet was the last Beethoven wrote, and may be considered the one of all the celebrated quartets of this composer, which is more easily understood and appreciated than the others." Thus do the critics, who shy stones at us sometimes, devour each other! As for their opinions, are they not equally "interesting and valuable"?

Sixth Soirée. Quartet, for strings, in F, op. 41, No. 2, Schumann; Trio, with Piano, in B flat, op. 99, Schubert; Quartet in E flat, op. 127, Beethoven.

Mr. THOMAS'S last orchestral concert is announced for the 14th, when he will bring out the entire "Egmont" music; and the young pianist, Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, of Boston, will make his first public appearance since his return from Germany; he will play Henselt's Concerto, than which a more difficult piano-forte composition hardly exists. We have heard him play it in private and can promise our New York friends some remarkable pianism.

WORCESTER, MASS. The organist, Mr. EUGENE THAYER, having returned from his tour among the famous organs of Europe, gave a concert in this, his native town, on the 24th ult. "Stella," in the Palladium, describes it:

His programme included three selections from Bach, the G minor Fugue, and a Choral Vorspiel and Pastorale—the two latter new to us, extremely interesting, and well played withal. The difficulties of the Chromatic Fantasia, by Thiele, we could not appreciate, nor its meaning fathom. The effect of the Fugue was seriously marred by the pantomimic performance of "homeward bound," which a part of the audience are prone to forget should take place before rather than during the concluding piece. The "Lake," composed by Dr. Spark of Leeds, was a smooth and somewhat pleasing composition, but not one that would find a niche in the heart of the listener. The "Sonata in C major," composed by Mr. Thayer, seems to us rather a fantasia than a sonata, the theme being "God save the King," with variations in three different movements. The concluding portion afforded the organist an opportunity to exhibit his pedal playing, which was, of course, encored. Mr. Thayer was ably assisted by Misses Houston and Cary, the fine voice and well-sung ballads of the latter meeting continual encores. Miss Houston's singing of Gaglielmi's "Gratias agimus tibi," was excellent. Her rendering of sacred music is artistic and soulful, so rare too, that we must wish she would leave simple ballad singing to the lesser warblers, however charmingly she may succeed in it. The two ladies sang "Quis es homo," finely, of course. Their contributions to the concert were most acceptable. Mr. B. D. Allen played the piano and organ accompaniments, and also some very original variations upon Pleyel's Hymn, the encore of which he answered with a pretty fantasia upon Anld Lang Syne.

Mr. Thayer's reception from his fellow townsmen was almost enthusiastic. That it was not wholly so, may be attributed to the fact that he has been unfortunate in his claqueurs, who seem to take advantage of his foreign tour to load him with testimonials and to trumpet his praises so loudly that every bulletin wore the air of a puff. Had he been aware of this wholesale puffing, he might well have cried, "Save me from my friends!" Sterling merit, especially the sensitive genius of a true artist, needs no such blazonry. Rather does it shrink from it, feeling that "To one who looks forward to what is left, the little done soon dwindles into naught."

The Beethoven Society gave a May Day concert, in Mechanics' Hall, in aid of the Soldiers' Memorial Fund, consisting of choruses from "St. Paul" (which oratorio they have made their study the past season, miscellaneous songs, quartets, organ and piano pieces, by Mr. B. D. Allen and others, Mr. Sumner conducting.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—Mr. HENRY APPY, the eminent conductor of Maretzek's Opera Company at the Academy of Music in New York, will shortly take up his residence in Rochester and pursue his profession in connection with the Rochester Academy of Music. Mr. Appy is by birth a Hollander. At the age of eighteen he was appointed violinist to William II., King of Holland, and by him created Knight of the Order of the Lion. He came to this country as violinist of Jenny Lind's concert troupe, and has ever since remained here.

A well-known basso, in London, advertises that he has written and will sing a song entitled "Here's a health to gen'rous Peabody." "Poor Peabody! (says the Orchestra). It is enough to prevent anybody from being generous for the next century."

A CONVENIENCE FOR MUSICIANS.—An advertisement in Gotha offers for sale the right to manufacture a new apparatus for turning over, backward or forward, the leaves of music books by a movement of the foot.

A FEMALE TENOR. A new phenomenon is reported in Paris. Mlle. Mela comes from Milan, is eighteen or nineteen years of age, and is the daughter of a composer not unfavorably known to the Italian northern capital. She has astonished her own natives at Milan, and is now about to do the same for the natives at Paris. Her voice is a pure tenor, and she can imitate Mario marvellously well.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- You must guess. Song. A. Reichardt. 50
Emphatically a good song, both in words and music. In a style medium between the German and the English songs, and of medium difficulty also.
- Annie of the lonely dale. Ballad. W. Küttredge. 20
It was a song of other days. Song. E. L. Ilime. 30
Two capital songs. Excellent both in words and music.
- Can there be harm in kissing? Ballad. Crosby. 30
No harm in general, but the inquiry furnishes an introduction to a very taking song.
- The Union Wagon. Song and Cho. Hutchinson. 30
A very clever story about the Old Union Wagon and its driver. Spirited music.
- The dear little flowers, if they knew it. (Und wüsstens' die Blumen, die Kleinen). Op. 48. R. Schumann. 35
A charming composition, to which one becomes strangely attached, after playing it through a few times.
- Ever thine. Song. Franz Abt. 40
A first-class song in every way.
- Dear Father, drink no more. C. W. Akerman. 30
A touching temperance ballad, with good music.
- Mother is going home. Song. W. F. Walker. 30
Excellent in sentiment, and good melody.
- Lambillotte's Christmas hymn. Latin words. 75
Very beautiful throughout.
- Try again. Song. H. Russell. 35
No rose without a thorn. Ballad. W. Guernsey. 30
As pants the hart. Solo, duet, & Cho. M. G. Disbee. 30
Paddle your own canoe. H. Coston. 30
Bring forth the bride. J. G. Barnett. 40
Castles in the air. For Guitar. Haydn. 30
I'll weep no more for mother dear. Everest. 30
Mina, or, sweet woodland vale. " 30
Our neutral friend. Comic. J. V. Webster. 30
Cradle song. G. W. Hertel. 30
Not all forgot. C. Loet. 30
Magnificat. (Salute). Lambillotte. 75
Praise the Lord. (Benedic anima mea). Marsh. 50
The Finnegans, or Down to Eastport. F. Wilder. 30
She was our darling sister. W. W. Vounce. 30
A long list, which it is a great pity not to be able to notice, as there is a great deal of fine music in it.

Instrumental.

- Nocturne. Fred. Chopin. Op. 32. No. 1. 35
Kathleen Aroon. Transcribed. B. Richards. 40
A smooth and agreeable transcription of a favorite song.
- Hunting Song. F. Spindler. Op. 123. 30
Has Spindler's characteristic elegance of construction.
- I would not live away. (Crown Jewels). A. Baumbach. 40
A chaste and pleasing arrangement of a favorite sacred air.
- Barcarolle d'Oberon. C. Foss. Op. 134. 60
A very elegant piece, and among the best for learners who are a little advanced in their studies. About as difficult as the "Maiden's Prayer."
- Running brook. Schottisch. T. Bricher. 30
Dow-drop. Schottische. W. Seabach. 20
Six popular dances for Guitar. W. L. Haydn. 30
La Colorie Blanche galop. C. R. Dodworth. 40
Glasgow quadrilles. W. Guernsey. 50
Five novelties, which those who wish to keep up to the times should buy while they are new.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

VOL. XXVI. No. 5.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven's "Sonate Pastorale," Op. 28.

In the analyses of the Beethoven Sonatas, presented at various times to the readers of Dwight's Journal over the signature below, the writings of A. B. Marx and Ernst von Elterlein have been repeatedly quoted and will be quoted again in the attempt at a characterization of the Sonata which forms the title of the present article. It may not be generally known who these men are, and what importance may be attached to their opinions. The following remarks, therefore, will not appear superfluous.

A. B. MARX has for thirty-six years held the position of Professor of Music at the university of Berlin, Prussia. Of his many great merits only one shall be mentioned, because, in the present instance, it concerns us most, namely: his admiration and enthusiasm for Beethoven, and his unremitting efforts to open the eyes of sceptics to the wonderful powers of the tone-poet, especially at a time when he was still looked upon by a large and influential class as the odd, incomprehensible genius. Beethoven has personally acknowledged this in an autograph letter to the Berlin Professor. In his conceptions regarding the fundamental idea of some of our master's works, Marx, of late, differs strangely from the rest of the musical critics. In the first movement of the Heroic Symphony, for instance, he perceives the picture of a regular battle; he hears the hostile armies approaching each other, the musicians in front playing martial airs, till the affair becomes a hand-to-hand fight; and so forth. The views of a man of such large experience and indefatigable industry in the higher branches of the science of music, odd as they may seem, deserve respect, because significant.

ERNST VON ELTERLEIN (a nom de plume for Ernst Gottschald) is known as the author of a little volume on Beethoven's Symphonies, and of another on the Sonatas, besides being formerly a regular contributor to the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. In his æsthetical views he is a disciple of the Art-philosopher Vischer, to whom the first-named work is gratefully inscribed. This little book on Beethoven's Sonatas made quite a sensation when it first appeared, so that in a short time a second edition (1857) became necessary. The book has also been freely sold and circulated in the United States, and is doubtless in the hands of some of my readers. Elterlein, in his estimation of the Sonatas, leans too much towards what is called the New German School. Though his admiration for our tone-poet is as great as any man's, he continually uses expressions like these: "Beethoven here walks entirely in the footsteps of Haydn and Mozart;" "Beethoven here is still full of the influences of Haydn and Mozart;" "this piece is a true Mozartian;" "this Sonata rests decidedly on a Mozart basis," &c. In short, wherever he does not find dramatic life, or "programme-music," he beholds the spirits of Haydn and Mozart. Such doctrines tend to fill the mind of the frank, enthusiastic admirer of Beethoven's music, not able to judge for himself, with suspicion, and thus diminish his pleasure; although from the ability with which the book is written, it might be inferred, its author knew as well as all of us, that Haydn and Mozart never could possibly have written, for instance, the first three Sonatas, published by Beethoven as op. 2; that these works already evince an immense progress when compared with the Sonatas of those older masters; that they plainly show us the eagle moving his wings for a flight heavenward. On the other hand, Elterlein deserves thanks for unflinchingly exposing those places where the great composer suffered the glorious flight of his imagination to be impeded by tradition or the conventional spirit of his time; much to the provocation of the fanatics, who stand always ready to reward such labors with the cry of "Stone him!"

Elterlein subjects all the thirty-two Sonatas to a brief review, in regular order, while Marx* selects but this or that one. Elterlein frequently quotes Marx to strengthen his arguments; the same does Marx with Elterlein, at least for once. They generally agree, but sometimes disagree totally, as will presently be seen again.

The Sonata in D-major, op. 28, is entitled in many editions, "Sonate pastorale," and as such known to the musical world. Says A. B. Marx:

"Some poetical 'Professor' of the pianoforte, or bookseller, in recent times has hooked on to it the name of Sonate pastorale. To complete the joke they might have christened the Seventh Symphony also Symphonie pastorale, after the Sixth, the real Symphonie pastorale, named so by the composer himself, had been created. And, indeed, this has been done; the Allegretto they call the marriage ceremonies of a couple from the rural districts, and in the Scherzo the farmers stamp about in a merry dance. However, Beethoven was no Gessner† in all his works, which rightfully bear that name, there is not to be found a single repetition of an original idea. Now, the D-major Sonata—in all its quietness and simplicity, of a tenor so high-minded that for this alone, if for no other reason, the above nickname becomes ridiculous—presents in the first movement‡ the picture of a noble, manly, earnest character, truly sublime and amiable through his condescension and tenderness. He may, musingly, forget himself (2d subject), may grow warm, nay, forcibly and obstinately maintain his will; but only in order (towards the close of the first part) soon to return kindly into his quiet, contemplative mood." The rest anon.

Elterlein, on the other hand, says:

"The epithet 'pastorale' strikingly denotes the general character of the work. The whole Sonata is a prelude to, a presentiment of the Symphonie pastorale. The same idea is vividly embodied in it," etc.

* In his Biography of Beethoven.

† A German poet, known especially for his numerous pastoral poems.

‡ It may be remarked here, in advance, that Marx leaves the other three movements to themselves.

In short, Elterlein's description of the work, from beginning to end, is based on that nickname, as Marx calls it, and with such confidence that it appears he took it for granted the name originated with Beethoven himself. "When doctors disagree," &c., &c.

Marx is doubtless right when he asserts that Beethoven had nothing to do with the name. The character of the composer sustains this assertion; for it may be boldly pronounced, a man, who believes that Beethoven in this work intended to give to the world a "Sonate pastorale," does not comprehend his genius in its entire magnitude. Had the master really purposed such a Sonata, we should have had a composition altogether different. It may also be maintained that the composer had nothing to do with the title of "Grande Sonate" as it is called in other editions. The piece appears much more charming, beautiful, than grand.

Again, the surname "pastorale" was not contained in the original edition, published under Beethoven's own supervision. This may be easily inferred, from the fact that it is not to be found in some of the best editions now current. However, a name so popular, and used by sensible persons through so many years, must have some meaning in it. Comparisons are sometimes odious; so we will not compare the Sonata to its celebrated namesake, the Symphony. But, let us remember that Beethoven, like a true bard, loved nature as much as his art. It is pardonable to suppose he liked to sing of rural scenes and rural pleasures more than once. Indeed, most of his compositions work that inexpressible charm on the mind, which one only experiences when reposing on the bosom of nature. He may not have intended to produce a pastoral Sonata in this piece, yet it is susceptible of being so interpreted. And is the opinion of a man like Marx, taken for nothing when he denounces such an attempt? As observed before, the opinions of the Nestor of musical writers and critics deserve respect, and for this reason he has been quoted at length, and shall be so still more; the reader may then follow which way his own taste and judgment lead him. Marx agrees, however, with Elterlein, as well as with others, on the main point; he, too, perceives a picture reflected from the pages of this Sonata, though a different one; and he, too, bears witness to the matchless beauty of the work. The language of music is mysterious, capable of being interpreted in different ways, and this is perhaps one of its greatest charms. But, a composition to deserve the title of a tone-poem must suggest something decided; it must have marked features, character, which every one may explain according to the impression received; unless the composer himself undertakes to guide our thoughts by superscriptions, as Beethoven, for example, has done in his Symphonie Pastorale.

Those of my readers who are not yet tired by the preceding introductory discourse, are now invited to a stroll over the cheerful, sunny ground of this Sonata.

Was it chance or purpose that Beethoven dedicated this piece to M. de Sonnenfels? Sonnenfels—a sunny name, indeed! How fit that a “rock of the sun” should be chosen as the protector of a tone-creation, which so clearly reflects blue sky and sunshine! But let us proceed.

First movement, Allegro:—We are walking on a beautiful day in May, such a day as we may not enjoy in our climate, but which Beethoven enjoyed in the romantic suburbs of Vienna. All around us is fresh, gentle, sweet, cheerful; the chest expands, the heart swells with new longings and aspirations as

“The crystal waters round us flow,
The merry birds are lovers a’,
The scented breezes round us blow.”

But, it is a holiday, a day consecrated to some festive occasion, because everything appears at the same time so solemn, so subdued, that one is almost afraid of a loud word; while far away in the village church people are assembled for divine worship; and through all this solemn stillness, that mysterious rustling and rushing (measure 77), so suggestive of the powers at work everywhere when “rosy May comes in wi’ flowers,” only broken now and then as a bird rises before us, high up into the blue ether, repeating his wild, irregular call, over and over again (m. 104, and later more frequently, especially in the third part)! The scene grows more joyous as we advance. Poets have said that “on song’s bright pinions” one might be carried away to any distant region. So we may here fancy ourselves soaring along over sunny fields and meadows, on the wings of that bright, gay melody (m. 28, before the close of the first part); but not too far, for already in the distance the sky becomes overcast; the rays of the sun, which before fell so warm on our faces, appear pale and cold (m. 15, second part); a thunderstorm is upon us. The fight of the elements is violent (m. 21, and all through the fugato); but the confusion soon gives way to a struggle more uniform, yet obstinate, as though it would never end (beginning m. 45). At length it gradually subsides; the agitated bosom of nature, after heaving twice or thrice from its very depths (shortly before the first fermata), is at rest again; and how glad we are of it! We feel again as if we should fly along, merry as a bird (melody after the first fermata). Alas! have we not just learned, how quickly a gloom may be cast over the loveliest scene? It suits us better to entertain thoughts more serious (melody after the 2nd fermata); even pause a moment for solemn reflection (Adagio). Now we may continue our ramble and delight in the glorious scenery around us, as before. We hear the same melodies again, the same rustling and rushing, the same warbling of birds; but all appears refreshed and more charming; all before us is serene, happy, frolicsome, unto the end.

Second movement; Andante:—The impression made by this movement is more vague, its tints are paler, its features more common than those of the preceding movement. Still, with a slight extra strain on the imagination, we may be able to continue our picture once commenced, without (perhaps) incurring the risk of growing tedious. Let us fancy, then, we come, during our walk upon this lovely day, across some cool, shady spot, which, while it affords us shelter from the noonsun, invites us to rest and meditation. Our thoughts naturally recur to the past; unawares, the remembrance of some unfortunate event in early life takes possession of the mind.

“Something it is, which thou hast lost,
Some pleasure from thine early years.”

which gnaws like a worm at thy heart (1st half of the 2d part); but, let the past rest; the sun is shining so gloriously down from the blue sky, the happiness of the creatures all around us is so perfect, that we may well draw consolation from the spectacle (the two parts in D-major). Still, the mind continues to be haunted by the same sad vision; it cannot leave off brooding; it turns the unwelcome subject over and over again (the re-appearance of the D-minor, etc.); even that, from which before it drew comfort and relief, appears now in the same sad colors, and rather excites than allays grief (measure 11 before the close). Then let it be so; if thou canst not destroy the gnawing worm, deceive him; retain, cherish thy regret; but purify it, till it becomes an April violet, and buds and blossoms like the rest.”

(Conclusion next time).

A Freak on the Violin.

Subsequent to Tubal Cain’s inventions; harp and organ,—the fiddle, or lyre played on with a bow, takes rank by reason of its antiquity. Its place and importance in the world of Music are of the first interest. The difficulty of handling it, which is extreme, implies the rarest delicacies of ear and of touch,—the latter not to be attained to by strenuous good will; supposing apt physical organization denied. “A hand!” on the piano-forte is not a more peculiar possession than “a bow arm.” On the precision of finger-positions does purity of tone depend. The human voice has little more expressive power,—even with the advantage of verbal declamation to help it,—than the Violin. Lastly, the instrument when mute has characteristics which give it a place of its own. Whereas every other one of its comrades is worned, the fiddle is bettered by age and use. A violin has been sold, in our time, for one hundred and forty times the money paid for it when it came from the hands of its maker. A story is told by Messrs. Sandys and Forster, in their History of the Violin, that for an instrument by Steiner the Tyrolean (who came after the great Cremonese and Brescian makers) fifteen hundred acres of American land were ceded, at a dollar an acre, on which the thriving city of Pittsburg now stands. There is nothing analogous to this in the vicissitudes of price which “the marked catalogue” of sold statues and pictures registers.

The above being all so many indisputable facts, no one need wonder that a body of tradition and anecdote has gathered round the violin family, the same comprising four members: besides itself, viola, violoncello and double bass, rich and various in quality. A delightful and amusing book might be written on the subject for the delectation of those “who have music in their souls”; and, since it is unfashionable to confess to contrary organization in these our times of changes and progress, when Music has become a pleasure, which, like the Plague of Egypt, pervades our kings’ chambers and our workmen’s houses,—a freak on or about the violin family, their makers, their players, and the music prepared for the same, may not be altogether untimely. A compendious and well executed little book*—one of the best, as well as most unpretending, books of its kind that I know of—has reminded me of a few old tales and truths, and encouraged me to string together a few of these in a desultory fashion.

How many centuries have passed since the world was first edified by the sounds of a fiddle is a question for the Dryadusts;—not to be dismissed lightly here. Old painters—how far inspired by tradition or not, who shall say?—have put it into the hands of Apollo on the hill of Parnassus; and, following their example, the other day, Mr. Leighton, in his Picture of Music, put it into the hands of Orpheus as the magical instrument by which Eurydice was given back to life. Certain it is that, about the eleventh or twelfth centuries, the violin had taken its present form. And many antiquarians, the diligent and erudite Mr. William Chappell among the number, are satisfied that this form was of northern rather than southern origin. The Welsh, those dear lovers of pedigrees, and who have asserted (it has been humorously said) that the primal language spoken by Adam and Eve was theirs, have laid claim to it. One of the lozenges in the quaint painted roof of Peterborough cathedral, showing a bare-legged man dancing to his kit (date the twelfth century), has a curiously modern air, so far as the shape of the instrument is concerned; but it was not perfected till the sixteenth century, when Amati of Cremona, and Di Salo of Brescia, gave models which have been slightly varied; but which such notable artificers as Stradivarius, Guarnerius, Steiner, and others never unmade, nor, indeed, have essentially changed. Since their day, no improvements have been effected, save in the making of the bow,—a condition of things without parallel in the fabrication of musical instruments,—which has been universally a story of discovery and progress. Think of a Broadwood, or an Erard Concert Grand Piano-forte, as compared with the meek and weak little clarichord, which sufficed to Sebastian Bach; think how the powers of King David’s instrument, the harp, have been extended by pedals and “double-action” since the days of the hurds, nay, and even of such modern celebrities as Krumpholtz, and Madame de Genlis, and Madame Spohr the first. Think of what has happened to the “German Flute” since Frederick the Great bored his court of wits and philosophers, and the ears of his patient concert-master, Herr Quanz, by playing his three nightly concertos. Think how all the mechanical appliances of the Organ, as the lightening of touch, and the easier combinations of register, have been improved during the past century and a half, since Christian Müller, the maker of the Haarlem organ, Gabelaar, and Silbermann, and Father Schmidt built their instruments, still magnificent in respect of their sonority, but comparatively rude in structure. No fate of the kind has befallen the violin. The best workmen are those who best imitate the men who wrought three hundred years ago. In its form, in proportion, in the addition to its means, no improvement has been made; and less so in some points of decoration which assist in the preservation of the instrument. The secret of the old varnishes, which are as essential to the well-being of a violin, as is manipulated clay of delicate quality to the texture of china, seems, if we are to believe common testimony, irrecoverably lost.

Few who see that simple-looking toy, out of which such admirable music is drawn, have an idea of its delicate complexity of structure. A well-made violin contains more than fifty different pieces of woods, the woods being three: maple, red deal, and ebony. The wood must be thoroughly seasoned, especially the red deal; and the only artist of modern times who is said to counterfeit the works of the great Italian makers, M. Vuillaume, of Paris, has done so mainly by a most careful selection of materials. Many a roof and panel from Swiss chalets have found their way into his workshop. Be the grain ever so good, the material must have undergone the slow action of time. Some have thought to supersede this by the use of acids and by artificial heat. But these expedients, I am assured, have only a short-lived success. The violins thus forced deteriorate steadily; whereas the good instruments become more mellow and precious in sound year by year. It seems agreed that the amount of sonority in the violin partly depends on the flatness or otherwise of its form. How it should be that no change of any importance has been made since the days of Di Salo and Amati, presents, I repeat, one of the most singular anomalies in that history of anomalies the lovely art of Music. But the violin is nothing without its bow; and the perfected bow is an invention dating nearly two centuries later than the perfection of the instrument which it “bids to discourse.” Here is a second anomaly.

A third is, that the instrument was brought to perfection before any music was produced worth performing on it (as we understand matters). Corelli and Scarlatti were not writing when Amati, and Stradivarius and Guarnerius were producing their masterpieces, which sufficed to the Paganinis of modern times for the execution of their stupendous feats of volubility and brilliancy. In truth, till the beginning of the last century, the music written for the violin was mere child’s play,—the works of one wonderful man excepted,—John Sebastian Bach. This great genius, who divined so much, and the value of whose experiments to the world of musical poets has only come to be appreciated within a comparatively recent period, can have encountered no one, I suspect, in the least able to present on the violin his difficult and recondite fancies. His Sonatas, Chaconnes, Variations, as good as buried till Mendelssohn disinterred them, tax a player to the amount which few players, save of the calibre of a Spohr, a Joachim, and a Molière, can afford to be taxed. Perhaps, as a body, the French violinists, as represented by Leclair, inheriting Italian traditions from Lulli, were in advance of their contemporaries of other countries,—but so loose is all record of Music at that period, that nothing beyond conjecture is possible.

I have tried, in the above, to touch on a few of the leading points and peculiarities of the leading instrument of the orchestra,—the most singular representative of conservative and progressive life in combination that the story of Music, that most capricious among the arts, includes. It would be easy to swell these paragraphs to any extent, by offering characters of what may be called the representative men of the violin, such as Farini, Geminiani, Rode, Viotti, Lafont; but these can be found by any reader who ransacks the dictionaries; so that I shall content myself with rummaging my own peculiar stores of recollection regarding some of the great players of this nineteenth century.

Of course, the first of these to be named is Paganini; but the man whom to name, so as to give any distinct record of the impression made on me by him, is most difficult. There are people of genius who rule by disturbing, not subjugating, the spirits of those who listen to them. One of these (to cite a parallel in music) was Malibran as compared with Pasta; another, the great Genoese violinist, who convulsed Europe by his triumphs, as no instrumentalist (the Abbé Liszt not excepted) has done before or since his apparition.

One may well talk of "apparition" in Paganini's case; because the intense and eccentric personality of the man had its share in the attention his performances excited. A vampire in an orchestra is not an every-day sight; and never did man by dress and gesture make more of a ghostly aspect than did he; neither more obviously thereby invite the fabrication of the marvellous anecdotes which Fancy makes out of nothing, for Scandal to repeat. Paganini's real life has been miserable and disorderly enough to satisfy such foolish people as think mystery and error inevitable accompaniments of genius. It was a long fever-fit of gambling, and avarice, and self-indulgence, alternating with the exercise of most startling progress in art. With most hearers, owing to the exaggeration of his expression, to which his limitless execution enabled him to give the fullest scope, Paganini passed as being fuller of passion than any instrumentalist who ever appeared. Such is not my own impression. I never could rid myself when I heard him, though I was then inexperienced and liable to be carried away by what is astonishing, of a conviction of the player's eccentricity; which gave a false pathos to his slow movements, and a regulated caprice to his brilliant effects. His execution was limitless; his tone was thin, and chargeable with a certain abuse of trembling vibration, which, for a time, became tiresomely fashionable; but the tone was unimpeachable in purity.

His peculiar effects in execution, in staccato and pizzicato passages, in a command of the fourth string so complete as to enable him to turn the violin into a monochord—those glassy harmonic sounds (which, however, when used to excess satiate), are now understood not to have been invented by him, but by Durand or Duranowski, a miscreant belonging to the class of vagabond geniuses, wrecked by their wasteful profligacy, whose number, happily for the art, diminishes year by year. Spohr, in his Autobiography, declares that the harmonic effects had been also anticipated by the "once famous Scheller,"—another violinist of great talent and disordered life, who was possibly ruined by his connection with the unclean and profligate Count of Würtemberg, and who passed out of sight in want and misery. But though Scheller may have heard Duranowski, it is improbable that the Genoese artist ever crossed Scheller's path. The harmonic feat is not worth much.

It may be added, that from the time when he rose into notoriety Paganini took small pains to maintain his powers of execution by practice; never, it is said, taking his violin from its case betwixt exhibition and exhibition, and showing small general interest in music; the exception being the magnificent present volunteered by this miserly man to M. Berlioz, as the continuer of Beethoven, which has become a historical anecdote.

Paganini's playing of classical music was in no respect remarkable. His great concert-pieces composed for himself, though unequal, were excellent in point of grace, fancy, and opportunity for display. He was the original "Carnival of Venice"; and threw into the changes of that insignificant gondola-tune an amount of whim, contrast, and reckless gayety (costume, almost, one might say), impossible to forget. To sum up, whether his strength was that of health or fever, whether his taste was always unimpeachable or the reverse, whether he was more powerful to surprise than to move, or not, as an executive artist, whose genius left his impress on his generation, Paganini stands unparagoned. For a time, the influence was not a good one. Sham Paganinis appeared by the score, and made concert music hideous. One or two of these were meant by nature for better things. To give an example, the Norwegian virtuoso, M. Ole Bull, whose peculiarities amounted to a specimen of those close and ingenious parodies of a strange original, which perplex and cause regret in every honest observer. To have justified his choice of style, M. Ole Bull should have carried out Paganini's effects, as Paganini carried out Duranowski's. Only the feat was simply impossible.

At the antipodes to this magnificent curiosity of Genius working out its purposes, not without recourse to empiricism, stands in the modern history of the Violin a man whose notable talent almost rose to genius: and whose influence on his art was wider, healthier, and will probably prove longer-lived than that of his Italian contemporary, Louis Spohr. The impetus given by him to the school of German violin-playing cannot be over-estimated.

Of all the players to be mentioned in connection with the violin, Spohr takes the highest rank as a composer; in fact, he is the only great violinist who succeeded in opera, in sacred, in symphonic, in chamber, and in solo concert music; and this without any peculiarity in invention or brightness of fancy. Not a single theme by Spohr has become popular. It may not be without interest to speculate how far this may be referable to the character and physical organization of one of the most respectable, most self-engrossed, most stalwart, most diligent, and least engaging men who has figured in the annals of Music. He was a singular mixture of intelligence and bigoted loyalty to himself, as his Autobiography makes clear. He had something like universality of endowments, for, as a youth, he drew and painted portraits,—his own (which is significant), and those of the girls who fell in love with him,—and for a while could hardly decide by which of the sister arts he would make his fortune. Having decided, however, for Music, Spohr carried through his purposes in a truly characteristic manner. He stalked along through his life to the end of it, holding his head high, looking neither to the right nor the left; and, though honest, as remarkable for his self-esteem as for his probity. His presence was as striking as Paganini's, though in a style totally different. There was nothing of the charlatan about Spohr. He was of commanding stature, with features noble in form and serious in expression, well befitting the musician, not a bar of whose writings is chargeable with vulgarity, but whose aspect promised a refinement in the man which his social manners did not always fulfil; for to be refined is to be considerate of others, and this Spohr was not. Of all the instrumental players I recollect, he was the most stately to see, and one of the coldest to hear. Of all the mannered composers who ever wrote, (and Spohr was as mannered as the veriest Italian—to name but one, Signor Rossini, whose flimsy writings he so coolly analyzed), he was the least mannered in his playing. Not a point in it was overwrought, not a point was underfinished. "Propriety and tact," as the late George Robins said in one of his advertisements, "presided;" and there was in it such beauty as belongs to perfect order, perfect purity, perfect symmetry, perfect command over all the legitimate resources of his craft. It was a sincere, complete exhibition,—if there was ever such a thing,—but one which spoke to the head, not to the heart; to the conscience, and not to the affections. The "sacred fire" was not there. I think that if Spohr had been a thin little man, and without that Jupiter port of his, his playing might have been less successful in Germany, Italy, France, and England, than as in his Autobiography he fondly tells us it was.

But make what we will of Spohr, of his strange indifference, or else false appreciation of other comrades' works,—of his deficiency of fundamental knowledge, proved by his taking late in life to study counterpoint, when the task in hand was an Oratorio, there is no doubt that, as a German violinist and composer for the violin, he must always hold a first place. As a professor, he knew (not always a winning or flexible man) how to quicken the intelligence, and not so much to insure the respect as to gain the affection of his pupils. These could be named by some two score, were a contemporary catalogue the matter in hand; but two may be mentioned—the Brothers Holmes—if only because of the singular indifference of their and our native country to their great accomplishments. Rude as Spohr could be to his Cassel orchestra, calling them "swine" when they displeased him, his pupils, one and all, seem to have attached themselves to him without stint; and many an act of private forbearance and kindness, on his part, to those straitened in their means, is to be set against the impression above recorded.

Then as to written music for the violin, whereas Paganini's efforts and effects have died out, to be reproduced in a feeble and incomplete echo by his kinsman, Signor Sivori, the violin Concertos of Spohr will not soon be laid aside, owing to the perfect knowledge of the instrument they display, the sensible orchestral combinations they include, and the individuality of their manner; which, be it right or wrong, is Spohr's own, and his alone. Further, his violin duets are unsurpassed as combinations of melody, suave, if not new, with harmony pleasing and luscious, if something monotonous. The rage for Spohr's music has subsided everywhere; but his influence, and that of all he wrote for his special instrument, has not subsided; nor, I fancy, may altogether subside, and the devices and desires of Herr Wagner shall rule the world.

"Till music shall untune the sky."

One of the most delicious artists who ever took Violin in hand was De Beriot, some shortcomings in depth of feeling granted. He may be named as among the exceptions by which rules are proved. That certain qualities are "constant" (as the mathematicians say) in certain countries, I have been long convinced. The vivacious Irish, as a body of musicians, have a propensity to dragging and drawing. The English have small feeling for accent as compared with the French. There has not been one great French contralto singer. The Belgians in music are heavy rather than elegant, and are apt to substitute (as M. Vieuxtemps has shown us on the violin) elaborate pomposity for real feeling and grandeur. But De Beriot, the most elegant of violinists, was a Belgian, born at Louvain. If Paganini pairs off with Liszt, De Beriot does among pianists with Thalberg, and among singers with Madame Cinti-Damoreau. The three may be cited as irreproachable. Greater beauty of tone was never heard than theirs. Greater grace and polish without finality than theirs cannot be attained. Had more of emotion been added by nature, the excellence might have been less equitable. None of the three can be called cold; none of the three ventured one inch deeper than the point their powers enabled them to fathom. In Spohr's Autobiography he speaks grudgingly of De Beriot, (as he does of almost every violinist, save himself,) albeit De Beriot exercised a fascination by his playing which Spohr never commanded; more solid though Spohr's music is. And De Beriot's airs with variations, and Concertos (especially one with the rondo in the Russian style), live in recollection, though not heard for many a year, as distinctly as if they had been enjoyed but yesterday. The one man who might have challenged him on his own ground was Mayseder of Vienna (whose lovely and natural and becoming compositions must not pass without a word, when the Violin and its sayings and doings are the theme); but Mayseder was not a show,—otherwise a travelling player,—and never, I believe, quitted the Austrian capital, and the orchestra of the Kärntner Thor Theatre there. A solo I heard from him in a hackneyed ballet to accompany a dancer on a hot autumn evening to an empty house, was enough of itself to show his sweetness, graciousness, and thorough knowledge of the best uses of the violin.

I come now to speak of a violin player in whom something of the spirits of the North and of the South were combined,—the classical grandeur and repose of the one,—the impassioned abandonment of the other: who was, nevertheless, in no respect an eclectic artist; neither in whom, as in De Beriot's case, given qualities could be counted on with certainty,—a player who, in his best hours, in his best music, had power to move his public as none of the three professors of his instrument, mentioned before him, were able to do. This was Ernst; who appeared after the three great players commemorated, and who, in spite of one fatal defect, a tendency to false intonation, no more to be controlled than was the same fault in Pasta's singing, could assert himself as among the best of his order, and occasionally, as best among the best. I have never heard a man play worse than he did sometimes. I have never heard any man play so well as I have heard Ernst play; and this not in the form of showy displays, such as any glib or indefatigable person may bring himself to produce, but in the utterance of the intense, yet not over intense, expression with which he could interpret the greatest thoughts of the greatest poets in music. His leading of Beethoven's three Russian quartets (the Razumoffsky set) may be set beside Madame Viardot's restless presentment of Gluck's Orpheus, beside Pasta's "Son io," in Medea, beside the "Suivez moi" of Dnpres in Guillaume Tell. In all the four instances cited, the case was one of fervent genius,—so fervent as to make defects and disadvantages forgotten, but mastered by, not mastering, its possessor. Herr Ernst's tone on the violin had nothing of Spohr's immaculate purity, nothing of De Beriot's winning charm; but it was a tone that spoke, and that spoke, too, to the heart, and representing there the nature of as genial, and affectionate, and noble a man as ever drew breath, or a bow.

No matter a disadvantageous education,—no matter disadvantageous surroundings,—no matter a certain languor of physical temperament which made him too accessible to persuasion,—there was in Ernst nothing paltry, nothing jealous, nothing to be explained away, in any artistic transaction of his life. And this I hold (believing that every man's art will, more or less, express his nature) was to be heard and felt in Ernst's playing. There was sometimes in it majesty, sometimes an intimate expression by right of which he deserves to stand alone in the gallery of violinists. The same qualities are represented in his music; "the stars" having destined Ernst to be a great composer, had he been born, like Spohr, with untiring "threws and sinews," or had been as strictly trained as was Spohr. But he just produced in the way of composition what sufficed for his own needs and remarkable executive powers. One production of his, however, the first movement of a Concerto in C sharp minor, though overlaid with technical difficulties, is full of great thoughts carried out by adequate science. This fragment may well be the despair of smaller folk who attempt the violin. When Ernst played it (on his good days) there was no feeling of difficulty, either in the music or for the player. It should be recorded that Ernst's inequality, to which allusion has been made, in some measure limited his popularity. Those who think that the presence of mind and feeling borne out by great executive power, and a style thoroughly individual, do not still atone for occasional uncertainty, dwell on Ernst's imperfect intonation, and denied him merit.

No such question has been or can be raised against the reigning king of violinists, Herr Joachim, whose popularity is without one dissenting voice, and whose excellence as a player is without alloy. Avoiding, for the most part, what may be called trick music, and, till now, unsuccessful in his attempts to write that which shall satisfy a mixed audience, he has been driven, beyond any of the artists hitherto named, on the interpretation of other men's compositions. In this occupation he has been equalled by no predecessor. Whether the matter in hand be the wondrous inventions of Sebastian Bach,—ancient but not old, and, with all their formalities of former times, more romantic and suggestive than most of the ravings of the day, which are set forth as profound and transcendental poetry,—whether it be Beethoven's loftiest inspirations (such as the Adagio in his D major trio), or Spohr's Scena Drammatica, or Mendelssohn's lovely Concerto, this magnificent artist leaves nothing to be desired. With a purer taste than Paganini,—with more feeling than Spohr,—with more earnestness than, and almost as much elegance as, De Beriot,—with more certainty than Ernst, Herr Joachim presents a combination of the highest intellectual, poetical, and technical qualities. In the rendering of music he is without a peer.

I must name one more artist, never to be mentioned without respect when the Violin is in hand. Having illustrated by parallels, I may say that what Moscheles is as composer for the piano forte, Molique is for the Violin,—not always spontaneous, but always interesting by ingenuity and distinct individuality. The concert pieces of Molique will not grow antiquated. They are quaint and less cloying than Spohr's; perhaps less advantageous in displaying the executant, but demanding, in their final movements especially, a certain humor, clear of eccentricity, which gives them a great relish, and is totally un-borrowed. In Herr Molique's chamber music there is more labor and freedom, but everywhere traces of a sincere and thoughtful musician, which must interest those who value thorough workmanship of an intelligent head and hand. If it be added that many a charlatan without a tittle of Herr Molique's ideas, or a fiftieth part of his skill in treating the same, has amassed a fortune, whereas his long life, now drawing towards eventide, of honorable toil, extended usefulness, and the respect due to one without a taint, jealousy, littleness, or intrigue, has been ill recompensed, the purpose of such a revelation will be easily divined,—not to sadden those who love Art, but to cheer them by giving them a chance of cheering the latter days of one to whom every sincere student of the Violin and violin-music owes a debt.—All the Year Round.

BEETHOVEN'S FAMILY TROUBLES.—It is known what Beethoven had to suffer from his brothers' low marriages; but his own character shines forth in its moral dignity by the new facts which Herr Nohl has picked up, and by a number of hitherto unpublished letters to one of his brothers. These facts are, however, of so desolate a nature, that Herr Nohl only refers to them because they afford him an opportunity of saying a word of apology and exonerating Beethoven's much-blamed "nephew." The gifted boy was the only child of his parents: from his tender youth he was the witness of domestic quarrels arising out of the levity of his mother and the violent temper of his father. When the latter died, his celebrated uncle acted in the place of a parent, and in his elevated notions of duty and honor tried before all to separate him from his mother. She in her turn tried every means of stratagem and persuasion to chain the boy to her; she taught him to practise all sorts of falsehood, made him suspicious of his uncle and guardian, who, what between exaggerated love and exaggerated anger towards his nephew, certainly was not the man to lead him with a firm and gentle hand on the right path of life. It is well known, and but too true, what misery and trouble arose for Beethoven out of these family disputes; but not the less to be pitied was the child, who, between the over-strict zeal of duty on one side, and the utmost indulgence on the other, was thrown like a ball to and fro, and deviated so much from the straight line of conduct which alone leads to a blameless and happy life, that when a youth, for but a trifling reason, he attempted suicide to make an end at once of the conflict and contradiction of his life. But that his heart was sound at the core, though led astray, is proved not only by the excellent school testimonies, which Herr Nohl examined himself, but by the fact that, when left to himself after the death of his uncle, with the instinct of a well-organized nature, he took to an orderly and active life, married an excellent wife, at Iglau, and became the founder of a respectable family. His five children have become in their turn heads of families, and if they do not share the fame of the great composer, at least they have no part in the odium clinging to his brothers, but enjoy a respectability which will secure to the name of Beethoven, in the circles of Vienna middle class life, respect and esteem. The youngest daughter of the ci devant "nephew," Hermine von Beethoven, thirteen years old, shows much talent, and has just been received as pupil in the Conservatory at Vienna, where she is to perfect herself as a pianiste under the direction of Professor Dachs.—London Athenæum.

SCHUMANN ON SCHUBERT.—There was a time when I was unwilling to talk about Schubert, and only dared to mention him at night to the trees and stars. Who is there that has not had his time of enthusiasm? Carried away by this new genius, whose resources seem to be boundless and measureless, and deaf to everything that could tell against him, I knew nothing except through his medium. But as we grow older, and our demands increase, the number of our favorites becomes smaller and smaller. And this change proceeds as much from ourselves as from them. What composer is there of whom one retains the very same opinion through the whole of one's life? To appreciate Bach requires an amount of experience which it is not possible to possess in youth. Even Mozart's radiant glory is then too lightly esteemed; while to comprehend Beethoven, mere musical studies are not sufficient, for he inspires us more at certain times with one work than with another. But it is certain that similar periods of life always have a mutual attraction; youthful inspiration will be appreciated by youth, and the force of the matured master by the grown man. Schubert will thus always be the delight of the young. His heart, like theirs, is always overflowing; his thoughts are bold, his execution rapid; he is full of the romantic legends of knights, ladies, and adventures, of which youth are so fond; nor is he without wit and humor, though not enough to disturb the tender sentiment at the base of his whole nature. Thus he excites the imagination of the player as no one else but Beethoven can; the imitability of many of his peculiarities entices one to imitate them, and one longs to utter the thousand thoughts to which he only slightly alludes. Such is he, and such the impression which he will make for a long time to come.

Beethoven and his Last Translator.

To the Editor of the Musical World, (London).

Sir,—I am not going to review "Beethoven's Letters," translated by Lady Wallace: "That delicate task must be left to an abler hand than mine. I am only going to mention one or two things which I have seen in my first glance at the book, and which, while they prove that the translator is one of those persons who gain no wisdom from experience, discourage me dreadfully as to the value of the rest of the work.

(1.) I take first, page 187 of volume I. Letter 152 runs thus: "Pray forgive my asking Y. R. H. to send me the two sonatas with violin obbligato* which I caused," &c. The foot-note to* says: "If by the two sonatas for the pianoforte with violoncello obbligato, Op. 102 is meant," &c. Thus the note and the text are irreconcilable. Look at the original in von Köchel's 83 letters, and instead of "violin" in the text, we find we ought to read, "violoncello."

By the way, Beethoven, both in Nohl and Köchel, spells obligato thus. Wrong, no doubt! but why should Beethoven's Italian be put right more than his English or his French?

(2.) On the same page the foot-note † contains a worse blunder. It says: "The letters 152 and 153 speak sometimes expressly of the pianoforte sonata in E minor, Op. 90, these being engraved or under revision," &c. Letter 152 does not mention the sonata, but letters 153, 154, and 155 do, as Köchel (Nos. 25, 26, 27, in his note 39) states. "These" (welche) should of course be "this." Two lines further down in the same note, "August 14th" is "August 16th," in Köchel. Three errors in one note of four lines are pretty well!

(3.) At page 193, same volume, we find "The trio in [?]" and the violin sonata may be allowed," &c. This is no translation of the original (Nohl, No. 123):—"Mit dem Trio in [und ?] der Sonata kannes," &c. "The trio in [and ?] the sonata," &c.

(4.) In the curious letters to Birchall (Nos. 158, 181, 182, &c., of the translation), why should the words "written in English," "written in French," be added to the address? Surely this information—very desirable, though somewhat unnecessary, as no one will take Beethoven's rugged English for the translator's slipshod periods—should have been put in a foot-note.

(5.) Once more, in letter 55, page 78, is a blunder which is quite unpardonable. It runs: "Ask Baroness von—— to give you the Pianoforte part of the trios, and be so good," &c. To this there is a foot-note, unnecessarily repeating the date, and then saying "By the Terzetto he no doubt meant the Trios Op. 70." Of course, on looking to the original (Nohl, No. 55), the letter has, not "Trios" but "Terzotten," which makes the foot-note intelligible.

(6.) The next foot-note on the same page shows that our translator is not above transcribing a German phrase, however simple, when she does not see the meaning of it. But it is a pity she had no one to tell her what "An der mölker Bastei" signified, or still worse, the difference between "The hall of the 'Kömischer Kaiser,'" and "Zum römischen Kaiser" (p. 163, note †).

These are exactly the kind of errors that the volumes of Mendelssohn's letters by the same translator were full of. She has acquired a little fluency since that publication, but does not appear to have gained either in accuracy or in care. I confess my half-hour's exploration of her Beethoven has taken away all my faith and interest in it, and inspired me with a horrid fear that one by one all the good careful German works on music will be got hold of (as Mendelssohn's, Mozart's, and Beethoven's letters have been) and spoiled for all English readers for ever.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Courier des Etats-Unis gives extracts from a letter which will interest our readers:

"CAMILLO URSO has played the famous Concerto of Mendelssohn magnificently, accompanied by Pasdeloup's orchestra. She played it first at the Louvre, before a select company, composed of nearly three hundred senators, deputies, marshals, magistrates, &c.,—in truth a display of ribbons of all colors. There were no ladies present but herself and Mme. Miolan-Carvalho. She had an immense success. Pasdeloup was there, and he came near embracing her in his transport. He said to her: 'No woman has played yet in my concerts, and no one but you shall ever play there. Come day after tomorrow to the Conservatoire to rehearse the Concerto with orchestra, and then we'll consider about it.' On the appointed day, at half past ten in the evening, she stood before that terrible orchestra directed by Pasdeloup; nearly a hundred musicians eyed her uneasily; all had their ears on the stretch, and murmured, especially, after certain singing passages which she played with an astonishing purity. Her trills, points d'orgue, arpeggios, nuances of all sorts, all succeeded admirably; for my part, I felt a cold thrill even to my hair. The commencement of the third movement was attacked with a boldness and a brio which stopped the bows of the accompanists almost short at the point where M. Pasdeloup was obliged to recall to them the measure by rapping twice upon his desk. One heard nothing but compliments on all sides. What a tone for a woman! what a bow! what a fourth string! In fine, the warmest compliments from M. Pasdeloup. 'I do not wish you,' said he, 'to let yourself be heard in public elsewhere until you have played in my concerts. Hold yourself in readiness, and you may count upon a splendid triumph; it is I who tell you so.' (!).

"As you see, the star is in full ascendancy; it will soon shine, we doubt not, at the top of the artistic firmament."

The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire gave its fifth and last "Concert Extraordinaire" yesterday. The programme was:—1. Symphonie Pastorale, Beethoven; 2. Final d'Enryranthe, Weber; 3. Hymn pour tous les instruments à cordes, Haydn; 4. Récit. and Air "d'Idoménée," Mozart; 5. Overture "d'Oberon," Weber; 6. 98th Psalm (Double Chœur), Mendelssohn. M. Georges Hainl conducted the concert, and may retire to rest with the conviction that never a season ended in such a disgraceful manner as this one. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was distinguished by a most elaborate "conac" given by a soloist whose name I will not mention. The tempi were taken à la mode de Lyon (where M. Perrin "discovered" M. Hainl) and were as similar to the usual traditions as "chalk and cheese." The other morceaux were given in the same manner; every movement being changed, and alas! no improvement. Lyons is famous for its saucissons, but not for its chefs d'orchestre; and M. Hainl, who was discovered there, would do well to return. The fact is that, a simple beater of time will not answer as a director of the Société. You must have a man who has not only that mechanical part of the affair, but who has enough importance in himself to lead, and impose his opinion on people who are really good artists, and want a thoroughly good musician to guide them, and to whom they will listen. Habeneck, who created the Société, was one of these; he was a "character," and when he lifted up his voice no one dared speak. Girard who succeeded him was also one of the vieille roche and knew how to continue the good traditions of his predecessor. But I fear that the present conductor will not answer so well. The Pasdeloup Concerts have killed the exclusive character of the "Concerts de la Société," other societies are forming; and its good name is dying out. The subscribers are nearly all malcontent.—Orchestra.

At the Italiens Mlle. Méla, the "lady-tenor," made her first appearance on Saturday in the "Italiana in Algeri." She is not a tenor but a slow contralto. Her reception was very doubtful, the public being very cold but indulgent; and their applause was reserved for Scialese, (Mustafa), and Agnési, a first rate Taddeo, and thorough artist. Mlle. Zeiss too as Isabella made a great advance in the favor of the audience. It is a pity that one of the last nights of the season should have been devoted to the production of a "phenomenon;" for there are good artists, such as those I mentioned just now, who might have helped to close the house brilliantly. At a fair this would do; but at the Italiens it seems a doubtful policy. The season will end this week.

The Opera Comique has lost one tenor and gained another. M. Capoul is off to Italy to try and cure a laryngite which affects him; and M. Thérie, a young beginner, has been engaged instead. He is the son of a favorite actor here some years ago, and his uncle, under the name of Brunswick, was the author alone and en collaboration, of a great number of pieces many of which are still in our current repertoires. M. Thérie made his bow in the part of Benedict in Auber's "Ambassadrice." His voice is rather an exceptional one; the lower notes being much stronger than we usually find in tenors—particularly now that an ut de poitrine is considered absolutely necessary for the benefit of mankind and artists neglect anything like even a medium in the voice. The quality is rather thin, but warm, and the voix de tête of immense power and compass, and blending well with the other registers. For the rest, good physique, gentlemanly manners, good musical and general education, a born comedian; voilà le résumé! M. Thérie was very warmly received by the public, and will be a useful addition to the troupe. "Fior d'Alisa" is withdrawn for the present on account of illness; and Mlle. Vandenhuevel-Duprez will run through a line of the stock pieces, commencing with the "Pré aux Clercs" (Isabelle). At the Lyrique nothing new; "Don Juan" is now announced for to-morrow, Thursday. I heard a very good performance of Victor Massé's "Reine Topaze," the other night. Mme. Carvalho was in voice, and sang the Abeille song and the Carnaval variations delightfully. I hear that she is going to compose a polka, and will dedicate it to the Empress. Mlle. Saxe—I beg pardon—Mme. Sasse is hard at work on a "Reverie Sentimentale" to be offered to His Majesty; Faure is writing a bass air for M. le Ministre de l'Instruction Publique; M. Montaubry a Gigue Anglaise dedicated to Mr. J. W. Davison, M. Gueymard is writing a five act opera for the King of Prussia, and others too are hard at work.

FERDINAND HILLER, of Cologne, gave a soirée in Paris on the 23d ult. M. Paul Smith writes in the Gazette Musicale of the pleasure of again meeting "this great and sincere artist." We translate:

"Hiller represents to us a pleiad of famous pianists who arose at once under the influence and example of Moscheles and Hummel. Arriving very young in Paris, he became almost naturalized as a Frenchman when the revolution of July broke out, for he partook of its enthusiasm.

"A short time before and after this period, he gave concerts at the Conservatoire to bring out several large compositions. Some years later he returned to Germany, and from thence went to Italy, called by ambition and the hope of theatrical success. There was even, we believe, a joint project between him and Adolphe Nourrit, who had voluntarily exiled himself from his country, the dramatic singer contributing his voice and talent, the composer an opera which was in a certain sense to reform the Italian music. This project came to nothing. To revenge himself for the failure of Romilda, Ferdinand Hiller went back to Germany and had executed at Leipzig his oratorio, The Destruction of Jerusalem, which succeeded in that city, and everywhere, at Frankfort, Amsterdam, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Dresden, Brunswick, Hamburg, Cassel and Riga.

"In 1841, Hiller made a second journey to Italy, stopped some time at Florence, then at Rome, where he made studies with the celebrated Abbé Baini, to familiarize himself with the ancient style of the Roman school.

"Returning to Germany in 1842 (says M. Fétis in his biographical notice of him), Hiller directed the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig, and afterwards the concerts at Dresden for two years. From 1847 to 1849 he occupied the position of musical director at Düsseldorf, and in 1850 he was called to Cologne, as Kapellmeister of the city, and charged with the organization of the Conservatoire, of which he is director. Since that time he has only left Cologne during one winter season to direct the music of the Italian Theatre in Paris, and for two visits to the same city in 1853 and 1855, when he gave musical soirées for the benefit of the Association of Artists and obtained brilliant success as pianist and composer. In his visits to Berlin, Dresden, Frankfort, Munich, Brunswick, Amsterdam and other cities, Hiller directed the execution of his own works, as well as the musical festivals at Düsseldorf, in 1853, 1855, 1859, and the fine festival at Cologne in 1858. Endowed with a delicate feeling, with verve and at the same time self-possession, he possesses in the highest degree the qualities of a chef d'orchestre and wields great vocal and instrumental masses with an irresistible power.

"Hiller (says M. Fétis further) is incontestably a great musician, and I consider him as the German composer of the present day whose qualities are the most solid and most estimable. He does not, like some of his compatriots, fall into vagueness or exaggeration; his style has clearness; he does not disdain melody, and his harmony is regular in its successions.

"Returning to us after a long absence, Ferdinand Hiller announced himself at first by two fragments of a Symphony entitled "Spring," which were most favorably received at one of Pasdeloup's concerts.

"In his Soirées at Erard's, we can hardly say whether it was as composer or as pianist that he merited most praise. Among the pieces that he played, we will mention first the Serenade for piano, violin and violoncello, a veritable masterpiece, with a certain impress of antiquity, proving that the author has profoundly studied the art of the old German and French clavichord writers. We will next cite a Gavotte, a Sarabande, a Courante, in which the same retrospective tendencies are manifested, singularly fertile in ingenious combinations of rhythm and measure. Of this he did the honors alone, while in the Serenade he had Alard and Franchomme for worthy coöperators. We confess that the fragments of a Sonata for piano and violin seemed to us very inferior to the preceding works, and only speak of the song pieces to say that they found in Mlle. Gouvy an interpreter endowed with a fine voice.—At the end, as if to recall exactly the past time, Hiller was compelled to improvise on some of the favorite motives of his Serenade and other works."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY. 26, 1866.

Music in New York.

(From our Correspondent).

During the past week, Dr. CUTLER gave, on three several occasions, a lecture in Irving Hall on "The Cathedrals of England." The lecture was interspersed with solos, concerted pieces, and choruses, performed by boys, pupils of Dr. Cutler, assisted by several amateur tenors and basses.

We cannot say that the historical and æsthetic value of the lecture was great; probably want of time compelled the lecturer to treat his subject in so aphoristic a manner, and merely to touch on its principal points. One detailed incident we would willingly have been spared the hearing; we mean the minute account of the barbarous assassination of Thomas A Beckett; this frightful picture almost destroyed, for us, the effect of Luther's fine choral, which was sung immediately after Dr. Cutler's description of the murder. What we expected, from a Doctor of Music, and what we missed in his Lecture, was a more consequent account of church music, as performed in English Cathedrals; information regarding those musicians who have had an especial influence on such music, and their works; with comparisons as to the degrees to which such men have profaned or ennobled the service, and so on. But all this was only touched upon in a passing manner, and the subject twisted in order to bring in, more or less happily, the different musical selections. The descriptions of the fugue and canon might also have been dispensed with; they were not calculated to enlighten an audience on the subject. Dr. Cutler, who has evidently studied English Church Music as a speciality, and who displays so much true zeal for genuine sacred music, certainly possesses knowledge and material enough to render his future lectures of more historic and æsthetic interest; and, in the interest of art, we trust he will make use of his material.

So far as regards the instruction of his boy singers, Dr. Cutler deserves the highest credit. The choruses were sung with precision, correct intonation, and good taste. Also the chorals in all ecclesiastical keys were given with great certainty. If the solos were less grateful to a musical ear, it was only owing to a want of agreeable quality of tone in the voices themselves; for Dr.

Cutler is undoubtedly able to cultivate this kind of voice, so far as it is possible to do so. The masterly organ playing of Mr. G. W. Morgan added much to the interest of the entertainments, which we are happy to say, have been materially successful.

At Mr. THEODORE THOMAS's last Concert, we had the entire music to "Egmont" by Beethoven, interspersed with dialogue (by no means Goethe's, alas!) read by Miss Eytinge: the march and chorus from the "Ruins of Athens"; Nicolai's Festival Overture and Chorus; the Hallelujah chorus; Henselt's F-minor Concerto, with Mr. Carlyle Petersilea as pianist; who also gave us Liszt's transcription of the "Erl-king"; and Mozart's aria "Non temer," by Miss Brainard, who also sang the Egmont songs. The choruses were sung by the Mendelssohn Union, under Mr. Berge.

Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, the young pianist, made his first appearance on this occasion before an American audience. We could not attend this concert early enough to hear the Henselt Concerto, but have heard it played in private by Mr. Petersilea, besides many things by Beethoven, Bach, Schumann and Chopin. We were then convinced that the young artist possessed a fine touch, and very great technical facility, as well as a musician-like understanding of the different pieces he performed. Mr. Petersilea is still very young, and fresh from study; it would be therefore unfair to expect perfection from him. The young artist is still wanting in routine before the public, of course; nor does he yet play with individual freedom; but in spite of this, we recognize originality already in Mr. Petersilea's style of playing, while in his phrasing, and coloring of passages, he displays much power of contrast, without being unconscientious towards the composer. His left hand is at present somewhat unequal, a defect that may be soon remedied. We understand that Mr. Petersilea's success with the Henselt Concerto was somewhat marred by the amiable embarrassment of youth, as well as by the uncertainty of the orchestra; but in the extremely difficult but ungrateful Liszt transcription, (an injudicious selection, made for, not by the young artist, we hear), he displayed his power of endurance. The Chopin Berceuse, which he gave on an encore, we have never heard more exquisitely played.

We feel assured Mr. Carlyle Petersilea has a fine future before him, and that it will not be long before he disputes the palm with the first. But to attain the highest results, he must continue on his at present right path.

Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" chorus was well sung by the Mendelssohn Union, but we have never heard the "Hallelujah" chorus given more indifferently. M. Berge took the tempo much too slow at first, and towards the close indulged in rubatos and strettos, utterly contradictory to the spirit of the chorus.

At this season of the year there are always to be heard in New York a number of benefit and other concerts, which, although of interest to the friends of the givers, are without permanent interest in an artistic sense. But if the concert season be virtually at an end, a summer season of light English Operas is in project, to be carried out at the lately completed Theatre Français, in Fourteenth St. The new building will be opened next week with EICHBERG's comic opera,

"The Doctor of Alcantara." Mr. Eichberg is now in the city, superintending rehearsals. We hope to report a complete success for this clever musician, whom, like Mr. Petersilea, we hope to count among our permanent residents here. [We hope not.—ED.] We are also promised another addition to the number of those among us who are zealots for the true and beautiful in art, in the person of Mr. JOHN G. MORGAN, musical director of the Oberlin College, Ohio, a young organist, who has made thorough studies under Richter in Leipzig, and Ritter in Erfurt. Mr. Morgan's technical ability is distinguished, and his musical knowledge sound. We need such organists here to assist in the regeneration of church music. LANCELOT.

Concerts.

THE FESTIVAL FUND CONCERT of the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, on Sunday evening, May 13, may pass for the formal close of the real musical season, that is to say of the great series of concerts, what remained being of a miscellaneous character, mostly benefit occasions. And a noble close it was. It was in some sense a revival, or a reflection, of the splendors of the Festival twelve months ago. Between five and six hundred voices were assembled, and the orchestra increased to sixty instruments, so that the performance was nearly on the same grand scale. The drill of chorus and of orchestra, under CARL ZERRAHN, had been particularly careful. The selections (Part I. Nicolai's Religious Festival Overture, and Mendelssohn's 42d Psalm; Part II. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise) were of the most interesting and inspiring character. The Music Hall, strange to say, was not crowded—May with its apple-blossoms was a strong competitor—yet it was very nearly filled, and by the most encouraging kind of audience.

In manner as in matter we think this may be counted among the very best concerts ever given by the old Society. Everything went heartily and full of life. The chorals singing was uncommonly good; and so was the orchestra, bringing out the contrapuntal interludes and variations of the Nicolai Overture in strong, unmistakable outline, while the choral unison on Luther's hymn: "Ein feste Burg," was sublime. We have never felt the power of this piece so much, not even at the Festival.

The Mendelssohn Cantata (42d Psalm): "As the hart pants," was new to the public. Not so grand, so varied, or elaborate as the "Hymn of Praise," not to speak of the Oratorios, it is purely beautiful and full of tender feeling from beginning to end. Indeed a lovely composition, in which the inmost yearning and deep trials of the soul, as well as the sweetest comfort, alike find expression. We cannot think when the Society have ever been so happy in the rendering of any work as they were, on the whole, with this Cantata. It is, to be sure, comparatively easy; the stream flows smoothly all the way; there are no such broken, intricate, perplexing agitato passages as one or two in the Lobgesang; yet it was no child's play, no thing of accident, to present such a work of art so truthfully and well, with such symmetry and such refinement.

The opening chorus, where the Contraltos breathe in so soft and low, after a few measures of the orchestra: "As the hart pants after the water brooks, so panteth my soul for thee, O God," and voice after voice as it were in unconscious harmony swells the prayer, possesses you so easily, that you scarcely seem to listen as to anything without, for what you hear is but the musing, the upward yearning of your own soul, only in sympathy with all other souls, for this music has at once set a common tone of feeling. This is in F; changing to the relative minor, the next piece is a soprano solo: "For my soul thirsteth for God," a lovely melody, first sketched in an oboe solo which was played with fine feeling; and very admirably did Miss Houston sing it, both technically and in point of expression; plainly the heart was in it.

No. 3. A Soprano recitative. "My tears have been my meat," leads to the aria: "For I had gone forth," of a singularly original, almost quaint turn—still excellent on the part of Miss Houston—and then the air is taken up in two-part chorus, soprano and alto, the solo intervening from time to time and as it were stimulating the chorus.—No. 4. Full chorus, beginning with tenors and basses in unison: "Why, my soul, art thou cast down," answered by the brighter voices: "Trust then in God!"—a theme which stamps itself so strongly that it seems as if those words had set themselves to it and could not naturally be set to any other music. The exhilaration of this subsides for a moment; the choral sunshine is clouded by a short soliloquy: "Within me is my soul cast down," very touching and very sad, for soprano. A quartet of male voices suggest comfort: "The Lord hath commanded his kindness in the day time"; but the mournful soprano strain replies, and so the two strains alternate, all five voices uniting in the end. Here the soprano was sung by Miss SARAH W. BARTON, her first appearance in oratorio. Her clear, rich, true voice, and effective execution, not without fervor, although of too birdlike and bright a quality for the sentiment of the piece, made a highly favorable impression. Much may be hoped of her.

No. 7, the final chorus, is a resumption of No. 4, "Trust thou in God," but this time worked up at greater length, and with enhanced effect, especially in the orchestra, where the figurative running basses contribute grandly to the climax. The Organ also, judiciously used by Mr. LANG, helped out the suggestion of infinity, and sublimely the whole thing closed in long notes on the words "henceforth and for evermore!"

Of the "Hymn of Praise," now grown familiar, little need be said, except that its charm does not even begin to wear out, and that never, except at last year's Festival, have we had it so successfully rendered. It lies in the nature of the case that we hardly expect ever to hear a perfect rendering of the middle portions of the chorus: "The night is departing;" with the best training that can only be some such rare luck or inspiration as might, lifting the singers above themselves for once, realize the intention of the vocal parts in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. For the rest, the choruses went capitally. Miss Houston sang the soprano solos, and neither the splendor of her voice nor the right inspirations failed her. Miss Barton sang with her the duet: "I waited for the Lord," which was so perfect as a whole that the call for a repetition was irresistible. The least satisfactory part of the whole was the tenor of Mr. HAZELWOOD, which was dry and unexpressive, although the voice is not without power and sweetness, and his effort appeared careful and conscientious.

ERNST PERABO's second Matinée, at Chickering's, May 9, showed that the interest in this gifted young pianist had not at all abated. He seemed to feel the sympathy of his audience and to be in the best mood for playing. The F-major Sonata of Beethoven, for piano and violin, with Mr. HENRY SICK, was rendered with such easy, even mastery on the part of the pianist, and so much geniality withal, and such good coöperation on the part of the violinist, that everybody was delighted. Three out of "Six Diversions," for four hands, by Bennett (op. 53), with Mr. LANG, were charmingly graceful pieces, charmingly played. But the Chopin Rondo, for two pianos, played for a finale, by two such artists, made perhaps the greatest impression of all.

For solos, Mr. Perabo played, in the first place, the Scherzo and the Rondo finale from a Sonata by Schubert in D major, op. 53. Schubert's Sonatas are almost a new element, and a most welcome one, in our piano concerts. These works, full of genius, if sometimes imperfect in form, redundant, needing condensation, nine or ten in number, deserve to be known now that we know Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin so well. We know no other well-spring of real musical inspirations, after the above, that can yield us so much. We notice that just now, by a curious coincidence, Schubert's Sonatas are the new sensation in the chamber concerts of London. We do not think Perabo's selection was the most interesting that he could have made; the two Sonatas in A minor, the one in A major, or one in B flat, or one beginning with a long Adagio, in G, and called "Fantasia," are either of them greater. Still that Scherzo is full of life and vigor, quite inspiring; and the Rondo, though rather common in its thoughts, is carried through with such exquisite grace and delicacy, and both were played so perfectly, that he had the audience fairly with him, and all wishing to hear more of Schubert.

For other solos he gave two little compositions of his own: the first a Scherzo, rather pastoral in style, the other called "Moment Musical," both characteristic, well composed and pleasing.

The interest of the concert was varied by the first appearance of another new singer, Miss CLARA M. LORING, a pupil of Mrs. Long; a very pure, true voice, with soul in it, and of good power; she sang "Mother, O sing me to rest" by Franz, and Mendelssohn's "Zuleika" and "Maid of Gongs," songs without much contrast, but very sweetly sung, with chaste expression and refinement.

The ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY invited their friends to the Melodeon on Wednesday evening, May 9, and gave one of those unique musical entertainments of theirs, which was not lost upon the very appreciative audience. About thirty voices, averaging better in quality than we have known before, sang together, under Mr. ZERRAHN's direction, the "Gesang der Verbündeten," by Reissiger; "Die stille Wasserrose," by Aht, a delicious piece of soft and quiet harmony, in which the deep basses introduce some wonderfully impressive modulations; Liszt's "Reiterlied," a wild, strange thing enough, and a more old-fashioned chorus, "Der Sängerkunst," by Spohr. We really think the Orpheus never sang so well; we must congratulate the Club on the sound condition of its "active" nucleus.—Mr. KREISSMANN sang part of the "Dichterliebe" cyclus of little breaths of song by Schumann, also the same composer's "Du, meine Seele!" and "Spring-night," never more charmingly or with more feeling; it was a graceful "Auf Wiedersehn" on his part (he is on his way to Europe), to which we all may add on ours: "Auf Wiederhören!" Mr. LEONHARD, who exquisitely accompanied the songs, gave also some capital piano solos, namely, a Gavotte by Bach, and a Nocturne, an Andante and the Polonaise, op. 52, by Chopin. Miss ADDIE RYAN sang "Thekla's Lament" and "Thine is my heart" by Schubert, and "Good night," and "Er ist gekommen" by Franz, all highly relished. But there was no greater favorite than Mr. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER, whose baritone voice is more juicy, musical and sweet than ever, and whose singing is so genial, refined and full of feeling. His solos, including "The two Grenadiers" by Reissiger, provoked insatiable applause.

MR. PECK's Annual Concert was a great success. Miscellaneous as such things for the most part must be, the miscellany was far better and more significant than usual. Indeed the standard of even the most "popular" concerts seems to have been somewhat elevated by this winter's work. Miss KELLOGG displayed her vocal fluency and grace and finish to the best advantage in "Son virgine vezzosa," the Prayer and Barcarolle from "The North Star," a song by Wallace, &c. ERNST PERABO played the entire Schubert Sonata in D, all its four long movements, a questionable experiment for the Music Hall; but he held the great audience captive to the end, and was immensely applauded, and obliged to appear again and play the two little fancies by Bargiel which he has made so popular. The Chopin Rondo, too, by Lang and Perabo, made great effect.

Mrs. SMITH and Miss CARY blended their fine voices very satisfactorily in Rossini's Quis est homo and a duet by Campana. Dr. GUILMETTE, with powerful bass voice often rich and musical, sometimes a little coarse, and with carefully studied, sometimes over-calculated expression, sang a Scene and Aria by Adolph Adam, and quite a sweet song by C. J. Hopkins: "Morn, Noon, Night." Mr. EUGENE THAYER, recently returned from Germany, opened each part on the great Organ, playing, first, an Organ Concerto by Handel (in B flat, No. 2), four movements, in which we did not get very deeply interested; afterwards, one of those "Choral Variations (Vorspiele) by Bach, and a Pastorale by the same—both sweet and truly edifying. All three pieces were clearly and tastefully executed. There was also cornet playing by Mr. RHODOLPH HALL, whose pianissimo and echoes were remarkably perfect.

We had counted on room to say a good word, also, of the benefit concerts of Miss ANNIE CARY (in which there was excellent singing by herself, Miss Houston, Mrs. Cary, Mr. Rudolphsen and Mr. Whitney, and choice piano pieces by Mr. Lang), and of Mr. BARNABEE—both beneficiaries having evidently hosts of friends. Mr. Barnabee, besides a bass voice of rare musical quality which he uses well, and besides his exquisitely comic vein, in the John Parry and Hatton style, without the slightest taint of coarseness, shows talent, if we are not mistaken, for higher walks of Art than he has yet attempted.

We translate from the Belletristisches Journal (New York), the following notice of a Boston artist whose name has been already often noticed in this journal:

"LEIPZIG, MARCH 24, 1866. We can tell you with peculiar satisfaction of a new and vigorously rising talent in the field of piano-forte virtuosa; we mean your young countryman, Herr CARLYLE PETERSILEA, of Boston. Arriving at the Leipzig Conservatorium in the year 1863, already prepared by excellent technical studies, he succeeded, after two years of instruction under Profs. Moscheles and Wenzel, in lifting himself into the ranks of the most distinguished pupils of the piano-forte class. By his very admirable rendering of a Concerto by Henselt at the Haupt-prüfung, at Easter time in 1865, he won the particular attention and the friendly regard of one of our more important Art-connoisseurs and critics. Partly by his advice, Herr Petersilea left Leipzig in the latter part of the summer of the same year and went to Munich, there to learn, under the guidance of the greatest pianist now living in Germany, Dr. Hans von Bülow, the higher spiritual, poetic conception (!) and reproduction of the tone-poems of our great masters, and to develop himself more freely and independently than he might succeed in doing at Leipzig, where, in spite of undeniable excellence of absolute technical instruction," &c., &c.—the writer has plainly a leaning to the "Zukunft."

"A few weeks since, Herr Petersilea returned here on his way to America, in order to give our connoisseurs and patrons of Art a palpable proof of his artistic development under the care of Bülow. In the 18th Gewandhaus concert of the past season, March 8, the young virtuoso appeared for the first time on an independent footing and achieved a brilliant success by his performance of the Romanza and Rondo of Chopin's E-minor Concerto. He afterwards played with equal success in a concert of the Zöllner-Verein, where he was applauded the moment he presented himself, and still more after his brilliant execution of Thalberg's 'Möise' fantasia and Liszt's arrangement of Mendelssohn's Overture, march and fairy dance from the 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' On the 19th March he played before the Artists' Union here (called the 'Klapperkasten'), Weber's 'Perpetuum mobile,' and the Liszt arrangement again, with loud and general applause.

"Still more brilliant success did he achieve in a Soirée of his own, which he gave on the 21st of March in the Hall of the Conservatorium, before an invited assembly of nearly 400 persons exclusively belonging to artistic circles,—a very remarkable and, so far as we know, unprecedented case for a former pupil of the institution. That evening he played (with a pupil of Concertmeister David, the still very youthful violinist, Brandt, from Hamburg) the C-minor Sonata Duo of Beethoven, and, by himself, Bach's great Organ Fugue in A minor, as transcribed by Liszt; also the C-sharp minor Sonata by Richter, professor of Harmony and Counterpoint in the Conservatorium; the brilliant and extremely difficult C-major Fantasia by Schumann, and Chopin's splendid Polonaise in A flat.

"There is but one voice among all impartial judges here regarding the young virtuoso, and that is in warmest recognition of his real and remarkable artistic capacity. In the performance of Herr Carlyle Petersilea not only do we perceive an extremely well developed technique,—above all, elegance and power of touch, fineness in the distribution of light and shade, signal correctness and perfect cleanness of passages, and uncommon tenderness (in Adagios, for instance, and pieces of like character)—but we must emphasize especially his understanding of his author, the way he enters into the spirit of the work—one of the chief merits of the disciples of the Liszt-Bülow school. There can be no doubt that the young artist will make a mark in his own country, and will win the sympathies of the American friends of Art. As little can we doubt, if he goes on as he has done in the direction so happily begun under Master Bülow, that we shall in a few years have to count him among the shining stars in the firmament of executive musical artists."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Of the great German Singing Festival, to be held in this city next month, a writer in the Providence Press says:

The grand series of concerts to be given here on the 26th, 27th and 28th of June, deserve especial attention at the hands of the citizens of Providence. Some of the most celebrated societies from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Newark, etc., numbering in the aggregate six hundred singers, with a complete orchestra of fifty members, selected from the best musicians in New York and Boston, under the leadership of Carl Zerrahn, will be present, and a musical treat may be expected, far surpassing anything ever before heard here. Mr. A. Paur, of New York, is engaged to be the general musical director of the festival. The German Liederkreis of this city have the whole matter under their especial management, and they are laboring with a zeal most praiseworthy.

There are to be two grand vocal and instrumental concerts, one of them a Singing Match Concert, at which the singers by clubs will contend for excellence in singing, and an Orchestral Matinee, at which Schubert's great C-Major Symphony will be performed, with other choice selections. The Festival concludes with a grand excursion to Rocky Point.

CINCINNATI. The Harmonic Society gave a concert at Melodeon Hall, on the 8th inst., with a crowded house. The first half of the Oratorio Elijah formed the first part of the programme. The second part contained the overture to Oleron; a recitative and aria from Mozart's Figaro; a Trio for violin, viola and cello, by Beethoven; and Righini's chorus: "The Lord is great." The performance is much praised by the local critics, especially the singing of Mrs. Dexter. One of the said critics is original; in speaking of the Elijah, he says:

The first part only of the oratorio of "Elijah" was given, but when one considers the disadvantages that an amateur society labors under, in the necessary omission of costume and scenery, (!) even that much rendered without interruption will be regarded as highly creditable, especially when the same uniform success, in a musical point of view, follows, as it did last night.

Never having heard "Elijah" rendered in public before, we have to observe that its choral effects are grand when competently brought out, but its solo parts seem tame, and not at all commensurate with the greatness of the theme. (!)

PHILADELPHIA. The WOLFSOHN Testimonial Concert on the 5th, appears, by all accounts, to have been a gratifying success. A correspondent of the New York Weekly Review writes:

The audience, though a small one when the programme is considered, was a very choice one, being composed of our best musical and literary people. It is rare to see as many of our resident musicians in an audience as were gathered upon this occasion. The testimonial, which consists of Beethoven's complete works, the Leipsic edition, most beautifully bound, was presented by Prof. Rose, in a kindly pleasant speech, while Mr. Wolfsoln's reply was modestly brief and graceful. As to the performance, it was excellent, under the baton of Theodore Thomas, and, animated by a cordial regard for the artist, in whose honor it was given, they gave Beethoven's music with a force and precision that our Philadelphia orchestras do not often attain. The Concerto (in E flat) and the Kreutzer Sonata were warmly appreciated.

The Evening Bulletin says:

We were charmed beyond all measure, or our deserts. The orchestra, composed, with but one or two exceptions, of resident musicians, was, we think, the completest that was ever heard in Philadelphia. It was a revelation, indeed, to many of us—accustomed, as we are, to the meagre tones of one violoncello, all, it seems, that the "Germania" can afford for their own rehearsals and concerts, which are invariably noticeable for a pitiful lack of strings, and, with which they essay, with but poor success, the most elaborate classical works, necessarily failing to do anything like justice to the music whose interpretation they attempt,—to listen to the rich vibrations of the four cellos, and the three supporting double-basses—not to speak of the very full complement of upper strings, which was the especial feature of the orchestra of this concert—all of which was a novelty to the majority of the audience present, and undoubtedly created in their minds a more satisfactory idea of the true nature of an orchestra than they had ever entertained before.

HAYDN'S "SEASONS." This charming oratorio or cantata was performed last evening before a crowded audience, in the Academy of Music, by the Handel and Haydn Society. The solo parts were taken by Miss Caroline Richings, Mr. Geo. Simpson, and Mr. J. R. Thomas. The chorus numbered about two hundred voices, and the orchestra about thirty-five instruments. The whole was under the direction of Mr. Carl Sentz. It was a treat to have so admirable an artist as Miss Richings for the soprano solo. She sang with great intelligence, elegance and taste, was frequently applauded, and, in the delightful song, with chorus, "A wealthy lord," she was enthusiastically encored. Mr. Simpson sang with his usual sweetness, but very tamely and with too much of the portamento that seems to have fastened itself on him. Mr. Thomas has an agreeable voice and sings well, but he lacks force, and the lower part of his voice is not strong enough for the music of this work. The excellent Handel and Haydn chorus never sang more admirably than it did last evening. There were no flaws or hitches in the performance, and there was everything to show how carefully and conscientiously the singers had studied their parts. The orchestra was unusually good.—Ibid.

MR. CARL GAERTNER'S MATINEE, in the Foyer of the Academy yesterday afternoon, was not as well attended as it would have been if the weather had been more favorable. The performance was uncommonly fine, Mr. Gaertner playing in his best manner, as did the other artists engaged. The novelty of the entertainment was the first appearance of Mme. Abel, a pianist from New York, who plays the most difficult music in the most brilliant and artistic manner. In the Kreutzer sonata of Beethoven, with Mr. Gaertner, and in a duo with that fine artist, Mr. Charles Jarvis, she gave the utmost delight. But in a Polonaise of Chopin, from whom she is said to have taken lessons, she played in a style worthy of that great genius. In elegance of fingering, brilliant, crisp touch, force and expression, we know of no lady artist who appears in public that is her equal. She would soon be a great favorite in Philadelphia, if she were to appear oftener. Mr. Gaertner played a violin solo of great difficulty in admirable style. Mr. Graff sang several German songs very agreeably. The concert concluded with a quintet by Schumann, very elegantly played.—Ibid., May 18.

Bach "Pure and Simple," or with Modern Accompaniments.

[We translate the following review, from the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung of Dec. 23, 1863, for three reasons: first, as a model (so it seems to us) of true, instructive musical criticism; secondly, as showing fine appreciation of Bach, particularly as seen in his "Well-tempered Clavichord;" thirdly, as conclusive demonstration of the impolicy, bad taste and almost sacrilege of recent efforts to improve, illustrate, or popularize Preludes, &c., of Bach by putting melodies to them, as if they were not complete in themselves.—a condemnation which applies as well to the so-called "Meditation" of Gounod, and all efforts of the kind, as to the work by Moscheles now under discussion.—ED.]

MELODIC-CONTRAPUNTAL STUDIES: A Selection of 10 Preludes from J. S. BACH's Well-tempered Clavichord, with an obligato Violoncello part composed to them by L. MOSCHELES. Op. 187a. (The same with a Concertante part for a Second Piano-forte. Op. 187 b).

Criticism is not practised in journals and æsthetic teas alone. In one form or another it walks always by the side of Art. Wheresoever and howsoever Art asserts itself, Criticism waits upon its every step and motion. And so in every reproduction, every attempt to give a free interpretation of a work of Art, there lurks a critical element; the rendering of a piece of music by an artist—one who knows what he is about—becomes a living criticism on the piece. For instance, the present writer might spare himself many words, could he only perform to his readers some of the above named Preludes just as they float before his mind after some study of them.

In this sense the critical discussion even of the accepted masterworks of old times never completely ceases, however firmly settled the verdict may be with regard to them on the whole or in the main; each successive age must still define its own position towards them, that is to say, its critical relation to the works and to the earlier conceptions of them. In this way it often happens that unknown works, which remained inaccessible to their contemporaries, suddenly gain, long afterwards, a fresh, young life, because it reveals itself to the sharper sight of later times. So too, other works, which gratified whole generations, lose their old charm at once, so soon as the critical atmosphere is changed and represents everything to itself in a different perspective. So too, no period will renounce its right to put aside, even in classical works, that which seems to it to be only suited to the manners of past periods or to the composer's faculty of adapting himself or writing to order—in spite of every protest which the historical school, score in hand, may raise.

In this sense therefore we grant Criticism its great rights; we allow it, with the culture of its time, with its controlling view of things, to approach a work of Art; we only enjoin upon it as a duty to proceed with piety, with the greatest carefulness, with the offering of all its faculties, in short, too, with a critical consciousness of its own undertaking. Thus, for example, in the case of works, in the performance of which the composers themselves are known to have filled up the gaps in their score by the aid of the organ or the piano-forte, we hold it to be not only allowable, but absolutely a duty not to present them in their old fragmentary form before an audience of this day. We should not feel that we could resort to the old means, of improvisation on the organ, even if traditions of that sort of accompaniment had come down to us, because this would be contrary to our fundamental principles of criticism, according to which nothing essential to a work of Art must be left to the moment, that is, to chance, and all the detail must be carefully adapted to the whole. The best expedient for us here is a discrete instrumentation, having at every step most careful, conscientious regard to the intentions and the style of the original. Such an arrangement is nothing but a constructive criticism on the incomplete form handed down to us; and this accordingly must act with artistic freedom, provided only that it remain always conscious of its full responsibility.

Such an undertaking is more questionable when no gaps can be pointed out in the original; in that case the arrangement, in so far as it adds something wholly extraneous, becomes a remodelling. Under this head we reckon the attempts of Mendelssohn and Schumann to put a piano-forte part to compositions of Bach, which he wrote merely for a violin. To mention only one objection, not to be undervalued: Such an accompaniment leads us into regions of tone from which the composer purposely kept himself aloof. The deeper portions of the violin, so strongly and characteristically sonorous in themselves, become completely altered in their effectiveness by the addition of still deeper basses. It is not a matter of indifference whether an 8-foot tone sounds by itself, or on the top of a 16-foot tone; the whole character of a piece can be essentially changed by such an addition. Violin-players, who understand their advantage, will let themselves be heard without such an accompaniment, when the composition, like those by Bach, not only admits of it, but in its whole design is calculated to be something by itself. Mendelssohn and Schumann possibly only wished to bring these extremely individual masterworks nearer to the manner of our time and to the limited powers of the majority of violin-players, who are not all able to stand alone upon their own feet; but if their accompaniments are really to be taken as critical additions, if their purpose is to help out a presumed defect, then indeed the legitimacy of the procedure may be seriously disputed.

Now, undoubtedly, the above-named arrangement of Bach Preludes by Moscheles is of a critical character. While others have brought all sorts of critical apparatus to bear on the various readings of the Well-tempered Clavichord and have disputed about the comparative excellence of one or another, Herr Moscheles, too, was unwilling to be behindhand with all sorts of æsthetic objections, which he had upon his heart, against the Preludes of this work,—objections which now step before the public, not to be sure in a critical exposé, but clearly enough in the elegiac tones of a violoncello. The work indeed has also, in accordance with its critical character, a Preface; the Violoncello voice, though, has been more clear and intelligible to us, than that of the author himself. A glance at the Preface will confirm this.

Moscheles here calls the Bach works "the foundation pillars and supports of all composition," and deprecates the presumption on his own part of wishing to shake them. He only desires to make these "stately Preludes" more accessible to laymen and the larger public. He appeals to the above mentioned cases of indispensable arrangement of older compositions, to the necessary replacing of obsolete instruments by those now in use, also to the example of Mendelssohn and Schumann, whose piano accompaniments to Bach's Violin pieces he characterizes as a gilt frame that enhances their effect. He recognizes the fact that the Fugues in the Well-tempered Clavichord do not admit of a single note more or less; but he thinks "the case is different" with the other instrumental pieces of the great master,—how? we are not clearly told. But on this point the Violoncello part discourses at length; the Preface only hints that the concerted part here added is to lend a new characteristic to the Preludes, give them a modern coloring, a concertante effect.

A new characteristic? Are we to understand, then, that there was no old one? By this "characteristic" is something entirely new given to the pieces? Or does it only mean that a new characteristic steps in beside the old one? This seems to be the meaning—but, is this possible in any case? Does not the very essence of the characteristic lie in the fact of its exclusiveness? Can one in the same breath be characteristic in a double or a contradictory way? One can unite characteristically distinct parts into one whole, can bring characteristically distinct themes into mutual relations; only they must all adapt themselves uniformly to the peculiarity of the whole, not seek to impress a double stamp upon it. The freedom of motion of the members is essentially limited by the direction of the whole; hence one may make the attempt to write a characteristic part or voice to any sort of a composition, i.e. to give to this part in its whole bearing a certain independence; but if thereby one tries to give the whole a different characteristic stamp, he will necessarily destroy the old one, or at least lessen and impede its characteristic effect. No other result is logically possible; the Arrangement which now lies before us confirms this truth in every aspect.

To us, the Well-tempered Clavichord is not only "the foundation pillar and support of all composition," but, what is more, one of the main pillars of all earnest, sterling musical activity, one of the foundations which a deeper musical culture can not at all dispense with. It is not only a study for composers, out of which there is much to be learned for their purpose, but it is at the same time a fund of precious, characteristic compositions, which in their way remain still unsurpassed, which give the hearer something which he can find nowhere else. When this later, more pretentious Art, which rummages about amongst all the moods and passions of the soul, plunges us from one extreme into the other, always seeking to outdo itself in its rhetorical effects, always driven to painting the most concrete situations, yet never with its means fairly reaching this its goal—when this modern Art with all its onslaughts has wearied us out or satiated us, then have we resorted, before all else, to that work of the old master, which was to himself a darling work of his life, to which he continually turned back anew, on which, in times when his more imposing works were almost forgotten, his fame chiefly rested, from which his greatest followers have most drawn instruction and reverence for their predecessor.

In the Well-tempered Clavichord a certain unique, self-included world opens before us. What in Bach's other instrumental music is spun out in a broader and, in some sense, more loquacious manner, after more traditional forms, he has here put together more concisely; in this work he has set down the sum of his artistic convictions. Here he explores all the regions of expression which in any way interested him; here we learn his feeling for graceful, lively motion, for agreeable abandon, as well as his deep, refining, subtle tendency to lose himself in most secluded by-ways. Now he shows us, within a convenient space, how much there lies for him in a simple theme, what power of combination stands at his command; now he seems to play with the tones; now he breaks suddenly off, to wind up in majestic, recitative-like turns. He stands before us not only as the unsurpassed technical musician, but as an altogether peculiar man, who looks at things in this world with different eyes from all others, and who is thoroughly able to show them to us in a different light from any of his predecessors or followers. He is through and through a self-contained personality, furnished with the power of assimilating with himself whatever he touches and of transforming and reproducing it thereby in a unique way. One may feel himself strangely affected by this mode of feeling; one may not share the view of the world that seems to look out from these tones; but even the most disinclined will wonder at this wealth of inner life, this inexhaustibleness of artistic expression; will bow beneath the sway of this commanding spirit, which knows how to control itself as few do; will be forced to reverence a model, never before reached, of true artistic, dignified demeanor.

Beethoven's "Sonate Pastorale." Op. 28.

Third movement: Scherzo, Allegro vivace. Here we meet a group of happy children, singing, dancing and skipping about to their hearts' content. Ah, who of us can behold the innocent sport of these little ones without feeling a shadow creep over him! Who does not regret that to him the happy time of childhood is fled forever! (Trio). But this is no place for serious reflections; look, how they laugh, dance and frisk about (return of the Scherzo)! As the day advances the "little folks" are joined by the swains and damsels, and the older people, which brings us to the Fourth movement: Rondo, Allegro ma non troppo. The village musicians are briskly at work as the throng increases, and old and young are seeking to amuse themselves.

"All have come out to the day's broad light,
See, only see, how the masses rally,
Streaming and swarming, through garden and field!

This is the real heaven of the people.
Both great and little are merry and gay."

The aspect of this promiscuous assembly is, for all that, brilliant, since all appear decked out in gaudy costumes, which glitter and sparkle in the bright sunlight in a thousand hues. There is much pleasant sport carried on, but there is also much crowding and pushing, one stepping indiscriminately on the heels of another. The scene gradually assumes a serious aspect, sporting and dancing having ceased some time ago. It looks as though there were quarrelsome spirits among them. The grave, stentorian voice of one of the more sedate villagers with some difficulty gains a hearing for a moment, and earnestly remonstrates with two of these quarrelling individuals, male and female, evidently supporting the weaker party (m. 19 before the fermata); but in vain; he is unable to allay the confusion, a catastrophe is unavoidable; a panic seizes the whole company; off they fly, screaming and howling, in all directions (m. 12 before the fermata), leaving the field entirely clear (arrived at the fermata). Such scenes will happen sometimes among the children of nature. The best of it is, that they recover as easily from a fright as they are seized with it. Soon, the musicians resume their instruments, the violoncello as usual taking the lead, inviting the fugitives to come back; and all goes on happily as before. The gay aspect of the scene is marred no more, but rather increases, until towards the close the merriment of the happy throng exceeds all bounds.

So far the picture. Let us now look back for a moment over the whole ground, in order to take notice of a few interesting details, from a more technical point of view. Observe, how in the beginning of the first movement the key, D-major, and the measure, 3-4, impress themselves on the ear; how tenaciously the D holds fast to its place, while the modulation sinks now to the sub-dominant, now rises to the dominant proper, and again descends to the tonic! The close texture of this tone-web, down to the entrance of the second subject (m. 40), reminds one of the strong, firm hand of the giant Bach. The second subject consists of only four short measures; but was there ever invented a melody more lovely, more expressive?

With the seventy-seventh measure begins that remarkable passage (?), which occupies so large a place in this movement. Shall we call it a theme or subject? Shall we call it a melody,—perhaps a melody in thirds, sung by treble and bass? Or shall we call it a run, a roudelade? It is neither, or it is all of these. For the second part of this movement the rest of Prof. Marx's description, commenced above, may fitly be introduced.

"The close of the second part offers one of those signs, remarkable both biographically and psychologically, how the original phenomenon (Ur- phänomen) of the world of tones lived and worked in Beethoven. The whole second part is occupied with the leading subject—which in this work is decidedly the predominating thought—so much as even to work the root of it up to a sort of fugue in four parts (four voices). With this fugato the piece arrives at F sharp, the keynote of F sharp major, which it seizes, in order to build upon it (instead of the dominant A) the organ-point. On this F sharp the piece rests full twenty-one measures, while the short motive, taken from the leading subject, engraves itself on the third voice in the depth, mysteriously brooding; then it rouses the second voice, and is now lost in the highest region of the first voice, then again is found softly murmuring along in the deepest position of the bass. With the twenty-second measure all melodic and rhythmic motion is gone, while the harmony (F sharp, A sharp, C sharp), on its fundamental tone, sinks step by step, in slow, reluctant pulsations, through seventeen measures, down to the deepest depth, and there rests and is still. 'Thousands do not comprehend this!' one might cry out in the language of Schindler."

The third part, as is usual, brings the leading subjects and passages again, in the original key, instead of in the dominant. A short, but charming coda, charming in its sportive character, closes this movement.

The Andante opens with a simple melody in D-minor, which soon, after a semi-close, turns to F-major, thus terminating the first part. The second and third parts (the third being in fact the re-appearance of the first, now closing emphatically in D-minor) are analogous to the first. The entrance of the D-major, so unexpected and decided, appears like the bright sun shedding its effulgent light through the rent clouds of a gloomy sky, illuminating hills and valleys. The minor mode then resumes sway again, introducing the former melodies with variations. The close is quite Beethoven-like.

The Scherzo presents a striking example, how little material is needed for such a piece. The main body is worked (if the term may be permitted in a composition where all seems so spontaneous) out of two small motives, one consisting of two, the other of three notes. Still more remarkable is the Trio: a phrase of four measures, closing alternately with B and D, sustains the whole melodic structure of the three parts; and yet, has it ever appeared monotonous to any one? There are doubtless scores of pianists, who have performed this Trio many times, and never became aware that they were playing eight times, without interruption, the same melody. We have here an instance, how a melodic figure can be made to appear continually new, when presented in a different harmonic dress, even if the rhythm remains unchanged. The Trio is, indeed, a little study in harmony.

The last movement is a remarkable piece, entirely unlike the other closing movements to the various Sonatas of Beethoven. Notwithstanding the polyphonic style, employed frequently, and the seeming intricacy thereof, the texture is as clear as the form is simple. There is, besides, a rural charm pervading the whole. The opponents to the epithet pastorale will, it is to be hoped, have no objections to our using it, if not for the first, at least for this last movement. Rondo pastorale, indeed, is the proper title for this piece. The form is simply this: We separate it into the usual three divisions, besides a Coda, so as to have in the first division the first subject, here better called Rondo melody (consisting of two parts, the first of which is always commenced by the basso solo and finished by the treble); a brilliant or bravura passage, which we may call tutti; the second subject, in the dominant A, with tutti; and the Rondo melody, in the main key again; thus closing this, the first division.

The second division (in German the Mittelsatz) is represented by the modulatory or so-called worked-up part, introducing with the twelfth measure a new motive, and closing after a somewhat long tutti, with a fermata on the dominant A. The third division consists, like the first, of the Rondo melody with tutti, second subject with tutti (this time in D), and the Rondo melody again, but in G, and varied, assuming by the by an undefined shape, and pausing finally on the dominant to draw breath and prepare itself for the race in the Coda, Più Allegro, quasi Presto, where treble and bass strive to outrun each other. Finis coronat opus.

Supposing that most of my readers use Ditson's edition, they may like to have their attention called to a disturbing misprint on the 6th page, 21st measure in the treble. Expunge the dot after the double-note and write in its stead the two double-notes A—C natural, B—D, in the value of eighths (quavers). The measure is an imitation of the next but one before in the bass, and should read precisely like that. Besides, in the older edition, on the 16th page, in the 14th measure, write a tr. over the G sharp.

Fifty-first Annual Meeting of the Handel & Haydn Society, May 28, 1866.

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT.

GENTLEMEN:—I shall not now detain you with a lengthy report, since I have improved the opportunities offered on former occasions of this kind, to give you, in detail, my views as to what the aims and objects of a Society like this ought to be, and the means and measures which, in my opinion, should be adopted to promote its efficiency, and ensure its prosperity and success.

Of these measures, some have been already for many years in effective and harmonious operation, others have only recently been adopted, others yet remain for the consideration of the Society. I beg to refer you, for information on these points, to the written and printed documents now in the Society's archives.

My purpose, this evening, is mainly to pass in review the operations of the Society for the year which has just closed, with such brief comments and suggestions as the circumstances may seem to demand. The financial results of the year,—taking the additions which have been made to the Library, and are now in our possession, at cost,—as you have learned from the Treasurer's statement, is, to a limited extent a gain. But the result of our public performances for the year has proved a positive loss.

It is particularly to be regretted that the sources of our loss, are to be found mainly in connection with the praiseworthy efforts of the Society to increase their Festival fund by an extra concert, given at the close of the season, and with unusual attractions for public patronage. Hereafter, it would seem that such plan, if resorted to at all, must be carried out with greater regard to economy, and with less confidence of a support from without, in ratio with the enlarged forces and increased attractions that may be offered.

From the report of the Librarian, it appears that our already ample supply of material has received a substantial increase: this is a real and solid gain.

I learn from statistics furnished me by the Secretary, that sixty-five gentlemen have been admitted to membership with the Society,—the largest number which has ever been added in a single year. No resignations have been received, and there have been no expulsions for misconduct or breach of the By-laws. Within the year, however, two of the oldest and most valued of our associates, have been removed by death, Matthew S. Parker and John Dodd. Both were original members of this Society, and the last surviving representatives of that honored roll; both were, for many years, honorably connected with the government, and one of them, for more than a quarter of a century, has been our faithful and devoted Treasurer; both lived to complete their fiftieth year of membership with the Society, and maintained their attachment to its interests till the last. And among all its list of past and present members, I doubt if the Society can find another two who have been more earnest for its welfare, more faithful in the discharge of their official duties, more constant and punctual at public performances, more conscientious in their attendance upon our ordinary meetings whether for business or rehearsal, or who have rendered, in all their relations with us, more valuable and disinterested service in the sacred cause to whose interests we stand pledged. They are gone—these good and faithful servants—their many virtues shall always be held in filial and grateful remembrance in our hearts.

Seven performances, in all, have been given by the Society, during the season, in public, the programmes for which have comprised the Messiah, Judas Macabæus, the Creation, Elijah, St. Paul, the 42d Psalm and Hymn of Praise. The four first-named Oratorios, as you are well aware, were given with the distinguished aid of Mlle. Parepa.

The regular series of the winter closed with the performance of "St. Paul," at Easter. The benefit concert, to which allusion has previously been made, took place at a later date; in its programme was included the arrangement for chorus, orchestra and organ of Luther's "Ein feste burg," by Nicolai, and the 42d Psalm, "As the Hart pants," and Hymn of Praise (symphony and cantata) of Mendelssohn. It was given with an increased orchestra and large additions to our usual forces, from members of the "Festival Chorus" of last year. All the works thus presented by the Society, if we except the "Creation" (which was hurriedly got up, and in which the Society held the secondary and somewhat questionable position of accompanists to Parepa) have been given after much thoroughness of preparation, with increased orchestra, and the best available solo vocalists in the country, the large organ and a chorus of between four and five hundred voices.

The Rehearsals for the season commenced in Chickering's hall, early in October, and have continued weekly, and sometimes oftener, without interruption or intermission, till nearly the present time. Owing to the large increase of our numbers, it was found that the hall, which, by the liberality of the Messrs. Chickering, has so long been gratuitously open to the Society for these rehearsals, was no longer adequate for our accommodation. The use of Bumstead Hall was therefore secured for this purpose, the resources of which are ample, and the arrangement of seats admirably adapted for compacting and bringing together a large chorus for drill and practice. If the ventilating appliances of the hall can be brought up to the normal standard, the requirements and accommodations will be rendered complete.

I feel warranted in saying that more than usual interest has been manifested by the members in these rehearsals, as evidenced by a larger and more constant attendance, and a careful and praiseworthy study of the more than ordinarily difficult music they have been called upon to perform. I wish it were possible to add, that absenteeism, that bane of every amateur musical society, had been altogether reformed. But this is still a great and abiding evil.

Another fault which must be placed in opposition to the merits I have named—and it applies to public performances as well—is a too great haste, on the part of many, to leave the room before the exercises of the evening have fairly closed. This may be a necessity, to some extent, with distant residents; but the habit is one greatly to be deprecated. Nothing is so disheartening to the conductor, or so dampens the interest and enthusiasm of those who remain. It would be better, by far, if those who must withdraw before the close of the evening, would go quietly away at the usual intermission, than to make their noisy and disturbing exit at a later period of the performance. A similar practice on the part of the auditors, who may be present by invitation or by sufferance at rehearsals, is equally and, if possible, yet more reprehensible. Indeed, the disturbance from loud talking and whispering on the part of such auditors, has become so serious, that I question whether the interests of the Society do not require their exclusion from all ordinary rehearsals. Certainly this must soon be the case unless they are willing to come strictly under the same rules we have adopted and, it is hoped, will hereafter put in practice for ourselves.

In close connection with what I have just alluded to, is the existence of a growing evil at the more extensive rehearsals, which take place in the large hall, immediately prior to a public performance. I refer to the custom of some of our members, of transforming themselves on such occasions, into auditors, instead of taking their proper position in the choir. Article XVIII of the By-Laws is sufficiently explicit on this point. It reads as follows,—

"No member of the Society, when present at any public performance or rehearsal, shall absent himself from his proper seat in the choir, on penalty of forfeiture of his membership."

The actual numerical force of the chorus, as determined by their attendance at the rehearsals and concerts during the past winter is five hundred and sixty-eight, and is apportioned nearly as follows,—

Sopranos.....	176
Altos.....	128
Tenors.....	109
Bassos.....	155

This is exclusive of about one hundred and sixty whose names are still upon the rolls of membership, but who, from their distant residence, or from disability of various kinds, rarely meet with the Society.

A new and complete registration of the names and residence of the present members, and the department in the chorus to which they belong, is in progress, and it is earnestly requested of such as have been delinquent in this particular to send in their names to the Secretary, Mr. Barnes, at once, in order that the record may be made complete.

It appears from the above enumeration, that the proper balancing of our chorus is as yet by no means accomplished. The Sopranos are largely in excess, while the Tenors exhibit a lamentable deficiency in numbers. As a remedy for this undue disproportion of the several parts of the chorus, I would suggest that, for the present, the examination of candidates for admission to the Society, be restricted solely to the possessors of good tenor and alto voices, supplying only such vacancies, as may be made by resignation or otherwise in the ranks of the Basses—with a care to keep the Sopranos up to, at least, the number of one hundred and fifty. This is on the plan I have before suggested, of limiting the entire numerical force of the chorus to six hundred, and endeavoring to add to their excellence and efficiency rather than, at present, to exceed this limit.

A word in this connection as to the duties of the Committee for the examination of candidates. Theirs is a delicate and difficult task. It often happens that those who have excellent voices, and can sing readily, with good method and with effect, any piece they have learned, present themselves before this Committee for examination; but, when required to read at sight even the simpler forms of psalmody, they find themselves at fault.

The superficiality of many who set themselves up for teachers in singing, in this particular, is notorious. The Committee are perfectly right in rejecting all such candidates. This Society is, in no sense, a school for beginners in the art of reading, but rather for improvement, advancement and progress in the appreciation and practice of Music in its highest development.

The duties of our staff of Superintendents—which is now become a recognized and important corps in the administration of the Society's work—will, of necessity, increase as our numbers enlarge. I would again call their attention to the expediency and importance of reporting regularly, at every meeting, whether for rehearsal or public performance, to the Secretary, the attendance of members attached to their respective departments, noting by name those who may be absent. To this end, it becomes necessary that each Superintendent should know the names of all who compose his department, and have a sufficient personal acquaintance with every member to allow him to report upon his presence or absence. Such knowledge could be readily acquired. I would also suggest a greater care, on their part, in so placing the leading and prominent voices that they may act as guides for the rest; and these places, once so fixed, should be retained at all rehearsals, and in relative positions, likewise, at all public concerts. They should, in like manner, insist that members should sit together as compactly as possible in rehearsal, and always with their own department in the chorus; and every member, however large the chorus may be, should have his proper and invariable seat. All restless change and indifference in this respect, is prejudicial to the general effect.

Sixteen meetings for business have been held by the Board of Trustees during the year. At one of the last of these meetings they unanimously adopted a vote, creating a Special Board of Trustees, for the management of the Fund which had its origin in the Great Festival of last year; and this action of the Board is, in my opinion, so important, and has a bearing so vital upon the future welfare of the Society, that I shall make no apology for reciting the instrument of Trust in full. Which is as follows:

This agreement, made this 28th day of May, A.D., 1866, by and between the Handel and Haydn Society, a Corporation created by and existing under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, of the one part, and J. Baxter Upham and John P. Putnam of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and Nath'l. Harris, of Brookline, in the county of Norfolk, in said Commonwealth, — of the second part, witnesseth.

That, whereas the said corporation is desirous of creating, for its benefit, a "Permanent Fund," the foundation of which shall be the net proceeds from the Great Festival of May, 1865,—to be increased from the profits of future concerts and festivals, and from the donations and legacies of their friends and patrons, or otherwise;

And, whereas the parties of the second part have agreed to hold the said fund, with its future income and increase, for the benefit of the said Corporation, in the manner hereinafter specified;

Now, therefore, the said Corporation do hereby give and transfer to the said Upham, Putnam, and Harris, the sum of two thousand dollars, being the net proceeds, to the Society, of said Festival, and its increase up to the present time, to be held by them, the said Upham, Putnam and Harris, and their successors, in Trust for the following uses and purposes, to wit:—

1st. They shall invest and, at their discretion, sell and re-invest the said sum of Two thousand dollars, in such manner and at such times as they shall deem judicious.

2d. They shall pay over the annual income from said Fund to the said Corporation, if the said Corporation shall notify them in writing, ten days, at least, before the date of their annual meeting in each year, of their wish so to receive it, and a majority of the Trustees of the Fund shall assent thereto; otherwise, they shall add such income, from year to year, to the "Permanent Fund," and shall invest it and re-invest it, in the same manner as is above provided in reference to the principal.

3d. They shall, in the same manner, invest and re-invest, and dispose of the income of any future contributions to the said "Permanent Fund," which shall be made from time to time by the said Society, by donations from its friends and patrons, by legacies or otherwise.

4th. They shall make a written report to the said Corporation, at its annual meeting, of the condition of said "Fund," with such details as to its management as the said Corporation shall direct, and shall give bonds in a sufficient sum for the faithful discharge of their duties if so requested by the Government of the Society.

5th. The President of the said Corporation, for the time being, shall, at all times, be one of the said Trustees, and the said J. Baxter Upham, the now President of the Corporation, shall continue one of said Trustees, so long as he shall continue to be such President; and whenever he shall cease to be such President, his duties and obligations, as one of the said Trustees, shall cease; and whoever shall be chosen in his place as President of the said Corporation, shall be his successor in said Trust, and shall continue such until another shall be chosen such President, and so on, so long as this trust shall exist.

6th. During the time that any vacancy exists in the board of Trustees, the remaining Trustee or Trustees shall have the same power as though the board was full.

7th. This trust shall continue until such time as the said Corporation, by the unanimous vote of its Board of Trustees, for the time being, and a majority of the Trustees of the "Permanent Fund," shall revoke it, and in such event, the said Trustees shall transfer and convey to the said Corporation all the property, of every kind, held by them in trust: the same to be thereafter held by the said Corporation absolutely,—for its own use and benefit,—free and discharged from all trusts, provided that, in no case, shall this fund ever be divided among the members of the said Corporation,—and by such action the said Trustees, and each of them, shall be released and discharged from all further duties or liabilities in the premises.

8th. And the said Trustees, parties of the second part, hereby signify their acceptance of said Trust, and hereby agree with said Corporation to discharge all their duties and obligations herein contained, to the best of their judgment and discretion, being responsible only, each one, for his own wilful neglect, and not for the default or neglect of either of his associates.

In Testimony of all which the said parties have hereto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written, the said Corporation acting herein by Loring B. Barnes, its Secretary, thereto duly authorized by a vote of the Corporation.

This Instrument, as I have said, I deem to be of the utmost interest to the Society. It sets forth the fact that we have at last the nucleus of a permanent Fund, which, it is hoped, from this small beginning may grow to such proportions, as will place us at length in a position to be no longer dependent upon the assessment of our members, or the fickleness of public patronage for a support. The provisions of the Trust have been carefully made and judiciously guarded, so that no one, who may be disposed to add to the Fund, need fear that it can, by any possibility, be diverted from its proper and legitimate uses. I confidently believe that, in a community distinguished for its liberality, benefactors of Art in its highest and holiest form, will not be wanting.

Owing to the different circumstances in which we find ourselves, by reason of the continually increasing numbers of the Society, and from other considerations as well, some change in the By-Laws ought soon to be made. I would therefore suggest to the new Board an early attention to this subject, in order that the matter may be brought before the Society, and a proper committee appointed for this purpose.

It is pleasant to allude, in conclusion, to the entire unanimity of action which has characterized all the meetings of the Board during the year, and to the alacrity and cheerfulness and good feeling in which their recommendations have been seconded and carried out by the Society. And I can not close this imperfect Report, without adverting, in terms of highest admiration and praise, to the zeal and unwearied efforts of our able and efficient Conductor, Mr. Zerkow, aided by his accomplished assistant, Mr. Lang, who by their constant attendance to their laborious duties, and their kindness and courtesy of manner, have contributed so largely to the artistic success of the season.

All which is respectfully submitted.

LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

In making my annual report as Librarian of the Handel and Haydn Society, I propose to speak of the additions to the Library, during the season just closed, the losses from it, inform you of the plan of the new catalogue just completed, and give you some statistics concerning the present condition of the Library.

Owing to the actual and anticipated increase in the number of our choral force, I was instructed to obtain, at various meetings of the government during the season, enough vocal music of Judas Maccabæus, St. Paul, and the 42d Psalm, to suffice, with what we already owned, for 500 voices, and enough instrumental parts of the same works and the Festival Overture for an orchestra of 60. Accordingly, of Judas Maccabæus I obtained 34 separate vocal parts and 300 copies of Mr. Ditson's octavo edition. Of St. Paul I obtained 300 copies, and of the 42d Psalm 100 copies, all of which were of Mr. Ditson's octavo edition, giving the vocal parts in score. The addition of orchestral parts necessary to complete our sets for the above works were only 30, which were obtained in time for use at the rehearsals and concerts at which they were required. Thus, the additions actually made during the season, consisted of 700 bound octavo chorus scores, 34 separate vocal parts and 30 separate orchestral parts.

For a long time I have desired that we might dispose of all our old editions of the various oratorios, many of which are large and heavy quartos, and replace them with the octavo, or hand book form, like the new copies of St. Paul and Judas Maccabæus. Our present copies of the Messiah consist of no less than five different editions of the work, and I think I am safe in saying that no two editions exactly correspond in words and music. The advantage of the hand book form, I think every member will acknowledge, and many have proved that they feel it, from eagerness to obtain them at rehearsal or performance. This replacement, I suppose, will only be gradually brought about, and I hope that during the time required, some means will be devised to prevent the loss of the hand books we now own. Although they are all marked "Not to be taken from the Hall," many of them, I regret to say, are lost. The following is a list of books now missing from the Library. "Forty-second Psalm," 22 copies; "Israel in Egypt," 14 copies; "St. Paul," 15 copies; "Messiah," 25 copies; "Hymn of Praise," 60 copies; "Creation," 20 copies; "Judas Maccabæus," 8 copies; "Ode to St. Cecilia," 2 copies; making a total of 166 copies, worth at least $100. I do not doubt many copies have been taken from the hall with the permission of some member of the Government; still I am sure no copy has thus been loaned, except for study, and with the expectation of its being promptly returned. Although a request was made, at one of our recent rehearsals, that all books should be returned, but very few have been received. I therefore earnestly entreat that all books now in possession of any member of the Society shall be returned to me, at the earliest possible moment.

During the season, in accordance with a vote of the Government, a new catalogue of our Library has been prepared, and the whole Library re-arranged by the assistant Librarian, Mr. Bedlington. The present excellent arrangement of the Library, and the completeness of the new catalogue show how faithfully this duty has been performed. In the Library room, each shelf, case or compartment is numbered or lettered, and the books or music contained in each indicated on the catalogue. The catalogue shows how many we possess of each edition or form of a work, the number of parts for each voice, and the number of parts for each orchestral instrument. This is the first time we have ever possessed a perfect catalogue of our orchestral music. The complete orchestral music for each work, is now kept in its particular portfolio, which is lettered, marked or numbered to correspond with the catalogue. The improvement in this system can be perhaps only fully appreciated by those who have heretofore tried to select music from the Library, and should try now, aided by the new catalogue. In order to give the Society an idea of the present condition of the Library, I have prepared the following statistics:

Of the works owned by us there is an aggregate of 9,673 separate vocal parts. Of these, 6,210 are single voice parts, and 3,463 are in vocal score for chorus. The orchestral music consists of 1,174 separate instrumental parts. Of orchestral or piano-forte scores, we possess 124 volumes. In addition we have 270 volumes of various works not in actual use at the present day, but many of them possessing rare interest to our older members.

The following is a list of works of which we own sufficient vocal music for 500 voices and an orchestra of 60 instruments: The Creation, Elijah, Eli, Festival Overture, Hymn of Praise, Israel in Egypt, Forty-second Psalm, Judas Maccabæus, Messiah, and St. Paul.

A small addition of vocal and instrumental music to the following works would suffice for the present number of the Society: Dettingen Te Deum, Jephtha, Joseph, Mozart's Requiem, Ode to St. Cecilia, and Samson.

Of the following works, although of many we own a large number of copies, we should require large additions of vocal and instrumental parts to enable us to perform them with the present number of the Society: Alexander's Feast, David, Hymn of the Night, Joshua, Last Judgment, The Martyrs, Moses in Egypt, Mount of Olives, Mount Sinai, The Seasons, Seven Sloopers, Transient and Eternal, Stabat Mater, and Solomon.

When, owing to the large additions of members, it became necessary to leave the small hall where we rehearsed during the first part of the season and use Bumstead Hall, it was very desirable that our Library should be moved to the same building. The owner of the Library room, however, was unwilling to release us from the rent of it, and our removal could not be accomplished.

From the foregoing, it appears, that very valuable additions have been made to our Library during the past season, and that great improvements have been made in its arrangement and means of care and preservation. Now, more than ever, I feel it is entitled to be considered the most valuable library of sacred music in the country.

Respectfully submitted,
GEO. H. CHICKERING,
Librarian.

It will be seen by the foregoing that the entire operations of the Society for the season now closed have added nothing to the treasury, but on the contrary a small balance in favor of the Treasurer was found to exist; which however has been provided for by a subscription in the Board, leaving the Treasurer without funds.

It must however be borne in mind that the Library has been very materially strengthened by the addition of a large number of chorus and orchestral parts of oratorios; a more detailed statement of which will be found in the report of the Librarian; amounting to more than six hundred dollars; therefore, deducting the amount paid for additions to our Library, the operations of the society have really resulted in a small pecuniary gain.

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, CONN., JUNE 1.—Costa's "Eli" was performed here on the 9th ult., by the Beethoven Society. This musical body is now in its eighth year. Its progress in efficiency and influence must be regarded as a sign of intrinsic power, making due allowance for the great advance of taste and the growing desire to welcome all new enterprises in this and other arts. I have before born testimony to the merits of this Society, and the great capabilities among its members for the correct rendering of vocal part music, particularly the great oratorios.

To their experienced leader, Mr. J. G. BARNETT, we all owe a debt of gratitude. The success of this society is due to his indomitable perseverance. To skill and judgment, he joins self-possession and firmness, and commands respectful attention from those with whom he is associated. His efforts in diffusing a knowledge of the divine art in the community in which he lives, (one of the most lovely spots in New England) cannot be too highly appreciated.

The dramatic power and choral grandeur of "Eli" were faithfully interpreted by the Beethoven Society. The work, so full of excellencies and peculiarities, seemed admirably suited to the tastes, not alone of the singers and artists who took part in the performance, but to the musical community and people, for whose special benefit it was evidently written. No work has ever been performed in Hartford, that has given so much unqualified satisfaction and delight.* The choruses, with hardly an exception, were sung in the most faultless manner, and, considering the extremely difficult and complicated harmonic progressions in which Costa indulges, this is high praise. The character of Eli found a fitting representative in Dr. Guilmette, who evidently thought it worthy of his powers. It is a very difficult character to interpret, and in one sense rather ungrateful, if the artist relies for his inspiration upon applause, and that kind of noisy demonstration that generally follows startling or brilliant efforts. The character of Eli appeals to the deeper sensibilities, and therefore requires not only vocal, but intellectual attainments rarely found in one person. The Society therefore was fortunate in obtaining his services. Nothing could exceed the beauty of his delivery of the cathedral-like sentences in the first part, the parental tenderness with which he rebukes his sons, his scenes with Samuel, and the fervor of his prayers. His last scene was the most effective of all; it was soulful and thrilling, and worthy of a true artist. The Society, in recognizing his services upon this and former occasions, presented him, through the President, Chas. Canfield, Esq., a gold medal and badge pin elegantly engraved. Mr. Canfield alluded to sacrifices Dr. Guilmette had made to be with the Society, seeking their interests, rather than his own, and appreciated the Doctor's talents, the high results of study, by which he has been able to faithfully portray the different characters in the Oratorios they have performed, so as to enable the Society to give to the Hartford public, in a fitting and effective manner, the sublime works of some of the great masters. Dr. Guilmette, in acknowledging the gift, paid a very handsome compliment to the Beethoven Society of Hartford, which had now (he stated) a reputation as famous as that of its Banks and Insurance Companies. He also passed a high eulogium on the "hard-working, unassuming, accomplished conductor, Mr. Barnett."

Mr. Castle was the Elkanah and the warrior Saph. His singing, throughout, was in masterly style, and his war song enthusiastically encored. Miss Smith and Miss Campbell were the Sopranos; the former gave great expression to the part of Hannah, the latter sang the air, "I will extol thee," with brilliancy and effect. Miss Frankau was Samuel; her singing met with a deserved success. Mr. Patton gave effect to the part "Man of God." Many of the solos were at least worth a pilgrimage to hear. A beautiful toned two-banked Organ from the manufactory of M. Baumgarten & Co., New Haven, was put up for the occasion. This enabled Mr. W. J. Babcock, the Organist of the Society, to display his powers to good advantage. The Orchestra was magnificent. We have frequently heard them in Boston, but their playing never seemed so spirited and effective as when their efforts are associated with the Beethoven Society. The solo instrumental portions were beautifully given. How could it be otherwise with such artists as Zöhler, Ribas, Elts, Hamann, Heinecke, Ryan, the Regesteins, Meisel, the Eichlers, the experienced Suck, Fries, Stein, and other conscientious musicians? Mr. Barnett led his orchestra and singers with true dictatorship; although a very difficult oratorio to conduct, it was done with perfect ease and confidence. He certainly must have been inspired by the genius of the composer, to have such power and control over the minds of the performers.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 25.—Our concert season closed with a Matinée given on Thursday, May 17, at the Foyer of the Academy of Music, by Mr. CARL GAERTNER. The audience was one of the most thoroughly appreciative we have ever seen, and the many musicians present were enthusiastic about the programme and the perfection with which it was rendered. Mr. Gaertner was assisted by Mme. Abel, the pianist from New York, the Philadelphia Classical Quintette Club and others.

This was Mme. Abel's first visit to our city, and she met with the warm reception which as a highly cultivated artist she merited. Mr. Gaertner, in whose hands the violin has always more richness and power, broader and more singing tones than we have heard elsewhere, was grander than ever upon this occasion. During his solo, an Andante and Scherzo by David, he electrified his audience; and in Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, with which he and Mme. Abel opened the concert, he seemed indeed to breathe in the spirit of the master, so noble, so utterly without flaw of conception or execution was his performance. Mme. Abel, too, gave ample satisfaction in the piano part of this great work, being throughout artistic and correct. This lady played also the Chopin Polonaise in E flat op. 22, with much spirit, truly reproducing every varying shade of expression. Then, too, Mme. Abel and our own talented pianist, Mr. CHAS. JARVIS, played upon two fine-toned Steck 'Grands' the mournfully beautiful Schumann Andante, op. 46. Two of Mr. Gaertner's songs, "Slumber, O Slumber," and "Good Night," both works of real worth and beauty, were sung by request by an amateur tenor, who gave besides from the Huguenots, "Ihr Wangenpaar," with Viola obligato, the latter taken by Mr. Gaertner. The concert ended with the Mendelssohn Quintet in B flat, op. 87, played by the Quintette Club.

This Quintette Club is an organization of which with just cause we are proud. The gentlemen belonging to it, Messrs. Carl Gaertner, Chas. Jarvis, Theo. Kammerer, C. Plagemann and C. Schmitz, are all artists of high standing, and, with Mr. Gaertner as leader, they have attained great perfection. Mr. Gaertner, whom the Boston musical public will remember, is one who has worked zealously for the cause of classical music, and has accomplished much. An article in the Evening Bulletin, passing in review some of the musical labors of this gentleman, refers thus to his disinterested devotion to his Art:

In 1858 he came to Philadelphia, and since that time has been a faithful, earnest laborer in the field of Art, in our city. Working as he has done for a principle, regardless of personal interest, it has ever been his fortune to have others reap plentiful harvests, where he has sown in weariness and toil. Yet this has always seemed a matter of indifference to him, for he has been working not for himself, but for the Art he reveres, and seeing its interest truly advancing, he has cared for nothing more. He has inspired others with a portion of his own enthusiasm; he has made musicians. In fact I could point out the names of many who are now widely known, who owe all their higher cultivation to him. He has taught them to know the dignity of their profession, and to elevate their own positions accordingly. Those who have had the privilege of studying under his direction, take pleasure in speaking of the earnestness with which he strives to awaken in his pupils an appreciation of the greatness of Art.

I must give you in brief, some of the things this gentleman has done toward the cultivation of a true taste for music in Philadelphia. He gave in the winter of 1859, at the Foyer of the Academy of Music, our first public series of classical Soirées. It was not until the season of 1859—60, that Messrs. Wolfsohn and Hohnstock commenced their first series. In 1860 Mr. Gaertner gave a second series of six Soirées at Chickering's Rooms, and in 1861 gave a weekly series of classical Matinées, the first ever held here, assisted by the Quintette Club. Since 1862 he has led all the concerted music and played many violin solos in the Soirées of Messrs. Cross and Jarvis, and this past season in the Matinées of Mr. Jarvis, by which the former were replaced; and has given yearly one or two concerts of his own, sometimes orchestral at the Academy of Music, sometimes chamber concerts at the Foyer or the Musical Fund Hall.

In the winter of 1864-1865 he led the Quintette Club, then consisting of Messrs. Gaertner, Jarvis, Cross, Plagemann and Schmitz, in twenty-five weekly matinées of classical music. In looking over the programmes we find 4 trios, 4 quartets, and 2 Quintets by Beethoven; 1 trio, 5 quartets and 7 quintets, by Mozart; 2 trios, 1 quartet, and 2 quintets by Mendelssohn; 5 quartets by Haydn; 1 by Weber and 1 by Gade; 1 quintet by Spohr; 1 by Schubert, 3 by Onslow, 1 by Veit, besides several Duos for violin and piano, amongst others the Schumann Sonata, op. 121, and the Beethoven Kreutzer Sonata. He gave, besides, many violin solos, of which I would mention the "Song Scene" by Spohr, and the Concertos in A minor and in E minor by Rode, as never having been played here by any one else. Our pianist, Mr. Jarvis, played solos by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Weber, Mendelssohn, Hummel, Bennett, Henselt and Liszt; and we had violoncello solos from Mr. CHAS. SCHMITZ. These matinées were attended by a respectably large audience, of which at least one half came regularly, thus deriving not only enjoyment but real profit.

Mr. Gaertner has also done much for German singing societies. The Sängerbund, of which he has had charge since 1858, has, under his direction, acquired great eminence, and is now by far our first society, "and the members of this Association are proud of their director, gratefully ascribing to him, as the very soul of the Society, all their success." He has also from time to time had charge of other Societies, which, during the period of his conductorship, made great improvement. It was he who first introduced Parlor Concerts on the plan of the European Court Concerts, and he has so interested others in this field, that "in some instances they have forgotten that he was the originator, and come to look upon the work as their own." As a teacher, both of vocal and instrumental music, Mr. Gaertner has done great service.

BOSTON, JUNE 9, 1866.

The Past Musical Year in Boston.

Another musical year has fled, and we may now look back over it, count up its treasures, and see how much good music it has brought within our reach. The Handel and Haydn Society's great Festival of May, 1865, brought that year's music to a close. This time we have had nothing corresponding to it in magnitude; yet the past winter and spring have been in the best sense more truly musical than any for a long time before. It may safely be said that the number of superficial miscellaneous concerts has borne a smaller proportion than hitherto to that of really artistic, classical occasions, and that the tone, the spirit, the programmes of nearly all the concerts have been better. This has been owing in no small measure to the influence of the new institution of "Symphony Concerts" under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association, in which for the first time pure programmes, the best audience and disinterested management were guaranteed, and the fact experimentally proved that very large audiences can be intensely interested and delighted by concerts made up of nothing but the highest kind of music, without any admixture of the more ad captandum; and also to the new life which has been infused into our old Oratorio Society, and the attractive power which, since the Festival, it has continued to exercise in drawing ladies and gentlemen of culture and of real earnest love of art into the choral ranks.—We begin our summary with

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

Last year we had only the Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union. This year we had the six "Symphony Concerts, (orchestra of 55 instruments, conducted by Zerrahn) the twelve concerts of the Orchestral Union, (orchestra of 30, same conductor), besides more or less of orchestral performance in the Parepa and other miscellaneous concerts. The list of important compositions which these have afforded an opportunity to hear is rich enough to record, as follows:

a) SYMPHONIES. (Symphony Concerts): Beethoven, No. 4 and No. 8. Mozart, in G minor.—Haydn, in B flat.—Schubert, C major. Schumann, C major.—Gade, No. 1, in C minor.

(Orchestral Union): Beethoven, No. 1, 4, 6 (twice), 7 and 8.—Mozart, E flat, G minor.—Haydn, B flat.—Gade, C minor, B flat.—Mendelssohn, A minor ("Scotch").

(Musicians' Protective Union): Beethoven, No. 7.

b) CONCERTOS. (Symphony Concerts). Piano forte: Beethoven, No. 3, in C minor (B. J. Lang), No. 4, in G, (Hugo Leonhard), No. 5, in E flat (Otto Dresel). Violin: Mendelssohn, E minor (Carl Rosa).

(Orchestral Union). Violin: Beethoven, in D, Andante and Finale (Henry Suck).—Vieuxtemps, No. 2, in C sharp minor (Wm. Schultze). Clarinet: Julius Rietz, op. 29 (Thos. Ryan).

(Musician's Protective Union): Piano: Chopin, in F minor (C. Petersilea).

(Mme. Parepa's Concerts). Piano: Beethoven, C minor, first movement (twice).—Chopin, Andante and Finale, F minor—both by Dannreuther.—Mendelssohn, G minor (Lang).—Violin: Spohr's Scena Contante (twice), Mendelssohn, in E minor, the Adagio and Rondo, (Carl Rosa).

c) OVERTURES. (Symphony Concerts): Beethoven, Leonora, No. 3, Coriolan.—Mendelssohn: Melusina, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Hebrides.—Weber: Euryanthe.—Cherubini: Anacreon, Wasserträger.—Schubert: Fierabras.—Schumann: Genoveva.

(Orchestral Union). Weber: Oberon, Euryanthe.—Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night," Heimkehr aus der Fremde.—J. Rietz: Concert Overture in A.—Bargiel: Medea.—Rossini: Gazza ladra, Semiramide, "Tell."—Cherubini: "Anacreon."—Auber: Zanetta, Sirene, Lac des Fées.—Berlioz: Franc Juges.—Norbert Burgmüller: "Dionysius" (twice).—Wagner: Tannhäuser.

(Protective Union). Lindpainter: in F.

(Parepa Concerts). Beethoven: "Men of Prometheus."—Weber: Freyshütz.—Rossini: La Gazza Ladra.—Nicolai: "Merry Wives."—Flotow: "Martha."—Auber: Fra Diavolo, Cheval de Bronze.—Mendelssohn: Das Heimkehr.—Reissiger: Yelva.—V. Lachner: Fest Overture. Kreutzer: "Night in Grenada."—Wallace: "Lurline."

(Brothers Formes). Spontini: "Fernando Cortez."—Flotow: "Die Matrosen."

d) MISCELLANEOUS. Piano with Orchestra: Weber's Polonaise in E, transcribed by Liszt (B. J. Lang); Mendelssohn: Serenade and Allegro Gioioso, op. 43 (twice—J. C. D. Parker, and Miss Alice Dutton); B-minor Capriccio (Dannreuther).

Bach's Toccata in F, arranged for Orchestra by Esser (Symphony Concerts).

With voices: "Midsummer Night's Dream" music entire; two choruses from Mendelssohn's "Antigone", Chorus of Dervishes and Turkish March from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," (Symphony Concerts).

Of the above named works (and the list is far from complete under the head of Miscellaneous) the following were produced here for the first time: Schumann's Symphony in C; the Clarinet Concerto by Rietz; the F-minor Concerto of Chopin (for the first time entire); the overtures to Anacreon, Fierabras, Genoveva, Medea, Les Francs Juges, Dionysius, Lurline and Cortez; the Polonaise by Weber; the Sorenade &c., by Mendelssohn; Esser's arrangement of the Bach Toccata.

II. ORATORIOS, CANTATAS, &c.

The great choral works with orchestra performed during the year have been: Handel's "Judas Maccabæus (twice) and "Messiah," Haydn's "Creation" and "Seasons"; Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "St. Paul," "Hymn of Praise," Forty-second Psalm ("As the hart pants"); Nicolai's Religious Festival Overture with Chorus ("Ein feste Burg").—"St. Paul, "The Seasons," and the 42nd Psalm were new, at least to the present generation of music-lovers, in Boston. For the "Seasons" we were indebted to the enterprise of Mr. B. J. Lang; for all the rest to the Handel and Haydn Society, the official reports of whose annual meeting, printed in an earlier part of this paper, will tell the rest of the story. They have now the nucleus of a Festival Fund, and we trust that next year they may be ready for another noble Festival. The above list of sacred works, however rich, is still poor in that it shows not a single composition by Sebastian Bach. Is it not time to begin the study of the Passion music, or the Magnificat, or at least one of the Cantatas? (We have not counted the performance as an oratorio of the Fidelio of the "immortal Beethoven" by Grover's German Opera troupe.)

III. OPERA.

Boston has enjoyed only one short visitation of Italian opera during the past year, and then we had Maretzek's Italian supplemented by Grover's German company. The former had for principal soprani Mme. Carozzi-Zucchi, Miss Kellogg, Mlle. Bosio; Contralto, Miss Adelaide Philipps, who, however, we believe, scarcely appeared at all; tenors, Mazzoleni, Irfe and Reichardt; baritone, Bellini; basses, Antonucci and Müller. The latter had for soprani Mmes. Johannsen and Rotter, Mles. Nadai and Dziuba; tenors, Habelmann and Himmer; basses, Hermanns, Steinecke and Lehmann,—all old acquaintances except Mlle. Naddi, who appeared but once, and very acceptably, as the Princess in Robert. It was a short season of a fortnight in the latter half of January, with an extra week of the Germans alone; but that fortnight was an intensely feverish period of factitious demi-fashionable excitement, opera all the time, both night and day, uncomfortably crowded houses, hack-nied programmes, the only novelties (on the Italian side) being two French operas, the Africaine of Meyerbeer, which was played thrice, and the comic Crispino e la Comare of the brothers Ricci, once. Then there was I Puritani, with Kellogg;

Lucrezia Borgia, Ione, Trovalore, &c., with Zucchi, and whether Ernani, Norma, &c., &c., why should we remember?

The Germans played two admirable things which they always do admirably, namely, Fidelio and La Dame Blanche; also Der Freyschütz, in which the charm of Frederici's Agatha was wanting; for the rest, Martha, Faust and Robert le Diable, in which, especially the last, Mme. Rotter won plenteous laurels.

Of Chamber concerts, Organ concerts, &c., next time.

Concerts.

The BOSTON MUSICIANS' UNION gave their second annual Grand "Sacred" Concert, in aid of their Charitable Fund, in the Music Hall, on Sunday evening May 27. This is a kind of mutual protection league of nearly all the musicians of the city who blow or draw bow in Symphony Concerts, theatres, "Minstrel" houses, military bands, &c. We know not all their secrets; but two of their plans are open: one, mutual relief in distress, which is a good one; the other, the dictation of uniform prices for the services alike of good and bad musicians (of Mustker and Musikanten), of common rules about rehearsals, &c., more questionable. Their first "monster" concert, last year, in the Boston Theatre, was financially successful. Not so this time. Partly owing to internal differences and the retirement of Mr. Zerrahn from the conductorship (on the ground that a common understanding, if not a rule, was violated by the introduction into the programme of an ad captandam composition of one of their own members, Mr. Koppitz, his colleague in the conductorship), the sale of tickets was exceedingly small, and it was only by the giving away of hundreds that a fair show of audience was brought together. This was the more to be regretted on account of Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILBA, the young pianist, who was to make his first appearance here in his own home since his return from Germany. In his principal piece, the F-minor Concerto of Chopin, which he played entire, he was badly accompanied, the orchestral parts being lifeless, often coarse; yet this injured the impression of the work as a whole, rather than that of the technical mastery, artistic feeling and expression of the pianist as such. With less of easy strength and certainty, perhaps, than his friend Perabo, he seemed to play with more enthusiasm; and certainly he must rank very high in all points of execution, delicacy, force, light and shade, and good conception. He was recalled with great enthusiasm, and gave, without accompaniment, the extremely difficult Andante of Henselt's Concerto, which he had played the week before in New York. It was a gigantic achievement, scarcely qualified by a slight flagging of tempo in that long, relentless succession of double handful chords. Two of the most difficult and most interesting of the transcriptions by Liszt, from Lucia and "The Erl-king" of Schubert, were wonderfully well played. We cannot help counting the want of a Chickering instrument among the odds against which the young artist so triumphantly contended.

The withdrawal of Mr. Zerrahn left Mr. KOPPITZ, of the Boston Theatre, sole conductor of the concert. The 7th Symphony of Beethoven is enjoyable even in spite of bad performance, and this time it appeared under a somewhat new aspect. There was solidity and breadth and sometimes a rich euphony; but as a whole the rendering was coarse and dead, the orchestra having gained in quantity at the expense of quality, in body rather than in life. Some of the tempi, too, were bad; for instance, the stately introduction to the first movement was taken so slow, that when it came to the answering calls of flute, &c., before the setting in of the Allegro in 6-8 time, it seemed as if the suspense would never end.

The same heaviness and coarseness marred the bass Aria from St. Paul: "O God, have mercy," which Mr. RUDOLPHSEN knows how to sing so well.

The rest of the concert consisted of Guglielmi's florid Gratias agimus, sung by Mrs. H. M. SMITH, with flute obligato by F. ZOEHLE; and of two noisy pieces, for beginning and finale, in which all the brass and "Janissary music" was brought into action, swelling the orchestra to the neighborhood of 100 instruments, namely: Lindpaintner's Overture in F, and a dashing "Fackeltanz" by Koppitz.

Mr. HENRY CARTER, organist at the Church of the Advent, and certainly one of the most zealous, and generously enterprising and persevering of our musicians, had a benefit concert in the Music Hall on Saturday evening May 26, of which the staple consisted of the singing of the boys of the Advent choir, a dozen in number, whom he has been training with great care and, it appeared, successfully. We heard only the latter portion, but were quite charmed with the beauty of the voices of Master Buttrick in the leading solo of Rossini's three-part "La Cava," in Verdi's "Non fu sogno;" of Master Laster with him in Mendelssohn's "I waited for the Lord," and alone in a song by Balfe; and of Master Sayer in Reichardt's "Thou art so near," &c. All showed, for their age, a rare degree of execution and expression. Bating some hardness and overloudness, the singing of all the boys together was very enjoyable.

Other pieces in the programme, which we had to lose, were Handel's "Come, ever smiling Liberty," by Masters Breare and Laster; "Haydn's "In native worth," by Mr. Daniell; "Rejoice greatly," by Master Clark; "Angels ever bright and fair," by Master Breare; the Angel Trio from Elijah; some extracts from Spohr's "Last Judgment," &c. Mr. Beeching, with a powerful bass voice, sang from the "Creation." Haydn's "Toy Symphony," in which the boys were aided by the brothers Suck and Stein's double bass, was quaintly droll, homely and old-fashioned in ideas, but after the strict cut of a Symphony. Other instrumental pieces were an Organ piece by Mr. Carter (Variations on the Russian Hymn), and part of a Beethoven Trio in E flat, played by violin, 'cello and Organ instead of piano.—The audience in general appeared to be much delighted with the concert.

HARVARD COLLEGE.—A very interesting series of subscription concerts will begin this afternoon in Appleton Chapel, consisting of Organ and Vocal Music, under the direction of Mr. J. K. PAINE, the accomplished College organist and teacher. The object of the concerts is to defray the cost of the recent important repairs and improvements made upon the Chapel organ. Mr. Paine will play the great Prelude and Fugue in A minor and the Toccata in F by Bach, Ritter's Sonata in E minor, and part of Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat. An amateur choir of mixed voices will sing Hauptmann's Salve Regina, and selections from Mozart's Requiem, Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion. Choruses from Bach's Passion music are in preparation for future concerts.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting, held in Bumstead Hall, May 28, the doings of the Society for the past year, its present condition and prospects were shown in the Reports, which we print in to-day's paper; and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President—J. Baxter Upham; Vice President—O. J. Faxon; Secretary—Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer—George W. Palmer; Librarian—Geo. H. Chickering; Trustees—J. S. Sawyer, George Hews, Charles H. Johnson, F. N. Scott, O. F. Clark, S. L. Thorndike, Levi W. Johnson and John A. Nowell.

NEW YORK. Our Mr. EICHBERG's sparkling little comic operetta, "Dr. Alcantara," is having a great run in Gotham, under his own conductorship, at the new little opera house in West 14th Street. With such singers as Mmes. Richings, Mozart, Zelda Harrison, Messrs. Castle, Seguin, Peakes, &c., and with better orchestral and choral means, it of course has a much fairer chance than at the Boston Museum. It has also been given in Brooklyn, and in Hartford, too, and meets with universal praise and eager crowds. We are afraid they will charm Eichberg away from us!

The other musical event of the past week in New York has been the long promised "Orpheon Festival" of Mr. JEROME HOPKINS, at the Cooper Institute. We copy from the Weekly Review, June 2, fully recognizing, with it, the untiring labor of love which Mr. Hopkins, in spite of all his eccentricities, is performing in the cause of popular musical education:

It took place at Cooper Institute and contrary to our expectation was badly attended. Mr. Hopkins—good worker as he is in a good cause—does not enjoy the confidence of the public, and this we ascribe to the fact that he makes enemies with an avidity which is lamentable, and with a recklessness which is unpardonable. We have descanted on this topic elsewhere. Let us hasten to say that at the Jubilee Mr. Hopkins's compositions were not predominant. He had indeed but three pieces on the programme—we thought he would have had four or five; an overture called "Manhood": a March, and a little "Easter Anthem" (69 Hymn). The first is a meritorious production, effectively instrumented, and containing ideas which are clear and perspicuous. Like all young writers Mr. Hopkins gives too much importance to subjects which should be entirely subsidiary, but it is something to say that the subjects are clearly defined. The anthem we can not praise. It lacks all the qualities of a sacred composition. It is neither emotional nor melodious. The march we did not hear. The "Orpheons" instead of being eight hundred strong were perhaps two hundred and fifty in number. They have been taught to sing at sight, and this is the first grand step towards everything in music. We would like to add something more, but the opportunity was not permitted to us to do so. Boys can be taught to read with great facility. Any teacher of the young knows this. But it is hard to make them keep time, and still harder to prevent their bawling. These dual difficulties Mr. Hopkins has not overcome. Recognizing as we do most cheerfully his energy and perseverance we must still object to the very loose way in which he has impressed upon his pupils a sense of time and tone. The nasality of some of the boys yesterday proceeded simply from lack of proper instruction. The Hallelujah Chorus unhappily illustrated everything that was defective in Mr. Hopkins's mode of tuition. That grand and overwhelming composition has never to our knowledge been rendered so tamely. * * *

The bill of fare was printed in pamphlet form, and like that furnished at Taylor's Saloon it gave on one side the dishes and on the other a series of valuable advertisements by which giddy people might be guided in the purchase of marble mantles, popular music, elevated oven ranges, plated ware, and other useful articles.

1. A Wedding March composed by Mr. Jer. Hopkins. 2. Hymn 145 by Beethoven. 3. "He was despised" by Handel (omitted). 4. Choral by Marot and Bess. 5. Soprano Solo, "Semiramide" by Rossini, sung by Mlle. Boschetti. 6. Song with chorus and echo "Falling Leaves" by T. F. Molt. 7. Overture, "Manhood" by Jerome Hopkins. 8. National Hymn by Junior. 9. The "Vermont Farmer" by Carolu. 11. Piano Solo "Hungarian Rhapsody" by Mr. S. B. Mills. 12. Trio for three boys by Mar-purg. 13. Chorus from the "Messiah" by Handel. 14. Duo from "La Favorita," sung by Signora Boschetti and Signor Orlandini. 15. Polonaise from Struensee by Meyerbeer. Mr. Theodore Thomas conducted the orchestra in the purely instrumental pieces, and Mr. Jerome Hopkins tried to do so in the others.

NEW MUSIC HALL IN NEW YORK.—The new Steinway Hall is built in connection with and directly in the rear of their marble warerooms, Nos. 71 and 73 East 14th Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, which were finished two years ago, and have been occupied by the Messrs. Steinway since.

This edifice has a front on 14th Street of 50 feet and a depth of 84 feet.

The Concert Hall, now being erected, is built in the most substantial manner; it extends from the rear wall of present building through to 15th Street, a distance of 123 feet. The Hall will be 75 feet wide and 43 feet high. The basement walls are granite, 3 feet thick, the first story walls 2 feet 8 inches, and the walls of the Concert Hall 28 inches thick from floor to ceiling, with heavy supporting columns all laid in cement. There are two centre walls, running the entire length of the building, from the foundation directly under and supporting the beams of the Concert Hall floor, each wall 20 inches thick. The stage will be placed at the end fronting 15th Street, and the main entrance will be from 14th Street; but there are also two doors of exit on each, 7 feet wide on either side of the stage, leading directly into 15th Street, thus allowing the Hall to be emptied in an incredibly short space of time. Fronting 15th Street and along side the Hall on its westerly side, an additional building is being erected, containing the artist's dressing rooms, even with the stage. The upper story will contain the windchests, and some of the heavy work of the organ. There will be two galleries (one above the other) at the end of the Hall towards 14th Street, which will extend on either side of the Hall about one third of its length only.

The Hall will be finely decorated, and lighted and ventilated in the best possible manner that modern science affords, regardless of expense. It will be heated with steam, the steam generator being located outside of and some distance from the building. The front on 15th Street is being built of the finest Philadelphia front brick, with brown stone trimmings and finely ornamental pillars and caps. Connecting with the main Hall is a large room in the second story of the front building, 25 feet wide and 84 feet deep, affording room for 400 persons, so that there will be ample and comfortable sitting room for 2,500 persons. The fine organ, from St. Thomas' Church, of 32 Stops, has been purchased, and will be fitted up to serve temporarily until the Grand Organ is finished. On the whole it will be the finest and most elegant concert hall in the country, worthy of the Metropolis of New York.—Saturday Press.

NEW YORK.—The Academy of Music, in Fourteenth Street, was totally destroyed by fire, on Monday night, May 21st. Grau's Italian Opera Company had performed that evening Halevy's grand opera "La Juive," and the house had scarcely been cleared of its occupants, before the janitor and the gasman, going their rounds to see that all was safe, discovered smoke issuing from underneath the left hand side of the parquet. They tore up the seats hastily, when a volume of smoke issued which drove them from the place, and on issuing from the building to gain assistance, they perceived flames bursting from the upper windows on Fourteenth Street. This could not have been accidental. The janitor, Mr. Rullmann, immediately returned to save his family, who lived in the building, among them his mother, nearly ninety years of age. He rescued them all, but with great difficulty. Before any effective aid could be rendered, the fire had gained such headway among the combustible materials of the stage, that nothing could check its course. The Academy was entirely gutted, also the Medical College, Inne's piano forte manufactory, and the large restaurant on the corner of Third Avenue. We deeply regret to state that several firemen lost their lives in their endeavors to save the property. The loss of so prominent a public building is unquestionably a severe loss and a great inconvenience to a large class of the community, but we have reason to think that from this calamity, ultimate good will arise for the public. The Academy was built by a party of gentlemen headed by Mr. Phalen, who owned the ground on which it stood, each taking a certain amount of stock, the possession of which conferred privileges, very favorable to the holders, but highly prejudicial to the interests of the manager and the public. It gave them exclusive possession of a large number of the best seats, at all performances, with the right to dispose of them by gift or sale, on such nights as they did not wish to use them personally. The consequence was that a large number of stockholders' seats were constantly on sale, to the serious injury of the manager in a financial point of view. These gentlemen procured an act of incorporation from Albany, under the pretentious title of "The Academy of Music," which was to cover not only a place for operatic performances, but a school for singers, instrumentalists, theory, &c., &c. We need not say that this was all pretence. No school was established, nothing was done for Art, excepting to provide a place where operas could be given, in order to secure some interest for the capital expended.

The cost of the building, lands, &c., was behind nearly four hundred thousand dollars, and the rent was necessarily so enormous, considering the stockholders' exclusive privileges, that almost every management became bankrupt in the endeavor to sustain themselves. The house was wretchedly designed in every particular. The auditorium was too large, and the stage too small, there was not a decently proportioned room in the whole building.

We examined the auditorium before certain alterations were made, and found that there were several hundred seats from which no view of the stage could be obtained. The enormous gallery, called the amphitheatre, calculated to seat many hundreds of people, two-thirds of whom could not see the top of the curtain, was a ridiculous waste of room, and was worth nothing as a means to swell the receipts of the house. There was no supper-room to render the building really available for ball purposes; no small hall for concert purposes, and no suites of rooms to accommodate the people of the mythical Academy of Music. Its acoustic powers were by no means of a high character, and save for the impressiveness of its ill-devised, architecturally wretched, but gaudy and glittering interior, it was as unfitted for musical purposes as could possibly be conceived. It was a large monstrosity, resulting from a total ignorance of all principles of taste on the part of the committee, and a want of ability on the part of the architect. It was opened to the public by J. K. Hackett, with Mario and Grisi, who could not make it pay, and was relieved by the stockholders, who burnt their fingers, and resigned the pleasures of management after a trial of a week or two. Afterwards Ole Bull, Maretzek and Strakosch combined and failed magnificently. Then Messrs. Phalen and Colt essayed with the same result, followed by Mr. W. H. Paine, who saw fifty or sixty thousand dollars pass away in a brilliant managerial dissolving view. Afterwards it passed into many hands, Max Maretzek, Strakosch, Ullman, Thalberg, Grau; now one, now the other, controlled its destinies, or rather it controlled theirs, and but very few have realized money by their enterprise. The last season but one of Max Maretzek's management, being, perhaps, the single exception of a really brilliant success. By its destruction many plans have been frustrated and heavy losses sustained. Max Maretzek is unquestionably the severest sufferer of all. He lost the scores, vocal, instrumental and choral parts of over seventy complete operas; the entire of his vast and expensive wardrobe, and all his scenery, properties, &c. These could hardly be replaced for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for they were the accumulation of the labor of years. On these there was an insurance for only ten thousand dollars. But Mr. Maretzek suffers a still further loss. He has made his engagements for the coming season, and only last week he sent out a heavy sum in gold to pay the advances for the artists he has engaged in Europe. Now he has no place in which he can use them, and will probably have to suffer loss of the advances already made abroad, and possibly a large sum for the cancelling of engagements already made here. His position is one of peculiar misfortune and embarrassment.

Mr. Grau has also been a heavy sufferer. Paying but a transient visit to the Academy, he did not insure either the music, dresses, or the properties for the operas, which he produced, all of which perished in the flames on Monday night. His losses are calculated to be between thirty and fifty thousand dollars, on which there was no insurance. Much of his material was stored elsewhere, and thus escaped destruction. Mr. Grau cannot but feel his loss severely, and will probably receive some token of sympathy both from his artists and the public. More fortunate than Mr. Maretzek, he has his opera houses secured, having become lessee of the new French Theatre, in Fourteenth Street, and the Tacon Theatre in Havana. His losses will not interfere with his future movements, as he will be fully prepared against the arrival of Ristori in September.—American Art Journal.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Two soirées of chamber music took place on the 24th and 25th ult., at Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School, making twenty-eight which they have had in a course of years. The performers were Messrs. MASON, THOMAS and BERGNER, from New York, and the two programmes choice. The first contained Beethoven's Trio in D, op. 72; the Ballad in A flat by Chopin; a Mozart Sonata in A, for piano and violin; and Mendelssohn's Variations for piano and violoncello, op. 17. Second Programme: Trio in F, op. 80, by Schumann; Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 69, Beethoven; Violin Sonata by Tartini; Trio in E flat, op. 100, Schubert.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

There's no time like the old time. Song & Cho. A. B. Hutchinson. 30

"When you and I were young." was a gay time, of course. The poets seem to think so, and here is a song for the old folks, with pretty music.

Wearing of the green. Song for guitar. Haydn. 50

Green is a fashionable color just now, all over the verdant country, as well as among the frons and Fendans of the Green Isle. A good Irish song, and has a handsome Irishman on the title page.

There's none so fair as she. Song. G. Perren. 30

A very sweet ballad, by one, who after looking around the world, found still the fairest and sweetest one at home.

Through the roses. Song. C. F. Bates. 30

These two lovers were very fortunate in the season of the year. The song is fragrant with the presence of the queen of flowers.

Maid of Athens. Song. Eastburn. 30

The poetry is by Byron, and of course, classic, with many allusions to the various well-known Grecian names, of world-wide fame. Good melody.

Faithless Nelly. Song and Chorus. G. Barker. 30

The behavior of this unconscionable girl should meet with the stern reprobation of the public, who are invited to buy copies of the song, and ascertain what was the matter.

Instrumental.

Eight piano pieces, by W. Bargiel. 1.50

This name, quite new to us, is just now quite a popular one in Europe, and will soon be, here, owing to young Perabo's interpretation of them. Bargiel's style is peculiar, and shows marked originality. Pianists in search of novelties should send for these pieces, which cost, collectively, $1.50, but Nos. 1, 5, 6 and 8, cost 20 cents, each; while Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 7, cost 35 cts., each.

Sunbeam schottisch. E. C. Gilbert. 30

Very bright and cheerful, and quite taking.

Robin Adair. Transcription. B. Richards.

The reason that some transcriptions have been rather "dull to me" no doubt was, that "Robin was not there." But here comes Robin, more musical than ever, and greatly enriched by the contributions of the mind of the great transcriber. A very pleasing and useful piece.

Weber's last waltz. "Young Minstrel." 20

Donna del Lago. " " 20

The Young Minstrels are famously cared for now-a-days. Most music teachers have a sad memory of the weary piles of music one used to turn over, before finding a proper piece for a pupil. Now, such pieces abound; and the above set are nearly all excellent for beginners.

Books.

SAINT CECILIA'S DAY. A Cantata. Words translated from the Dutch. Music by

J. B. Van Bree. Cloth, 1.25
Paper, 75

Choirs and musical Societies will find this an uncommonly pretty affair to introduce into their practice, the coming musical season. Without being a massive or powerful work, it keeps up a flow of rich and smooth music throughout, and is fresh and interesting to the end. The scene is laid in Frascati, "fairest vale of Italy."

In point of difficulty, it is not above the reach of common singers, and may be brought out in Seminars, with a little outside help.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Bach "Pure and Simple," or with Modern Accompaniments.

MELODIC-CONTRAPUNTAL STUDIES: A Selection of 10 Preludes from J. S. BACH's Well-tempered Clavichord, with an obligato Violoncello part composed to them by I. MOSCHELES. Op. 137a. (The same with a Concertante part for a Second Piano-forte. Op. 137b).

The field in which Bach moves is naturally more limited than that of his followers standing on his shoulders. Quite foreign to the art of his time are the two extremes, which constitute the chief field for the period after him, when Art, grown secular, borrowed its ideals for the most part from the theatre, to-wit: the extreme of Sentimentality (we use the word in the comprehensive, not the one-sided and reproachful sense), and that of Humor. Yet even there the Bach style of Art never wholly lost sight of its point of departure, the Church, however widely it had overstepped the line. It closes what may be called the period of mature youth in Art:—if we were obliged to characterize it in a word, we could think of nothing better to say (paradoxical as it may sound at first), than that it is a thoroughly youthful Art. As yet it is untouched by seductive worldliness, its passions not unchained, its sensuality scarcely awakened; its lively imagination is still pure; it adheres still to those traditions of the church that have come down from the age of childhood, seeks here its ideal, feels no impulse to withdraw itself from the discipline of this old and venerable institution. The details of human existence have scarcely yet set foot within its circle of vision; they do not fetter it; the unity of its consciousness is still undisturbed, not even seriously threatened upon any side.

Nevertheless it has fully out-grown its child's shoes; in the youth lurks the man; his energy betrays itself already in the stern, downright character which is peculiar to chaste, manly youth; all the individual qualities, with which he has to fight his way through life, are his, beforehand, in all their original power and freshness, as they never can be afterwards. The feelings have all their exuberance still: yet the moral and intellectual peculiarity is fully developed in all its essential traits, although only to a sharper eye discernible always in the introverted and retiring nature of youth. Nothing is wanting, but the firm and resolute stride into the bustle of the world, which will partly further, partly disturb these peculiarities, at any rate will rob them of the charm that lies over the half-opened character of youth. And so Bach's depth gains often enough an almost child-like expression; that contemplative, intuitive, inwardly absorbed tendency, which is less occupied with the world than with a youth's yearning preconception thereof, shaped in his own peculiar imagination, is the ground-type of all his production. As yet he does not mingle in the throng of the masses, into whose most immediate vicinity his followers step; he and his prominent contemporaries from the ideal height of their Art overlook wide regions, scarcely bounded distances, in which only great groups are discernible, the detailed outlines melt away, and human life and action individually vanish. Individual life lives only in the contemplative principle, whose sensibility, excited on all sides by such an outlook, is raised and quickened to the extreme point. He is so busied with himself, with the fulness of his own inner life, that nothing yet impels him to enrich that by the reception of foreign elements and to reproduce impressions so received objectively in Art. He still possesses that self-intoxicating subjectivity of youth, that child-like sense of the Bible, to which the deepest mysteries appear revealed, but peculiar to which at the same time is a certain bashful reserve, so that it never goes out of itself with what is purely personal:—in sharpest contrast to the modern manner, of yielding oneself before the eyes of the public to the glow, the paramount ascendancy of one's own feeling, and blabbing out the inmost secrets of the heart before all the world.

To these radical peculiarities the polyphonic style of that time thoroughly corresponds, and this alone, with its ever shifting play of dialectic subtlety, which yet by the consistency of its motion is held as it were within limits, almost never jumping intervals, but always gliding smoothly on,—the most decided opposite to the rhetoric of the modern style producing its effects by contrast. In it is mirrored that contemplative character, the severe school of that time, the discipline under which it kept its pupils. Yet at the same time it sets upon the most complex images the stamp of repose and serenity; this holding fast to the chosen matter, to the themes and figures secures a certain objective character even to the most extravagant turns. This freedom from all modern tendency, this limitation of the artistic purpose to the nearest end, that of presenting above all something sterling in an artistic sense, is in a certain measure necessarily implied in this style, with its limitation to its method. The latter, essentially homophonic style, even where it sets all the arts of counterpoint in motion for its purpose, is characteristically distinct from that, since it does not adhere to the old strictness of form, but uses the old means with quite another view and an altogether different economy.

The reader must excuse these, scarcely new, variations on an old theme—but it seemed indispensable to contrast the old well-known features in one picture with the "new characteristic." Let us now see how the new frame suits it. We select at once the first Arrangement, that of the universally familiar first Prelude of the First Part, in C major.

If Bach renounces in this piece all melody, in the stricter sense, the problem with him evident was, on the threshold of his work, to present something by exclusively harmonic means which should have a peculiar meaning by itself and by this very fact. The characteristic of the piece lies therefore in this limitation. There is nothing but a succession of uniformly broken chords of nearly related keys—and yet, what effect! Bach begins in the middle and close positions; in almost uniform progressions the harmony extends and widens more and more, every new chord rolls in like a wave of the sea, that lifts itself with might only to subside into itself immediately, but presently again, identically the same, though seemingly new, to emerge in another place. And so the whole is like a gently moved lake, in whose even undulations all the mysterious and resistless power of the element is already visible. The harmony floats up and down, now spreads itself out widely downward, now returns to the original positions; it seems to follow merely its own gravitation, its inherent natural laws. Hence the movement nowhere checks itself, it is thoroughly elastic; in it all is life-like, full of life, and yet this life cannot be seized and fixed to any given point. There lies an elemental power in this conception. No one can escape its influence in the rendering. It is simply impossible to play the uniform looking piece, so destitute of all pure melodic structure, in one tone, with equal force and equal accents: the nuances of the performance suggest themselves in the natural elevations and depressions of this play of waves. The Prelude is a masterpiece, which leaves no doubt about its meaning, and at the same time a cabinet piece of piano-forte literature, since it is perfectly adapted to the nature of the instrument: as indeed nowhere in the older literature are there more and finer piano effects to be found—not of modern cut, but yet of modern nicety of feeling—than in the Well-tempered Clavichord.

Herr Moscheles, it seems, is quite of another opinion; he seems never once willing to let the piano-forte effect stand for itself, for he does all he can to disturb it. He treats the Violoncello in the modern manner, lets it mingle its importunate tone, its snuffling sentimentality in those chords in all positions and all ways of playing with the utmost recklessness, degrading them to harmonic substrata quite indifferent in themselves. Not the slightest conception of anything at all like what we have just described, no respect for any intention of Bach whatever, not even for the finely calculated economy of the whole. The Arrangement begins with a short introduction of four measures. First comes:

Then, in similar formation, two corresponding measures on the Dominant and Tonic follow. In this introduction nothing in particular is said; and yet this Forte is already sufficient to rob the real beginning of all charm, and to annihilate all the magic of the middle regions of the instrument in which it moved. It will hardly be necessary to call attention to the fundamentally false bass of the second half of the first measure, against which the G of the piano part protests loudly enough; but it remains to say, that, even if it were right, the mere change of harmony in the first measure must raise very disturbing doubts about the whole harmonic economy of what follows.

With the Prelude itself begins the Violoncello.

It perseveres in this quite characteristic tone, fitting similar turns to all the wider harmonies, full of peculiar pathos. Ever and anon it trills out a deep bass tone fortissimo, and instantly leaps up again into the highest tenor regions. The Prelude is repeated, so that it may be heard with these phrases in different octaves. The passage in which this structure culminates in respect to style, may speak for itself:

That octave leap of the ninth, a, on the Dominant Seventh chord, with the Fourth prolonged, is perhaps the very extreme of what can be set in contrast to the Bach way of writing.

This "characteristic" of the Bach piece is certainly new; in so far as no one until now has ventured upon like combinations of the most distinct styles, one may safely call it hitherto unheard of. Meanwhile the material of this new characteristic is very old: it is the homophonic melody of the beginning of our century in its most dry and meagre form, which happily, through the influence of Beethoven, may be considered as put aside. A few garnishings from the salon style of more recent times cannot deceive us about this: it is a stereotyped and yet embellished, a modest and yet pretentious and self-satisfied manner, which died out long ago, while the music of the old masters blooms in perpetual youth. For the honor of the Present we protest against the attempt to give "modern coloring" with these means. The efforts of Mendelssohn and Schumann, who understood how to learn from Bach, have not been fruitless: the modern music stands nearer to Bach, than that of that heavenly-seeming, sentimentalizing period, which not in its technique alone, but in its whole art, was soulless. So there is nothing left but the concertante effect, which—unfortunately—cannot be disputed.

For our part, such an Arrangement of Bach is more than an abortive effort; it is an attempt upon the life of that mighty genius, whose labor only now, after a whole century, has wrung from the world its long denied place in the history of Art. It is out of our power to discover any mitigating circumstance in such an undertaking. It is scarcely possible for any one to be more thoroughly deluded about the incompatibility of characteristic differences; and therefore one cannot use a more striking illustration of the dangers of mixed style, than by pointing to these Preludes.

We do not doubt the well-meant purpose of Herr Moscheles; we only protest most energetically against all experimenting with masterworks, which undertakes to interpolate a foreign element into them, thus setting oneself up as the judge about their characteristic keeping. This is an offence not only against good taste, piety, but against all the fundamental perceptions on which our whole artistic culture rests. Such experiments inevitably run to caricature. He who disfigures Bach, to introduce him into the modern society of laymen; he who presents him there in the costume of a prima tenore from some tamely romantic opera; he who makes his very earnestly meant compositions the pedestal for a modern virtuoso, that never bends over his grateful instrument without coquetry, under a harmless mask sacrificing everything to catch the applause of the weak public through a thousand artifices,—he, by his own free will, withdraws himself from good musical society, of which he has hitherto been counted as a member.

The severity of this judgment has made us in duty bound to proceed loyally and not select the weakest among these Arrangements for our point of attack. They are all prepared after the same method or pattern, in which the characteristic feature is, that it tries to force a union between things characteristically different and mutually repugnant. With the exception of a few bars in No. 5, which are reminiscences of Mendelssohn, the same old-fashioned sort of melody is used for all; only where Bach shows a stricter and richer polyphony, only there, when there is no other outlet, does the Violoncello seek to adapt itself to his way of writing. This leads us to the last point of view that remains to be touched upon: What is to be said of these works, if we consider them according to their title, "Melodic-Contrapuntal Studies"?

In this relation, too, the undertaking of Herr Moscheles carries its punishment in itself: the Moscheles counterpoints make a sorry show by the side of Bach. Either they give those harmonic intervals which are skipped in the piano, or they go in thirds and sixths, so far as practicable, with one or another of Bach's voices; but always they are too short or too long, and naturally, just in the most interesting places, they are overpowered by the Bach parts, so full of character, so irresistible, and are compelled to go in all humility with one of these, and to desist from all bad modern habits. At best they succeed now and then in letting a motive of Bach resound in places where the adroit master, having other things in view, from a wise economy, allowed it to be silent, lest he should become wearisome with it. So all these counterpoints—of course we refuse this name to those phrased melodies—give us nothing new and nothing characteristic, but simply what is superfluous and can be dispensed with; thus they have no artistic right.

Gluck's "Iphigenia" in London.

(From the Athenæum, May 12.)

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mr. Mapleson has given to Gluck the best stage-chance which that sublimest of operi-composers has had in England since we have known Music. The production of "Iphigenia in Tauris" some years ago, by a second-rate company of Germans, at the St. James's Theatre, could not but be a failure. The stout organ of the heroine, Mlle. Stückl Heinefetter, was as unfeeling as a barrel organ. She was coarse and ungainly as a woman; looking, as Mendelssohn described another prima donna, "like an arrogant cook," and null as an actress. The Orestes bawled; the chorus was small; the dances were ridiculous; the dresses were fit for Rag—not May—Fair. Not much more successful was Mr. Gye's attempt to recommend "Orfeo," by the aid of that incompetent singer and exaggerating actress, Madame Cailag, whose best effects amounted to a clumsy copy of Madame Viardot's; as far from the original as is some fourth-rate lithograph from the complete work of art it travesties. Without an Orfeo, the opera, which has only three characters—all female parts—must fall to the ground. Not reasoning from facts so patent as these, Gluck's detractors in England (and there are absolutely musicians who fancy they are proving their sagacity, also loyalty to Mozart, by sneering at Mozart's superior in antique opera) shrugged their shoulders and raised their eyebrows, and spoke of the master as "one who did not understand counterpoint,"—therefore, whose works had gone by. It was rather "a counterblast" that Mr. Halle should be able to produce three of Gluck's operas entire, without action or costume, as concert-music!—and under the further disadvantage of an English text—and this to a mixed Manchester audience of some two thousand persons,—with the most unequivocal and decided success. Then, further, the opera annals of Paris and the German capitals tell a story which should unstump the deaf ears of Prejudice,—only Prejudice desires not to hear. Granted adequate execution, Gluck's operas are no more dead than are "Lear," "Hamlet," "Julius Caesar," "Coriolanus." The life of eternal truth and beauty is in them; and when properly expressed and interpreted, this must strike home to the hearts of all who like something more stately than "La Traviata," and something more solid, whether in story or in song, than "Martha."

To ourselves, who do not conceive that one man of genius is exalted by the depreciation of another, every occasion of hearing one of the five masterpieces of serious opera worthily rendered claims a welcome of the utmost cordiality. On returning to "Iphigenia in Tauris," the short-sighted folly of the verdict adverted to struck us more forcibly than ever. If Gluck's be music gone by, if it do not belong to the noblest, most poetical order of Art, then Euripides is "gone by,"—then Laocoon and the Parthenon frieze are gone by, or may be rated among those works which are tolerated as specimens of "a school." What do the sceptics make of the magnificent introduction with the wild, whirling storm?—what of the chorus and dances of the Scythians?—what of the airs of Orestes and Pylades in the second act, and the scene of Orestes with the Furies, and the entrance of Iphigenia, and her wail over the ruin of a royal house, with its choral burden of the priestesses? Dramatic contrast can be carried no farther, rise no higher, than in these two superb scenes. The third act does not fall off, since it contains some of the most impassioned recitatives, and the trio in which the priestess decides, by the instinct of blood affection, which of the two prisoners is to be selected for sacrifice (how wonderful as an expression of vacillation!); the contest of friendship, and the delicious airs of Pylades; but it may be called the least showy of the four, as not containing any choral music, while it taxes the artists the most severely as demanding the greatest subtlety of action. Observe, too, that the recitatives throughout lose inevitably by translation. The French words bite the ear with a keenness for which there is no equivalent in English or Italian. Who can represent such a phrase as set with such poignant anguish by the master? Then, in the fourth act, let us note the treatment of the temple scene throughout, and remind the scorners that the chorus of Priestesses is, after all, only a two-part chorus, rich and solemn as is the effect produced by the stately grace of melody and the purity of harmony.

Von gläubigen, von bückenden,
Sont crut fois moins affreux,

A few words more ere we close, for to-day, the above few and incomplete remarks on this opera. Nothing can exceed the distinctness with which the three principal characters are colored; nor the felicity and yet simplicity of the instrumentation. In brief, the preciousness of treasure contained in "Iphigenia" is proved by the extent to which it has been pillaged, and by those very writers for whose sake the silly pedants disdain Gluck.

But "adequate execution" is not easy to procure. Not only does the music demand the highest conception, and the action the finest dramatic finish, but also peculiar voices. As was remarked in the Introduction to the English version, edited some few years ago by Mr. C. Halle (Chappell & Co.), "If tradition may be trusted, the artists who presented Gluck's operas to Paris—Mlles. Sophie Arnould and Levasseur, MM. le Gros, Larivière, and others—were not singers as we accept the word. The bass parts in 'Iphigenia in Tauris,' those of Orestes and Thoas, may be both said to demand exceptional voices, and if these cannot be found they can hardly be sung as they were written.* The French, till lately have always tolerated a mixed voice, such as, to give an example, that of Chollet, whose part of Zampa falls into the legitimate province of neither tenor nor bass. But Mr. Mapleson's three principal singers were more than usually well fitted for their occupation. Mlle. Tietjens is heard to her best advantage in this music; her action, too, was generally good, though in the trio (act 3) referred to she might have followed Gluck's music more sensitively by the silent by-play of her indecision. Signor Gardoni, though his voice wants the mordant quality demanded, was elegant and expressive as Pylades. A better Orestes could not be desired than Mr. Santley, whose high notes were what is precisely wanted, and whose delivery of the recitatives was of a pathos and a purity rare in these days. But his great prison-scene was spoiled by the utter misunderstanding of the stage manager. The Furies who torment Orestes should not be jumping acrobats, dressed like gipsies at a fair. The same criticism applies to the Scythians in the first and last acts; and we offer it without scruple, because, though the blot is great and bade fair once or twice to be perilous, it could be easily amended, and because there has been obviously every desire to present the opera worthily. Signor Gassler did his best as Thoas, but the part is not within his grasp. The chorus of Priestesses was tunable, but too universally loud; the orchestra was good; and the tempi for the most part right. Some of the scenes, especially that of the third act, were very picturesque and in the real classical taste. The Italian translation by Signor Marchesi, seemed to us exceedingly well done: to be the work of a gentleman and a singer. To sum up,—supposing the flagrant mistake corrected to which we have referred,—a performance of higher excitement and interest to all who love "the best and honorablest things" (Milton's phrase) in Art, could not be imagined, and that it made a strong impression on the public was proved by marked attention from first to last, and frequent applause,—though the same might be less violent than that which was to be heard at the recent revival of "I Puritani."

Mendelssohn.*

(From the London Musical World).

When at Easter, 1825, I left the University of Leipzig to enter that of Berlin, my respected Professor, Wilhelm Müller (author of the Griechenlieder, etc.) gave me a letter of introduction to the Mendelssohns, in whose house he had himself, a short time previously, spent some very pleasant weeks. Thanks to his recommendation, and still more to the extraordinarily hospitable spirit that reigned in the family, I was, during the whole period, five years, of my stay in Berlin, received with a degree of kindness most gratifying and valuable to a man like myself, who would otherwise have led a somewhat lonely life and not have had many to advise him. The more I become cognizant how little I was calculated by my habits and disposition, to contribute ought to so brilliant an intellectual circle, and that consequently I could not help receiving more than I gave, the more grateful must I feel for the kindly toleration with which I was treated.

The life at No. 3—now the "Herrenhaus"—in the Leipzigerstrasse was then indeed a brilliantly intellectual one. The family were as richly endowed with every kind of natural gifts as they were bountifully provided with earthly riches. The last were employed neither to maintain a vain system of ostentation nor of luxurious living, but on the contrary to promote every possible development of intellectual resources and keep up a truly refined tone. The parents and their four children—their happiness then unclouded by any untoward event—were harmoniously united to each other by unusual warmth of affection and congeniality of character, and produced a most pleasing impression upon every one who entered their house. Their existence was a domestic one, inasmuch as they felt little inclination to go out, being most partial, after the labors of the day, to spending the evening in familiar intercourse with one another. It was seldom, however, that they were found quite alone; they either had a number of young people who were on a friendly footing with them, or else their circle was filled up with another class of visitors. But it was seldom that there was what is called a regular party. Whoever felt so inclined, went, and whoever took a pleasure in going was welcome. Science, Art, and Literature, were equally represented. Humboldt was a frequent visitor. Whenever he went, the rest of the persons present would gradually form a circle round him, for every other occupation or amusement soon yielded to his interesting conversation. He could go on, for hours together, without a pause, relating the most attractive facts from out the rich stores of his experience. Hegel was another visitor, though he contributed little to the general entertainment, seeking rather, in a quiet game at whist, relaxation from his arduous intellectual labors. Except when he was there, I can hardly remember cards ever being played in the house. Celebrated and uncelebrated people, travellers of all kinds, and especially musicians, though not to the exclusion of other artists, found their efforts judiciously appreciated. The conversation was always animated and spirited.

The education of the children was carefully calculated to foster the rich stores implanted in them by the Creator. Felix was the general favorite, without, however, being, in the slightest degree, spoiled. If he ever gave his father cause for dissatisfaction, he was spared neither the reproving look, nor the serious, but invariably calm rebuke. We entertained the most unbounded reverence for the head of the family. When he glanced with his large, short-sighted eyes over his spectacles, he had the power, by a wonderful expression of his, of enforcing respect. The beautiful relations existing between the father and the son are very evident in the published correspondence. Willingly, however, would the father take part in the jokes of the young people, and derive pleasure from so doing. I still see his amazed appearance, when, on one occasion, at the conclusion of dinner, the youngest son intoned a four-part canon, written by Felix the same morning, and secretly handed round: "Gesegnete Mahlzeit, zusetz Mahlzeit, wohl bekomms!"* The boyish delight at surprising the father burst in, with song, so suddenly upon the previous conversation, and the father gazed with such amazement at the little wag, that the first attempt was interrupted by a general fit of laughter. It was not till repeated that the movement could be properly executed.

That the boy Felix should not go to school, but be taught, partly with his sisters and partly alone, was quite in keeping with his peculiarly reserved and gentle nature, and advanced him the more quickly, because it enabled him to enter more deeply into the subject, and developed uninterruptedly his character. On the other hand, however, I think I perceive in this fact the reason of his feeling easily offended and out of sorts, and of his never being altogether at home in general society. The softness of his disposition, never having been hardened, could not easily overcome disagreeable impressions. Perhaps this susceptibility might have been lessened had he, when young, gone through something of the rough training to be obtained among a number of school-fellows.

He pursued his musical studies in company with his elder sister, Fanny, who was long his equal in composition and pianoforte-playing. There existed between the two a mutual appreciation and affectionate esteem, which were certainly unusual. They executed together scores so charmingly, that on one occasion when, after a lapse of many years they played him something—it was the ballet from Die Hochzeit des Camacho—their master, Berger, who was not very liberal of his praise, sprang up from his seat, as though quite carried away, and exclaimed: "Why, my children, you play quite first-rate!" ["Aber, Kinder, ihr spielt doch auch ganz famos!"] In the first book which he published of his Lieder,

* It is the custom in Germany, after dinner, for the company at table to say to each other, "Gesegnete Mahlzeit!" ("May Heaven bless the meal!"), or words to that effect, amounting to a sort of secular grace, and it was this that Mendelssohn had set to music.

Felix included some of his sister's, though he joked her about the mode in which she had managed Grillparzer's ponderous text in Op. 8, No. 3. She, on the other hand, twitted him with the false octaves from f to a at the end of the first verse of Lied No. 5, and he defended himself by saying that the stringed instruments ought to close with the f in the soprano, and the wind instruments come in with the a. The sisterly musical fidelity with which Fanny clung to her beloved brother all her life could not have had a more beautiful end than, during the rehearsal of his music, which she was conducting, and while she was in the midst of her delight that everything was going so smoothly, for her to be suddenly struck down in a fit, and give up her life without a pang.—With Rebecca, his youngest sister, he read Greek, as far as Æschylus, so that in this particular again the family was not wanting in common pursuits and good understanding. He was very fond of playing with the merry Becky, and used to pinch her cheeks when talking to her.

Felix was indeed a wonderfully gifted being. Leaving out of consideration Music, as the central point of his life, his natural gifts were exhibited in the most various ways, without any vain parade of them on his part. He was, for instance, a vigorous and skilful gymnast. The horizontal pole and the bars stood under the trees in the garden, and, shortly before the concerts which used to be given at home every fortnight, at twelve o'clock on Sunday morning, even when he had to play the piano, Felix thought nothing of having a half hour's good turn at gymnastics. On one occasion, he was summoned straight from the horizontal pole to the piano; but he had just run a small splinter into his finger, and the consequence was that he left marks of blood upon the keys during Beethoven's E flat major Concerto, and I carefully wiped them away while he was playing.—He was a very good swimmer. During all one hot summer, we used to bathe nearly every day at Pfuel's Baths, and I was annoyed because, when struggling against one another in the water, he always got the better of me, and sent me under, though I was the taller and stronger of the two. On account of the great distance of the baths, at the Silesian Gate, Mama provided a carriage, and the consequence was that I drove home with him nearly every evening that summer. After tea we regularly had music, which was best, perhaps, when we were alone. At that time, he never extemporized as he subsequently did. His own compositions he never played, as a rule, unless especially requested to do so. After tea was, in so far, an unfortunate time, because we generally went on till nine o'clock, and then the drummers of the guard passed under the windows beating the retreat from the Leipeic Gate to the offices of the Minister of War. It was by no means rare for this to come precisely in the Adagio, disturbing us, of course, in a very disagreeable manner. Even when the drummers were at a distance we could hear them gradually advancing, the nearer they approached the greater being the hubbub, until, when it reached its highest point, the window-panes rattled again. Any one who ever heard the melting tones of Mendelssohn's playing, and saw how his soul was absorbed by the magnificent creations of art—how he entered into them, and how his feeling for them was expressed on the gradually drooping lids of his beautiful eyes—will comprehend how such discordant sounds jarred upon our reverential feelings. When we got over the interruption, too, we knew we had to expect it on the march back. On one occasion, Mendelssohn jumped up in the midst of the movement, exclaiming angrily: "What stupid, monstrous, childishness!" It is true that we never thought of exercising ordinary precaution and going out of the way of the evil spirits.

Mendelssohn was, likewise, a good horseman. On the sole occasion I rode with him, we went to Pankow, walking thence to the Schönhauser Garden. It was about the time when he was busy with the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. The weather was beautiful, and we were engaged in animated conversation, as we lay in the shade on the grass, when, all of a sudden, he seized me firmly by the arm, and whispered, "Hush!" He afterwards informed me that a large fly had just then gone buzzing by, and he wanted to hear the sound it produced gradually die away. When the Overture was completed, he showed me the passage in the progression, where the violoncello modulates in the chord of the seventh of the descending scale from B minor to F sharp minor, and said, "There, that's the fly that buzzed past us at Schönhauser!"* He was also an elegant dancer, a circumstance which, when he was a youth, procured him many friends. In consequence of this, his birthday was once celebrated, to please him, by a masquerade. Skating was the only thing at which he was not a good hand. On the one solitary occasion that I succeeded in prevailing on him to try it, he suffered so much from the cold, despite his large fur gloves, that he probably never repeated the experiment.

As in such pleasing exercises, so also in the sphere of intellect, his natural gifts were variously exhibited. He played chess admirably, a game, by the way, of which his father, also, was very fond. That he surprised his mother on her birthday with a translation which he had himself made of Terence's Andria, and which his tutor had sent to the printer's, is a fact with which I only became acquainted outside the house. He never boasted of such things. Kösel was his drawing-master; and, though I am not qualified to give an opinion of productions of this description, yet I may state that Mendelssohn possessed a feeling for the artistic conception of nature as well as for plastic art; he was capable of appreciating with intelligence and enthusiastic admiration the masterpieces of both ancient and modern time. Anything connected with mathematics, however, appeared to be less in his way. In vain did I once attempt to make him understand why the Polar Star, which happened just then to be shining beautifully clear and bright, was alone sufficient to guide us over the four quarters of the globe. He could not master the line to be let fall, in his mind, perpendicularly on the horizon, the extension of the line of sight backwards through the eye, and its intersection at right angles with the side-line.

How he composed, I enjoyed only one opportunity of witnessing. I went one morning into his room, where I found him writing music. I wanted to go away again directly, so as not to disturb him. He asked me to stop, however, observing, "I am merely copying out." I remained in consequence, and we talked of all kinds of subjects, he continuing to write the whole time. But he was not copying, for there was no paper but that on which he was writing. The work whereon he was busy was the grand Overture in C major that was performed at that period but not published. It was, too, a score for full band. He began with the uppermost stave, slowly drew a bar-line, leaving a pretty good amount of room, and then extended the bar-line right to the bottom of the page. He next filled in the second, then third stave, etc., with notes and partly with notes. On coming to the violins, it was evident why he had left so much space for the bar; there was a figure requiring considerable room. The longer melody at this passage was not in any way distinguished from the rest, but, like the other parts, had its bar given it, and waited at the bar line to be continued when the turn of its stave came round again. During all this, there was no looking forwards or backwards, no comparing, no humming over, or anything of the sort; the pen kept going steadily on, slowly and carefully, it is true, but without pausing, and we never ceased talking. The copying out, therefore, as he called it, meant that the whole composition, to the last note, had been so thought over and worked out in his mind, that he beheld it there as though it had been actually lying before him. I subsequently saw other compositions when half finished, at Friedrich Schneider's, for instance, but the bass part was invariably written out, frequently figured, a musical figure, too, being jotted down here and there in the various instruments, and the remainder still unwritten. "I fill that up afterwards," observed Schneider. It was, however, a question whether the effect of this mode of composing is not to produce too much filling up, and cause a noisy overloading of the work, while, in Mendelssohn's mode of proceeding, every separate portion was definitively fixed, in connection with the onward flow of the whole, not merely with notes, but with pauses as well?

Mendelssohn's character had a deep feeling of religion for its basis. That this wanted the specifically church coloring is a fact on which we disputed a great deal in our earlier years. As an unconditional Schleiermacherite, I was then almost incapable of recognizing Christianity in any other shape, and, consequently, wronged Felix.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. The two events of the opera last month were the reappearance of Mme. Grisi, after five years' pledged abstinence from the London operatic stage, and the production of Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris. The first of Grisi's performances drew the most brilliant audience of the season. The piece was Lucrezia Borgia; the result—read the Orchestra's description! (Grisi cancelled her engagement shortly after):

On Saturday, Mme. Grisi—after having taken we know not how many last farewells of the public—was so weak and ill-advised as to attempt another personation of one of those characters which once were amongst the grandest of her extensive repertoire—the 'Lucrezia Borgia.' Gladly would we pass over this lamentable event in silence, for of all the fiascos that have ever been witnessed, never perhaps was there so sad and painful a one as that to which the once great 'Queen of song' was foolish enough to expose herself. As a matter of course, when the greatest prima donna of former years was assisted upon the stage from the gondola, to meet the sleeping Gennaro, she was received with a perfect furor of applause. How great, then, was the falling off, when, at the close of the cavatina by which ten or fifteen years ago she brought down the house, not a hand testified to anything approaching to pleasure at her coming back again to the scene of her former glory! The worst remains however to be told. How grievous was it to hear the positive laughter that could not be restrained, when the curtain fell upon the Prologue; and the many unmistakable proofs of disapprobation that followed as the opera proceeded! As to histrionic power Grisi never perhaps was more herself than on Saturday night—but the voice was nowhere; all its sympathetic beauty has vanished; its intonation is no longer certain; its force has degenerated into a mere scream.

Iphigenia was played several nights with increasing success. We give the Athenæum's account of it on another page.

Mlle. Tietjens, Sig. Mongini as Raoul, and Herr Rokitsansky, in the Huguenots, are generally praised. Next came the entrées of Mlle. Ilma de Murska, who a year ago created such a sensation,—then, as now, in Lucia. The first impression seems to have been confirmed. She was supported by Mongini and Gasier. Of her Sonnambula the Times says:

Whether her daring traits of vocalization are always thoroughly successful or not, their originality, and the impulsive manner in which they appear to be thrown off, enlist immediate sympathy; and they are applauded in either case. In impassioned moments, too—to cite one example, the scene following the discovery of Amina in Count Rodolpho's bedroom—Mlle. de Murska is so intensely in earnest, abandoning herself so entirely to the sentiment of the situation, that the illusion becomes complete, and the faltering accents of her voice thrill in the ear with all the eloquence of truth. This highly dramatic scene, perhaps her most striking display of power on Saturday night, took the audience by storm. "Ah! non credea mirarti," the touching apostrophe to the flowers in the final scene, though given with undoubted feeling, wanted repose; there was too much gesture, and too sensitive a consciousness for a sonnambulist; but no sooner awakened to positive existence than Amina was herself again; and the celebrated "Ah! non giungo," uttered with singular fervor, and embellished—the second verse especially—with a redundancy only to be sanctioned by success, raised the enthusiasm of the house. Thrice was Mlle. de Murska called before the lamps, twice responding to the summons in company with Signor Mongini and Mr. Santley.

After several repetitions of such standing topics as the Huguenots, Lucia, Martha, Traviata, &c., Meyerbeer's Dinorah was performed (last week in May) with Mlle. de Murska as the heroine. The Orchestra says:

If the truth be told, the Hungarian prima donna did not succeed so fully on Saturday night as her more ardent admirers anticipated; inasmuch as, although her conception of the brain-sick heroine was original and pretty, she wanted force to give thorough effect to that mental impulse under which she is hurried forward continually to take her audience by storm. That Mlle. Ilma de Murska's constitution is anything but strong is evident. It is enough to look at her slight and delicate figure, narrow chest, and anything but fleshy limbs, to discover that her mental energy is far greater than her physique. How, too, our ungenial climate—more ungenial this year than it has been for nearly a quarter of a century—must try so slight and delicate a frame may easily be conceived. At times on Saturday there were bursts of effort, that proved how strong the histrionic passion is within her; but nature could not go beyond the powers she has sparingly granted, and when called upon, did not give the response that was felt by none more positively than by the lady herself, to be absolutely necessary for the demands of the moment. The music is most exacting, and requires the greatest facility and delicacy of execution. It will permit of no ornamental addition, for unless sung in time, with strict adherence to the constantly changing rhythm with which all the concerted music abounds, it loses its effect, and becomes not only indistinct but disagreeable to listen to. Now Mlle. Ilma de Murska's forte is to heap ornament upon ornament, more frequently improvised than studied; and thus, when tied down to severe rule, the task is irksome to her, and she evidently becomes impatient. Yet, in spite of such drawbacks, there can be no question that Mlle. de Murska's Dinorah is a clever, original, and artistic creation....

On Wednesday "Il Don Giovanni," with the following extraordinary combination of talent, proved an immense success, and secured one of the largest houses of the season, in spite of its being produced on an off night:—Don Giovanni, Santley; Leporello, Seale; Masetto, Bossi; Don Ottavio, Gardoni; Commendatore, Foli; Elvira, Sinico; Zerlina, Harriers-Wippen; Donna Anna, Tietjens. It is enough to say that with such a cast it was impossible there could be the slightest failure in the presentation of Mozart's chef-d'œuvre. The two chief features of the occasion were, of course, the appearance of Harriers-Wippen and Santley as the two leading characters. The Zerlina of the former is founded on the German rather than the Italian method, and is by no means so saucy or piquant as that of Patti. Nevertheless, it is a pleasant rendering, and one that will win its way in public estimation. Santley has improved immensely upon his first version of the libertine, having evidently studied the part with the greatest patience and assiduity. Of Tietjens all that is necessary to be said is comprised in the single sentence—There is no such a Donna Anna now upon the lyric stage!

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The month of May brought nothing new or rare in the selection of operas. One or two new singers, and the reappearance of several prime favorites, seem to have been relied on for the main attraction; and familiar, even hack-nied, pieces furnished good enough pedestals on which to show them off. A few sentences, culled here and there from the reports of the London musical journals, will show about what it has all amounted to.

* These words remind me of the significance people are so fond of attaching to modern music, and of their partiality for asserting that it conveys to them sharply defined ideas. Friedrich Schneider was exceedingly displeased at the system, and advised the "freie deutsche Musik" ("Free German Music"), as standing on higher ground than this "Programme Music," which he would acknowledge at most in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Mendelssohn said that after Beethoven had taken such a step it was no longer possible to ignore it entirely. In the Mossesville und glückliche Fahrt Overture, there is a most charming melody serving to re-introduce the first notes of the introduction; it begins on the third, then rises to the fifth, and ends upon the octave. I told Mendelssohn that it suggested to me the tones of love which, thanks to the prosperous voyage, is entranced at approaching nearer and nearer the goal of its desires. He said that such was not his notion in composing it; he had thought of some good-natured old man sitting in the stern of the vessel and blowing vigorously in the sails, with puffed-out cheeks, so as to contribute his part to the prosperous voyage.

May 12.—Madame Vilda is happy in the possession of one of the most magnificent soprano voices which have rung in the ears of the actual generation. Equal throughout its register—the higher notes bright, clear, and sonorous, the middle round and mellow, the lower rich and powerful—there is nothing we can conceive of which such a voice should not be capable. It enchants at once; and the more it is heard the firmer is its hold, the more thorough the persuasion that its resources are inexhaustible. In some features it recalls the voice of Sophie Cravelli, in our time the most splendid and capable since the voice of Malibran was silent—but this, of course, without reference to its artistic employment. If it is true, moreover, as is generally reported, that Madame Vilda is a novice, having played only three or four times in a provincial town of Austria, and once or twice at Berlin, there is good reason to believe, not only that she is endowed with the most priceless natural gift a singer could desire, but that she has elements which may enable her to become a perfect mistress of the vocal art. In spite of nervousness—which, at the outset of the recitative ushering in "Casta Diva," almost sealed her lips—gathering confidence as she proceeded, she soon showed the advantage of a correct method of enunciation, and with almost unexampled rapidity acquired a control of means that enabled her to articulate distinctly, not merely the musical sounds, but the words and syllables of words to which they are wedded. But passing the recitative, and the sustained high note, its climax, the opening movement of "Casta Diva" was a legitimate triumph. Mme. Vilda's delivery of this amply-proportioned melody was broad, fluent and expressive. No want of proportionate balance, no wavering of intonation, damaged its effect, and the close of this most trying largo—rounded off with a well-executed cadenza and a close and brilliant shake—saw her unanimously accepted for a singer of no ordinary pretensions, as well as one gifted with a voice of extraordinary capability. Nor was the impression at all weakened by what immediately followed. . . .

But what most encouraged hope was the fact that as the opera advanced the new singer obtained surer and surer command of her resources, and while exhibiting an intelligent appreciation of every situation, occasionally afforded evidence of real dramatic instinct. . . .

Though not very young, Mme. Vilda is quite young enough to look forward to a career of ordinary duration; and though inclined to stoutness, her figure is sufficiently imposing; her attitudes are graceful, and her stage demeanor is easy and natural.

May 19.—L'Africaine was presented for the first time on Saturday evening, and drew the largest audience of the season, the popularity of Meyerbeer's last—but by no means best—work having been in no degree diminished by repeated performances during the late disastrous season of the Royal English Opera Company. In two respects the cast is greatly improved from that of last year, by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington assuming the part of Donna Inez, which she had so often sung in English; and by Naudin, who created that of the hero, Vasco di Gama, in Paris, being substituted for Wachtel. In the absence of Herr Schmidt, the part of the Grand Inquisitor is given to Polonini, whilst Tagliafico undertakes that of the Priest of Bramah. In the other details those who filled them last year again appear: Mlle. Lucca being the Selika, and Graziani the Neluko, although Faure has arrived, and his introduction in that character, which he created, would have been an advantage. Since the former performances of last year Mlle. Lucca's Selika is greatly improved; so much so, indeed, as to be now ranked amongst her very best impersonations. Graziani sings as well as ever, but has no other pretensions for the delineation of those passions of which the ferocious slave is the victim.

On Monday "Norma" had the advantage of a competent Adalgisa—which Mlle. Lusitani can by no means be said to have been—in the person of Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, and a much better Pollio than Brignoli, by Naudin's resumption of that disagreeable character. Mme. Vilda greatly improves as she proceeds and, being now thoroughly well supported, shows that she derives greater confidence by so desirable a change.

Tuesday was in every sense of the expression a gala night at the Royal Italian Opera, for the accomplished Adeline Patti made her reentrée in the "Barbieri" with the most incomparable of Figaros yet remaining—Georgio Ronconi. To criticize such a performance as that of Tuesday would be little else than impertinent. It may suffice, therefore, to say that as Patti was singing her very best and playing with as much sparkling animation as ever, so Ronconi was even more ridiculously droll than on former occasions; whilst Mario was thoroughly as gentlemanly an Almaviva as the most exacting censor of manners could desire. There might perhaps be found a better Barbato than Ciampi, since his fun is dry and far from humorous; but as good a Basilio as Tagliafico is rarely to be met with.

On Thursday "L'Africaine" was repeated, with M. Faure in his old part.

June 2.—La Sonnambula, the Huguenots, and Don Giovanni have been given—making with Faust and the Barbieri a week's programme of extraordinary attraction and variety. With such a company as Mr. Gye can boast, he is enabled in a great measure to dispense with absolute novelty. Parts must be found for Mlle. Patti, for Mlle. Lucca, and for Mme. Vilda; and these are most readily supplied by the established repertory.

It was as Valentine in the Huguenots that, towards the end of the season of 1863, Mlle. Pauline Lucca made her first appearance in London; and of all the parts in which she has been judged by a London audience it is the one, with the single exception of her poetical Selika, that exhibits to most striking advantage her splendid natural gifts. So big a voice, coming from the throat of so little a singer, is really a phenomenon; and if one were to close one's eyes during the progress of the magnificent duet with Marcel, in the scene of the Pré aux Clercs, or the still more magnificent duet with Raoul, which forms the climax of the grandest of the grand dramatic inspirations of Meyerbeer, one would expect, on re-opening them, to see in Valentine the robust and stately person of a Titiens, instead of the diminutive "prima donna," whose bright and clear high tones have been resounding like those of a trumpet. Both situations are now so completely mastered by Mlle. Lucca, in a dramatic no less than in a musical sense, that they offer scarcely a chance for criticism. And if on the present occasion she was associated with a Marcel, in Signor Attri, more to be commended for intelligence and invariable correctness than for the depth and power of voice imperatively demanded by the music, on the other hand she found in Signor Mario a Raoul de Nangis beyond compare.

The other parts were filled by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, who sang the music of the Queen admirably throughout; Mlle. Morensi, whose Urbain was short of the desired standard, and who would do well to dispense with the florid air, "No, no, no," which Meyerbeer composed expressly for Alboni, and which he would hardly have composed for Mlle. Morensi; M. Faure, a dignified and imposing St. Bris; Signor Tagliafico, who breaks his sword across his knee, in the famous passage where Nevers proudly disdains to take part in the projected scheme of wholesale assassination, as chivalrously as of yore, &c.

Don Giovanni, although given on an "extra night" attracted its usual crowd of unsophisticated music-lovers, who listened to the melodies of Mozart with the usual rapt attention, and expressed their hearty satisfaction in the accustomed hearty manner. The Don Giovanni of M. Faure, who, by the way, has recently been playing the part in French (at the Paris Grand Opera), is in many respects even better than when we last saw it (1864).

A new Elvira, from a musical point of view greatly superior to what we have been accustomed to, has been discovered in Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, one of Mr. Gye's most valuable recent acquisitions. It is a pleasure to hear the noble recitative and air, "Mi tradi quell' alma ingrata," with its complex modulations and divisions, sung in so thoroughly artistic a manner as by this accomplished English lady, who plays the part of Don Giovanni's abandoned wife all through with an attention to detail that cannot be too highly commended. Again, though sorry to miss the Commendatore of Signor Tagliafico, we are bound to acknowledge that the fine deep bass of Signor Capponi gave impressive sonority to the unequalled music of the last scene, when the man of stone, instead of staying to sup with Don Giovanni, as he had promised, somewhat capriciously invites that unrepentant libertine to sup with him. Of the new Don Ottavio, Signor Brignoli, we would rather speak when he has made himself more thoroughly a master of the part. About the Donna Anna of Mlle. Fricci, the Leporello of Signor Ciampi, the Masetto of Signor Ronconi, and the Zerlina of Mlle. Patti there is nothing new to say. As usual, "Batti batti" and "Vodrai carino," no less inimitably acted than sung by Mlle. Patti, were unanimously called for again; and so enchanted were the audience with the last that they would willingly have listened to it a third time had the singer been disposed to oblige them; but enough is as good as a feast, and Mlle. Patti wisely refrained. Signor Ronconi's Masetto, one of the most original and diverting impersonations imaginable, would be still better if, when listening to these incomparable airs, he would be a little less demonstrative. Masetto should not attempt to make the audience laugh while Zerlina is singing. M. Sainton, in the absence of Mr. Costa, showed himself a competent substitute as conductor of the orchestra.

Faust e Margherita was repeated on Monday night. On Tuesday, Lucia di Lammermoor, with Mlle. Patti as Lucia, and a new tenor, Signor Nicolini, as Edgardo, was given; the Africaine on Thursday; Don Giovanni last night. Lucrezia Borgia, with Mme. Maria Vilda as Lucrezia, and a new contralto, Mlle. Biancolini, as Maffeo Orsini, is announced for this evening.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The third presented but one Symphony, Beethoven's fifth (they commonly have two); the overtures to Euryanthe and Die Hebriden; a violin Concerto in D, by Mozart, played by L. Strauss; and for the rest the Times says:

The singer on this occasion was Mlle. Ubrich, from the Court at Hanover, who not only comes to us with a high but a well-merited reputation. This lady has a fine voice, which she uses to the best advantage. Her style is good and her execution is irreproachable—which was convincingly shown in the air from Haydn's Creation, the air from Mozart's Figaro, and two Lieder of Mendelssohn and Tanbert (accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. G. W. Cousins)—all of which she sang in German. The vigorous and characteristic march from Beethoven's music to Egmont made an effective close.

Fourth concert: Mozart's G-minor, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; Overtures to Der Berggeist, by Spohr, and L'Alcaide de la Vega, by Onslow; Hummel's B-minor Concerto for piano, played by Mlle. Mehlig, from Hanover, who is pronounced "an artist in the strictest sense of the word." Another critic says she is young and already takes rank by the side of Mme. Schumann. The singers, Mlle. Sinico and Mr. Tom Hohler, tenor, from Her Majesty's Theatre, won little praise.

Fifth concert:—Symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven, Overtures by Mendelssohn and Weber, a Concertino for double bass, and singing by Mme. Harriera-Wippen and Mr. Santley.

The sixth had for programme: Symphony (No. 2) in E flat, by Gounod; Air from Mozart's Seraglio (Herr Rokitsanski); Bennett's Concerto No. 3, in C minor (Mme. Arabella Goddard); Mozart's aria: Non mi dir (Mlle. Tietjens); Overture to Tell; Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Cavatina from Lucia (Tietjens); Duet from Fidèle; Overture to Preciosa. The Morning Star says:

The first piece on this list affords the only exception to the unmixed enjoyment of a very high kind conferred by the night's performances. Not that M. Gounod's second symphony is altogether bad, but that it wants both the breadth of purpose and the beauty of detail necessary to fix the attention during the forty minutes occupied in its performance. Its subjects, though sometimes pretty, are all trivial, and the mode by which they are elaborated is frequently grotesque rather than ingenious or engaging. The third movement—a scherzo—is the best; and the last, in which a rather inspiring polka-like theme prevails, would be worthy of some admiration if treated according to its value; but it will not bear the proportions to which it is spun out. The work undoubtedly received every justice at the hands of Professor Bennett and his noble orchestra.

HANOVER. Joseph Joachim has once more resumed the post of Concertmeister to the King of Hanover. By high integrity and firmness of character he has overcome intrigue, and his deserts are now fully appreciated. The king himself made a direct application to Joachim, who not merely acceded without hesitation to His Majesty's proposals, but declined the increased honorarium which had been offered to him as an inducement to return to the Hanoverian Court.

COPENHAGEN. The Musical World translates from a Danish paper the following glowing account of a new work by Gade:

The seventh and last subscription-concert of the Musical Society in Copenhagen made even by its programme a deep and elevating impression. It contained only two principal parts: Beethoven's attractive eighth symphony, which—but principally the allegro and the finale—was performed con amore; and (the second part) The Crusaders, by Professor Niels W. Gade, a new composition, rich in its contents and extent. After the performance the genial artist was greeted with an "orchester-fanfare" and long continued applause—a well-merited acknowledgment of his beautiful and important masterpiece.

The words of The Crusaders, for which we are indebted to the poet, Charles Andersen, who has treated the subject gracefully, and without pretension, present a most satisfactory basis for musical treatment, and are like Comala and Elverskud an oratorio—"en concert-cantate"—for solos, choir, and orchestra. This kind of composition, which, as far as concerns its historical romantic subjects, corresponds with religious music, seems more and more to be one of those most developed and most frequently employed in our country. It may be dramatic, without too much combination of subject, but has not the pretension to be for the stage or for scenic arrangement, which often gives considerable effect, but on the other side, makes it very difficult for the public to understand the piece from the beginning to the end.

The above mentioned "picture of song," consisting of three parts, opens with a choir of pilgrims and women in the crusader's band; a charming chorus, full of expression, describing the sufferings and troubles connected with the wanderings in the wilderness. The first melodies recall in some small degree Gade's own composition, "At sunset." There is a repose like that in the above-named work; but this is a repose breathing itself out in soft complaints—a charming, characteristic composition; and the performance was fully worthy of the piece. The recitative summons of Peter the Hermit, the Crusaders' leader, precedes the Crusaders' Song, deformed as a solo, with recitative. It is a fresh, powerful, warlike melody; but perhaps the old French songs might have given the impulse to a somewhat more historical color. This part is concluded by an evening prayer, in which the hermit's voice mingles beautifully and most solemnly with the voices of the whole band; the full tones of the final stanza breathe the most fervent and pious longing.

The title of the next part is Armida, which involuntarily reminds us of Gluck, whose opera called by the same name, like this part, has taken the subject from Tasso; but the two works differ totally in construction and character, and there is scarcely any other similarity to be found in them. A strange, mysterious introduction, which in the most striking manner announces the black arts afraid of day-light, is followed by a singular little chorus of the spirits of darkness, who, at the command of their queen, conjure a charming fairy world, a flood of temptation for the most distinguished knight amongst the Crusaders, Rinaldo d'Este, who has left his tent to wander in lonely dreaming. The solo of Armida is original, particularly in the rhythm, and it changes into a lulling, enervating chorus of sirens, graceful as Weber.

The next scene portrays an ever-increasing struggle. The hero is about to yield to the temptation; then he listens to some far, well-known strains; inch by inch he strives to gain the victory; and as soon as he joins in the Crusader-song the magic fascination is powerless and has lost all influence over him. The whole of this part is, with regard to dramatic effect, most distinguished; the sudden change of time is more than a transition—it is an instantaneous translation from the seductive "Rinaldo, Rinaldo" into the manly melody of the Crusader-song; the struggle in the hero's soul is masterly described. What a striking effect in the prolonged tones of the summoning horn; but these tones must be heard to be understood; they cannot be described! How different they are from Ossian's poetry, with the misty mountain air filled with spirits, or from the wild flight of the Knight Olaf for the elfins! Hardly has Professor Gade, since in his youthful popularity he sang so delightfully of the sea-nymphs hovering around the grotto azurra, had any subject which at the first sight appeared so different from his artistic nature as the Crusaders. It is one of the most imaginative he ever composed. And yet it is just the way in which he treats Armida that manifests his Scandinavian nature. How perfectly the subject has been managed!—how enchanting and bewitching is all the melody!—nevertheless, the excellent scenes are so moderate, so chaste, that we are not afraid of appropriating it as characteristically Scandinavian.

How sensual an Italian artist, or Meyerbeer, would have made it! How many voluptuous runs Wagner would have taken on his clarinet! Gade, on the contrary, indicates with a noble and firm hand all that is necessary—nothing more! Even his Armida does not resemble Gluck's, who amidst her thirst of revenge is enchained by fetters of love. Gade's is the cold, powerful being, defying everything belonging to the Cross. The music indicative of sorcery is charming as a forerunner announcing the arrival of the Queen of Spirits—the only point in which some influence of the Queen may be visible, but even here very insignificantly. How interesting is the composer's scoring down of the wand's strange vibration, and how well he succeeds! Some passages in the musical dialogue are, however, of too little coloring; at least we think so.

The last part, Jerusalem, is, in comparison with the two first, a predominant religious picture. The religious knight is joining the weary band of pilgrims as the hermit points out to them the long-desired object of all their toils. The Holy City glistens in the radiance of the sun, and a jubilee song of praise and thanksgiving inflames the host to strife and victory.

In those choral-songs one beauty follows another; the morning hymn, with its gay awakening horns, restless in its construction as a breaking up;—the Pilgrim-march, with its all-overpowering longing, expressed in highly animated vocal-strains;—the band's tuneful greeting to Jerusalem, imposing in all its plainness,—even at the same time a power to create and an uncommon dominion over the means of art.

What a seriousness is glowing through these words of Rinaldo—or the hermit's solemn admonition, joined to the last stanza of the chorus! How deep is the feeling in those low exclamations of "Jerusalem, Jerusalem," whispered out in rather reproachful tones, when the first overpowering enthusiasm has been silenced. Then there is a power of description visible in many passages; for instance, in the wild, sanguinary, ringing tones belonging to the hermit's last summons to strife. This part, less lively than the other two, and it may be so from the nature of the subject, is, nevertheless, not less interesting; it is a noble picture, full of profoundness, proving effectively that music has the power to describe great events in the world's history.

"O Lord, behold my anguish!"

The Crusaders is, in its totality, a precious, sublime musical work; one of those few masterpieces which not only stand the proof of a close examination, but win more and more the more they are examined.

The Past Musical Year in Boston.

IV. ORGAN MUSIC.

The Great Organ in the Boston Music Hall has been played every Wednesday and Saturday Noon, and every Sunday evening, with but few exceptions, through the whole year. The audiences have ranged from fifty to three hundred people; judging from the report of income to the Hall from this source (nearly $7,000), they must have averaged considerably over one hundred. They still consist in great part, probably a very large majority, of strangers visiting the city, who eagerly pay the trifling fee of half a dollar for the sake of seeing and hearing one of the three or four greatest organs in the world. But there is always present a small number of resident music lovers, partial to Organ music, or at least to music played on such an Organ; and we think the number on the whole is slowly increasing. The frequent playing of so many great works by Bach, Mendelssohn, &c., (even though the programmes, with rare exceptions, are very far from pure, and the sublime instrument is still often made a toy of) must needs instil into some hearts a love and reverence for the Bach style and spirit; with such opportunities of making itself heard, it must raise up for itself "fit audience though few."

During the year there cannot have been given fewer than 130 Organ Concerts in the Music Hall. We propose to give only an approximate estimate of what has been done during the past nine months from Oct. 1, 1865—since it is in no man's power to attend or in any way recall all these concerts—and indeed we have lost all record of the three months preceding.

During this period the following organists have officiated in about this proportion: Resident Organists: B. J. LANG, and G. E. WHITING each 19 times; Mrs. FROHOCK, 17 times; J. K. PAINE, 9 times. Dr. TUCKERMAN, 5 times; J. H. WILLCOX (now mainly occupied with his own fine organ and choir at the Church of the Immaculate Conception), 5 times; HENRY CARTER, twice; EUGENE THAYER (absent most of the time in Germany), twice. From other cities. Mr. JAMES PEARCE, formerly of Montreal, now of Philadelphia, 4 times; Mr. S. N. PENFIELD, of Rochester, N. Y., once.—It is a curious fact that, considering how dependent music has been in this country on the Germans, not a single German (so far as we are aware) has ever yet played on the great German Organ of the Music Hall; indeed, with three or four exceptions of naturalized Englishmen, all the organists have been Americans. Whether this fact be significant, we leave it for shrewder ones than we are to conjecture.

Now for the more important question: what is played? To what extent has real organ music had the precedence? Above all, how far have these opportunities been devoted to the organ compositions of Sebastian Bach, and the composers who—at a long distance, to be sure—have followed after him?

The nine programmes of Mr. PAINE show the following works:

A. Classical Organ Works.

BACH: Prel. and Fugue in E minor (3 times).

" " " " B minor.

" " " " A minor.

D. Original Compositions.

Fantasia in E (2); Organ movement in F (2); Pastorale in F; Var. on national airs, &c.

Mr. JAMES PEARCE, a musical baccalaureate of Oxford, now settled in Philadelphia, has given us in his four concerts:

BACH: Prel. and Fugue in E minor; do in B minor; do in E flat; Fugue in G minor (2); Prel. and Fugue from "W. T. Clavichord" in E flat.

MENDELSSOHN: Sonatas in A and D minor (2); Prelude and Fugue, No. 2; Prelude, No. 1.—E. J. HOPKINS: Prelude.

Of Adaptations. HANDEL: Chorus in Samson; Chor. in Judas; Coronation Anthem.—HAYDN: Motet, "Insanæ et vanæ curæ"; Chor. from Creation; Air, do.—BEETHOVEN: Andante (3); Adagio from Op. 2.—MOZART: Agnus Dei from 1st Mass.

Of this gentleman it must be said—for we missed our opportunity at the time of his first visit (his second was only last week)—that his selections were kept exclusively within a dignified range, and that his playing was marked by a peculiar dignity and grandeur. He inclines to large, full combinations of stops, yet with tasteful alternations; and he plays the great pieces, for instance Bach's G-minor Fugue, very firmly, distinctly, and in a slower tempo than almost anybody else. We confess to finding the latter peculiarity edifying; where such great roaring masses of tone move on for such length of time, the polyphonic outlines seem more distinct and appreciable, at least to our slow ears, in a slow time. We hope Mr. Pearce will be a more frequent visitor.

Mr. THAYER has played but once or twice since his return from abroad. The one programme (June 9) before us, contains: Bach's Toccata in F, Choral Vorspiel "Ich ruf zu dir" and Pastorale; an Organ Concerto by Handel (in B flat, No. 2)—the first piece of Handel's Organ music that we have yet heard here, and rather tame in comparison with Bach; Thiele's Chromatic Fantasia; A Sonata in D minor (No. 4) by Eugene Thayer; and a Romance called "The Lake," dedicated to the player by the composer, Dr. Sparks, of Leeds, England.

Mr. PENFIELD played a Fugue by Bach in D major, and Sonata in E flat by the same; Mendelssohn's 1st Sonata; a Fantasia by Freyer; transcriptions from Symphonies of Beethoven and Schumann; "Tell" overture, &c.

We have at hand but a single programme each of the other organists named, and these are very miscellaneous, containing little of music written originally for the organ, except things by Wely and Battiste. The above list and classification are perhaps dry; but they furnish for an intelligent examiner food for reflection. We reserve comments for some future occasion.—We have yet to sum up the Chamber Concerts of the year.

In another column will be found an advertisement of the "Ogdensburg, N.Y. Normal Music School," which commences July 9th, under the instruction of the brothers Perkins of this city. We learn the Quintette Club will give some concerts in connection with the School, at Ogdensburg, about the second week in August.

English Opera in New York.

NEW YORK, JUNE 19.—The Concert Season is now over. Artists and artistes hasten to leave the city; some for the country proper; some for those hybrid resorts, the fashionable watering places; others for Europe; all in order to recover from the fatigues of the past, and to recruit for the future season. Our streets are already half deserted by their usual promenaders, and remain in almost undisputed possession of business men, mechanics and other worthy classes chained to the heated city by various necessities, but having at least, the Park, and many suburban gardens, in which to indulge their desire for fresh air and their taste for light music and more corporeal necessities.

We are happy to chronicle Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG's comic operetta, "The Doctor of Alcantara," as a success. As you are aware, the first performance was on the occasion of the opening of the new Theatre Francais. It is still in course of a protracted and successful "run." This opera possesses all the elements of popularity; a merry libretto; and melodies of a light and pleasing character, in the working up and instrumentation of which we discover the taste and study of an experienced conductor, and a clever musician. If we cannot accord the merit of great originality to the music of "The Doctor of Alcantara," neither can we stigmatise it as a copy. Its melodies, moulded in the accustomed form, are yet always flowing and nicely fitted to the situation. Mr. Eichberg has evidently adapted himself to the small frame and means at his disposal, and has done so in a most satisfactory and effective manner. The general approbation with which Mr. Eichberg's work has been deservedly received, leads us to hope that he may feel encouraged to write others in the same pleasing style. His "Two Cadis," also an opera buffa, is spoken of as the next "to be." The production of the "Doctor" has been very fair, on the whole; the most meritorious performance, both in singing and acting, being decidedly that of Miss Ritchings as Inez; her natural manner, pleasing appearance and correct costume, are always refreshingly welcome. Mrs. Mozart also displays unexpected dramatic talent.

Now that the ice has been once broken, and we have a thoroughly successful operatic production, calculated for, and performed by resident singers, we trust that our native composers will no longer "be backward in coming forward" in the right way, and that they may be sustained by the public in a genuine manner.

The "Rose of Castile" was also sung once or twice, and as we hear, not satisfactorily by the English company. "The Bohemian Girl" and others of the same namby-pamby cast, were threatened. People condemned to stay in the city during the dog-days, want clever musical fun, and not such heavy and yet shallow works as have passed current for "English Opera" during the past twenty years. Let the company at the "Theatre Francais" make a voyage of discovery into the realms of comic French Opera: Gretry, or Adam, or the Italian Pergolesi.—Miss Ritchings would make a name in the "Serva Padrona."

There is nothing more to chronicle, musically speaking. Comic opera will probably run on light and easy wheels through the summer; in autumn we are promised the fine Italian actress Ristori, Madame Parepa again, and much besides; but let the future show. For the present,—as Hfiz saith,—"this is the time of roses," and the most salutary and most welcome music is that which mesieurs professeurs the birds discourse "in the woodland school,"—so also thinketh your correspondent, LANCELOT.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION. The stockholders of this organization held an adjourned meeting at Music Hall this morning. The Treasurer, John Rogers, Esq., submitted his annual report from which we copy the following figures:

Cash receipts for the year ending May 31, 1866, .....	$26,240 09
Organ concerts .....	6,890 70
Other musical entertainments .....	5,509 00
Lectures, fairs, festivals, etc., .....	13,296 37
Sundry other purposes .....	604 02
Rents accrued and not received .....	669 00
Total income .....	$26,909 09

Expenditures, Salaries of Superintendent and Treasurer..	850 00
City Water Bills.....	825 53
Gas Bills.....	2,933 23
Insurance on building and organ.....	805 00
Fuel.....	615 00
Taxes.....	1,896 20
Interest on debt.....	3,234 44
Sundry expenses.....	7,547 50
Bills due but unpaid.....	837 70

19,544 65

Surplus ..... 7,364 44

This is a larger amount than for any past year, notwithstanding increased taxation and cost of mechanics' work, material, etc.

The surplus in 1856 was $1839 23; 1857, $1405 76; 1858, $1405 91; 1859, $3516 78; 1860, $2489 38; 1861, $2808 06; 1862, $363 19; 1863 the income fell short of the expenses $989 68, the hall being closed for repairs a portion of the time; surplus in 1864, $7360 08; 1865, $5152 19. From 1856 to 1862, inclusive, the surplus averaged $1975 50. The average for the past three years has been $6625 57.

The debt, secured by a mortgage of the real estate, amounts to $60,000, $50,000 of which becomes due in 1867, and $10,000 during the present month. This includes the debt on the organ, which it is hoped will be extinguished within two years. The cash balance on the 1st of June, 1866, was $2741 76.

The following-named gentlemen were chosen directors for the ensuing year: J. Baxter Upham, President; R. S. Apthorp, E. D. Brigham, Ebenezer Dale, Edward N. Perkins, H. W. Pickering, J. P. Putnam.—Transcript, June 13.

ERNST PERABO, the pianist, has given several very successful concerts lately in Cleveland, Ohio, besides forming the principal attraction in two concerts under the direction of Mrs. Isaacs, a favorite teacher there. There, as in Boston, he played Bach, Beethoven, Bennett, Kirchner, Bargiel, Burgmüller, &c., and there, as here, he has created a peculiar enthusiasm. But when a Cleveland critic writes: "He is now classed with Thalberg and Gottschalk," the young artist may well say, save me from my friends!—Perabo will pass the summer with some friends in Indiana, getting (we trust) the needed rest, and in the fall will return and make his residence in Boston—which is verily a piece of good news.

Young PETERSILEA also, as will be seen by his card announcing his services as teacher, proposes to establish himself in Boston. Another valuable accession to the corps of sound classical pianists and teachers! Shall we not be rich?

LOUISVILLE, KY. In the sudden death, by accident, of E. W. GUNTER, organist at St. Paul's, this city mourns its leading musical character. The following extracts from the Democrat show in what estimation he was held, and how important a loss this is to musical art in that section of the country.

He had lived so long among us, and had occupied so prominent a position, that he almost seemed an essential part of the city. He was giving instruction to the daughters of those whom he had instructed in their girlhood. His active mind was continually engaged in projects for the advancement of music. He was the founder of the Mozart Society, of the Musical Fund Society, and other associations intended to cultivate skill and taste. To his energy and ability, we are indebted for the opportunity, of hearing some of the best oratorios performed in the highest style. His fine taste enabled him to make great improvements in the music of the church service. It is impossible to estimate the extent of his influence upon the condition of music in Louisville. It seemed indeed, as if there could be no music of a high order without him. At almost every important concert given in this city, he was to be found holding the baton. He had been appointed director of the Saengerbund festival, and the estimation in which his abilities were held is shown by the exclamation which might have been heard: "How can the festival proceed without him!"

Mr. Gunter was born in Bremen, in 1817. At a very early age he lost his father and was obliged to depend on his own exertions. His attainments in the science of music were almost entirely the fruits of his own unaided labors.

At a meeting of the musical associates and friends of the late E. W. Gunter, Esq., held at 4 P.M., Thursday, June 14th, 1866, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, By a decree of Divine Providence, our friend and fellow-citizen, E. W. Gunter, has been suddenly taken from our midst; and,

WHEREAS, The relations between the deceased and those who have met to do honor to his memory have been of such a character as to give us frequent opportunities of bearing testimony to his social worth, as well as to his professional merits; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. Gunter we feel that his immediate family have suffered a bereavement the saddest and most afflictive that could have befallen them, and that the profession in this city, of which he was so distinguished an ornament, has sustained a loss almost irreparable. To ourselves, individually, and to his other numerous personal friends, his removal from our midst has severed social ties that had been cemented by many years of most kindly intercourse.

Resolved, That we tender to his afflicted wife and children, and to his other sorrowing relatives, the expression of our sincere sympathy and condolence.

Resolved, That the city papers be requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting.

Resolved, That, in token of our high respect for the deceased, we attend his funeral, at St. Paul's Church, to-morrow (Friday, June 15th) at four o'clock, P.M.

Messrs. J. M. Semple, Wm. Plato, and Dr. E. W. Mason were appointed a committee to conduct the musical exercises at the church, and Messrs. Hast and Zoeller at the grave.

Messrs. H. J. Peter, B. J. Webb and Harry Bishop were appointed a committee to present these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

On motion, it was resolved that the Northern musical journals be requested to publish these resolutions.

On motion of Mr. D. P. Faulds, it was resolved that the proprietors of the music stores be requested to close their doors at 3.30 P.M.

H. J. PETERS, President.

Harry Bishop, Secretary.

A Sentimental King.

If all the sovereigns of Europe were like the young King of Bavaria, they would most assuredly never go to war. In fact, King Ludwig the Second thinks politics a bore, and war a bore of the largest calibre. He will have nothing to do with either, and he thinks that as a king he has a right to amuse himself as he pleases. He is only in his twenty-first year, the sentimental age when thoughts are apt to run to poetry, music and love-making. His grandfather, the ex-King Ludwig, continued in a somewhat similar state of mind till he was pretty old; but his chief diversion from the cares of state was in the society of fast women of the Lola Montez order. The young king fell in love some time ago with Richard Wagner, who writes music of the future, a tempo that is rather perplexing to musicians of the present time. The eccentric composer, in fact, absorbed so much of the time of the youthful monarch, that it became necessary to remove him, and he was sent away from Munich, with orders not to return.

But Ludwig the Second has been pining for his Wagner, and the war alarm has not served to distract his thoughts from the loss of his friend. He has passed his time in writing sentimental poetical laments, playing Wagner's music on the pianoforte, and going off on solitary incognito walks among his people, or in the country around Munich. His ministers have thus been obliged to work in the business of diplomacy and politics, without the sanction of the head of the State, and consequently things have been all at sixes and sevens. The idea of such a trivial subject as a European war interfering with his kingly prerogative of writing poetry and playing the piano, is monstrous to him.

The other day the Bavarian Parliament was to be opened, and the ceremony was to be performed by the King in person. But he determined not to be thus bored, and disappeared from his capital mysteriously, on the very day appointed. There was great consternation among ministers and courtiers, and his mother, the Queen Dowager, was very unhappy about her truant son. Parties were sent to search the country around Munich. After two days exploration, he was found riding among the Alps south of the city, attended by only a single groom. An humble petition, signed by all the ministers, begging him to return to the capital, was presented to him, and after some hesitation he yielded. He was conducted in state to the palace, and Bavaria was herself again. It was understood that he had been searching for Richard Wagner, who was concealed somewhere among the mountains.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Bright blue eyes and golden hair. Maria Bell. 30 Simple and sweet.
- Love's request. (Liebes Bitte). Reichardt.
For guitar by Haydn. 30
- The Brook. Dolores. " 30
Two famous songs, well arranged for guitar.
- Gentle ladies. (Donnine amabili.) Cavatina.
"Crispino." 60
- Pietro darling, this cake so tempting. (Piero mio).
Canzonet. "Crispino." 35
Two very fine songs, with respect to music. The words too, are good, in a comic vein. The melodies are very sweet, and not especially difficult.
- The first song is that of Fabrizio, the physician, who tells of the success of the phrase, "some one loves you," when spoken to his fair patients. The second is the ballad by Annetta, of which the Italian is written in a sort of peasant dialect, possibly that of Venetia.
- Darling, stay at home to-night. Ballad. Webster. 30 Sit down by my side. " 30
Two excellent temperance songs. The new campaign against intemperance, seems to be accompanied by a higher order of musical literature than the preceding.
- Will O' the Wisp. Song. G. W. Cherry. 50
A fine descriptive piece, which will be very effective in concerts and exhibitions. Does not go above E.
- Thou fair, but faithless one. Song. S. Lover. 30
Very original and pretty.

Instrumental.

- Los Fifres du Garde. 4 hands. Ascher. 60
One of the very brightest and prettiest of duets, and as it is rather easy, should not be long in finding its way to your piano.
- Maple polka. I. Emerson. 30
- Witch of the wave galop. S. B. Whitney. 30
Good pieces by favorite composers.
- Nocturne. Op. 15. No. 1. Chopin. 30

" " " 3. " 35
- Long, long weary day. "Sparkling Diamonds." Arini. 30
- Dream on the ocean. Walts. " " 30
- Sans Souci waltz. Ida M. Brittan, arr'd by " 30
Three very pretty, easy and sparkling productions, excellent for players not far advanced.
- A happy dream. Caprice characteristic. G. W. Hertel. 40
Not difficult. Sweet flowing melody, and pleasing throughout.
- Rustic pictures. By Baumbach.
No. 6. Cradle song, from Kücken. 30
" 9. Coronation march. "Le Prophète." 30
" 12. Do they think of me. 30
Three "rustic," but by no means rusty pictures. The music is very graceful. The Coronation march, which is generally an awkward thing to play, is here very nicely fitted to the fingers, and appears in a new and attractive dress.

Books.

- MENDELSSOHN'S SONGS WITHOUT WORDS. $3.00
A new and excellent edition, carefully revised, and in every way in good shape. Do not consider your library for the piano complete without one of the books.

A Monday Evening in St. James's Hall. JOACHIM'S LAST APPEARANCE IN LONDON.

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Signal, May 10, 1866).

Among the most prominent musical phenomena of recent times in London must certainly be reckoned the concerts, which occur every week on Monday in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, and which are justly called "Popular," for they have already conquered for themselves so large a public, that hundreds every time have to be turned away from the doors. To remedy this evil, another course of concerts was given in the same room during the whole of the last season, on Saturday afternoons, from three to five o'clock, in which the Monday's programme for the most part was repeated, and which likewise enjoyed a very numerous attendance. These in common parlance were called the Saturday Monday Pops. "Pops," to the initiated, signifies Popular Concerts. Your Englishman is fond of abbreviations and of making the names of things easy to the mouth.

The founder of these concerts is Mr. Arthur Chappell; Mr. Benedict stands at his side as musical Director. The hall itself is one of the most beautiful in London, large, high and distinguished for good acoustic qualities. The seats of the stately room are divided into three grades; those on the floor of the hall, the "stalls" so-called, costing five shillings; but those in the balcony, which runs quite round the hall, cost three shillings; and a third class, in the gallery, cost only one shilling; to these last are to be reckoned also the places under the balcony and the Orchestra. As the concerts consist only of chamber music, they use the vacant orchestra room for audience and let it out also at a shilling a seat. This moderate price is one of the chief reasons why these concerts have acquired such great vogue, since for this comparatively small sum one may hear the best classical music executed by the very first artists. And in fact a better speculation could not have been made, and Mr. Chappell will find his account in it. Good music at a cheap price! That drew, and could not fail to draw, in London, where it was the traditional style to pay half a guinea or a guinea for concert tickets, and where artists thought it beneath their dignity to offer tickets to the public at a smaller price. But then it was not the great public that they played to; it was only the rich, for whom such enjoyments existed. Hence the great public remained musically uncultivated; but how great the love of music and the need thereof, nevertheless, is proved by the success of these Monday concerts.

Commonly every cheap place is occupied long before the beginning of the concert; and this is particularly the case to-day, for to-day JOACHIM plays a solo, and what is more, the "Kreutzer Sonata," which of itself always ensures a full house. To which add, that it is the last evening of this season on which Joachim plays in London; and, to make the measure full, the Prince and Princess of Wales are expected to be present. Consequently it was easy to foresee, that St. James's Hall to-day would have to stand a particularly heavy pressure of the multitude. Accordingly we start in good season—we had a long way to go—for we left the house at five o'clock and, by the aid of railroad and omnibus, stood before St. James's Hall at half past six. We were fortunate enough to get an excellent orchestra seat, but we did not have five minutes to lose. As the concert does not begin until eight, we have time to look about us a little. From our place (under the great organ) we can observe all conveniently. Before us are the benches arranged amphitheatrically, so that the lowest row comes close to the stage, where the Broadwood grand piano stands and the chairs of the artists are arranged. Of course those who fill the lowest row are very near the players—so near, that they might actually turn over the leaves for the pianist. Whoever attends these concerts often, will remark, that commonly the same faces are to be found in the same seats. Everywhere you see ladies and gentlemen whom you have met here before. There in the furthest corner, with the manuscript of the "Kreutzer" in his hand, sits an elderly gentleman with gray hair, not unlike to Stephen Heller, whom we have seen every time we have been there. That young man with jet-black hair, and the very blonde young man beside him, attentively watching the audience and nodding now and then to an acquaintance, are both regular attendants at the concerts. We have often heard it maintained that this Orchestra-public is the most musically cultivated part of the whole. Perhaps it owes this reputation to the peculiarly low bow with which the artists, especially Charles Hallé, honor it before beginning to play. And this same reputation presumes upon itself occasionally; we ourselves witnessed how an Englishman, who had himself enjoyed no insignificant repute in London, once gave to Mme. Arabella Goddard a lesson that was not undeserved. This lady was playing a Sonata of Beethoven (with her accustomed faultless technique and marble coldness!); as she came to the Finale, whether it were that the theme was too easy for her, or that she wished to surprise the public by her runs and trills, she began to weave all sorts of things into the Sonata. Suddenly Mr. P. looked very earnestly up from the notes which he held in his hands, and said quietly, but aloud: "Excuse me, this is not found at all in my edition!"

To shorten the time of waiting, the ladies often take some kind of handiwork with them and sew, embroider or cross-stitch industriously, while their attendants read and explain to them the programme. We have observed the same thing in the concerts at the Crystal Palace in Sydenham, and therefore we cannot understand how English authors can so sneer at the German knitting, which is supposed to play an important part in German theatres and concerts. For the rest it is really a labor under difficulties, since the gas is not yet fully turned on and a dull twilight reigns.

Meanwhile the balconies and stalls begin to fill and furnish an interesting spectacle. As the Prince and Princess of Wales are expected to-night, most people are in their places early. Usually the ladies rustle in with a good deal of noise after the first Quartet has begun, and cause great disturbance. Nay, sometimes the artists have to hold in and give the late-comers time to seat themselves, before they can go on. We have already heard many an involuntary remark about it on the part of a music-loving public.

One who sits in the stalls has to go in full toilet, and Albion's daughters do not omit this opportunity of displaying all their tastelessness. Toilets are worn there for show, which would drive a painter mad with horror. Red, red of all shades, no matter if the fair wearer have golden or dull yellow hair. Old dames with white locks appear not seldom adorned with wreaths of roses. O Thackeray! thou who didst always scourge this foible of thy countrywomen with so much wit and satire, thou has not yet converted all; this almost barbaric want of taste still displays itself, and at the sight of it sometimes a wild shudder runs through us!

To-night even the reserved seats are punctually occupied at eight. The whole vast hall is crowded full to the extreme corner. What a sea of faces! And at the entrance doors there still stands a dense knot of people, of both sexes, who cannot find a seat more and who prefer to stand up the whole evening rather than miss the concert.

And now on all sides watches are drawn out and consulted. Fives minutes before eight.—Ah!—Now the gas is turned on in hundreds of candelabra, and suddenly a flashing sea of light plays round us. How beautiful! At the same time Joachim, from a side room where the artists are assembled, makes a few bold chromatic runs and full chords resound. The public are excited. People talk more lively, turn round frequently to see whether the princely couple are not coming, open the programme for the hundredth time and read that Haydn's charming Quartet in D major is to be the first piece. Eight o'clock! Again a sweep of the bow rings out clear and impatient. The time is up, which usually is punctually observed. As the clock strikes eight the artists usually appear. But to-day their royal highnesses have not yet arrived. They remember, that the Queen on such occasions never lets anybody wait, and so they begin to clap and stamp, while an opposite party—the loyal ones, who do not wish to enjoy the music without their highnesses—hiss. Again an impatient, admonishing stroke of the bow! That was oil poured upon fire! A furious clapping testifies to the impatience of the public. People look up into the improvised royal box, but it is still empty. Mingled hisses and applause; at the same time a tantalizing prelude from the side room. Which will conquer, prince or artists, thought we, and we hoped that the latter would soon put an end to the growing impatience, and rightly, for at a quarter after eight appeared Joachim, L. Ries (second violin), Blagrove (viola) and Piatti (violoncello). They played the lovely Quartet with artistic perfection; all the grace and cheerfulness of the genial master are united in it. At the Adagio the Prince of Wales with his wife and suite came in; but however great the loyalty of the English public in general may be, here it gave a proof of tact and musical good-breeding, inasmuch as this entrée did not cause the slightest interruption. No one stirred, all listened to the tender melodies as they softly floated up and down. Only at the end of the piece were the opera glasses put in motion, and they gazed to their hearts' content at the lovely princess and the future heir of the throne.

Next, Mr. Santley, whose splendid baritone voice has made him the favorite of the London public, sang a Recitative and Aria from L'Etoile du Nord: whereupon Signor Piatti delighted us by a Rondo of Mozart for the violoncello. Again Mr. Santley came on and sang "The Wanderer" in a manner that carried everybody away.

Then appeared Charles Hallé, who rendered with indescribable grace an Impromptu by Schubert and a couple of Songs without Words: the storm of applause which he raised by these simple things was so great, that he had also to volunteer the "Spring Song."

Here ended the first part. The rich and beautiful programme of the concert had been arranged by the Princess herself, and did all honor to her artistic taste.

Five minutes elapse between the two parts; during which the spectators get up, stretch themselves (a refreshment particularly agreeable to those penned up in the Orchestra) and talk.

Punctually at the end of the five minutes the second part begins. This time Joachim came on alone, to play the "Trille du Diable" by Tartini, a fine composition of bold originality. Amid roaring applause Joachim modestly quits the stage. But the public, as it probably will not hear its favorite again this year, does not let him off so cheaply. They clap, at first lively, but then louder and louder. Finally Joachim shows himself, but without the violin, makes his bow and vanishes again. No! That was not enough! Da capo! Encore! Bravo! they cry, until the hall groans with the wild storm. Joachim knows what the people want; he comes again with his violin and, after thinking a moment, plays a Gavotte by Bach. This, as well as the violin Fugues, he has completely domesticated in London. Everybody knows and loves now the noble, proud and yet heart-felt tones of Bach. With the last superb chords Joachim vanished, accompanied by immeasurable jubilation of the public, who up to that moment had listened breathlessly.

Now Santley sang another song, and then again followed a pause of five minutes. This always occurs before the last piece, in order that those who wish to go out before the end may do so without disturbing others.

Very few rose—and these probably were only obliged to start so early on account of the great distance home. The "Kreutzer Sonata" exercises a magical influence over all minds. Joachim, this time in the company of Charles Hallé, appears for the last time. And now they play the divine Sonata, as only a Joachim can play it. One had only to look at people's faces to recognize the full effect. Enthusiastic features, eyes beaming with rapture, transfigured smiles, and that finest of all triumphs, tears, were everywhere to be found.

With the last chord all rise and crowd out as fast as possible. Fine broad stairways facilitate the egress, a circumstance in which St. James's has much the advantage over Exeter Hall. It is about half past ten, and the majority have a long journey before them ere they reach their homes.

We hurry to an omnibus, are fortunate to find a seat, and now for an hour and a half are rolled unmercifully over the groaning, rattling pavement of this never-ending giant city, so that all the melodies that we have heard in the evening are utterly shaken up together and driven from our mind. But they all resume their places friendly and hover about us with a lovely beat of wings even into the realm of dreams, when we at length sink wearily upon our pillow.

Wilmsen, who had instructed and confirmed Mendelssohn, and his brothers and sisters, struck me as a man of no great capacity, and I let fall some hint or other to the effect that it would have been better had they gone to Schleiermacher. Felix was seriously angry, and gave me to understand he would not allow any one to attack his spiritual adviser, for whom he entertained a feeling of affectionate reverence. It is true that he did not go very often to hear him perform Divine Service. When I recollect, however, with what a serious religious feeling he pursued his art, the exercise of it always being, as it were, a sacred duty; how the first page of every one of his compositions bears impressed on it the initial letter of a prayer; how he devoted the time, as he watched through the night by the bed of his dying friend, Hanstein, to marking in the first fugue, composed here, of the six he afterwards published—in E minor—the progress of the disease as it gradually destroyed the sufferer, until he made it culminate in the choral of release in E major; how the very best touches in his oratorios result from his delicate tact—for instance, the words for the air of Paul during the three days of his blindness, when he had just been converted before Damascus, for which Mendelssohn, dissatisfied with everything proposed to him, himself hit upon the 51st Psalm, that seems as though it had been written on purpose: moreover, when I call to mind everything connected with my beloved friend, as regards his views and opinions on art and artists—whether he was standing at the conductor's desk, sitting at the piano, or taking the tenor-part in a quartet—religion and veneration were enthroned in his countenance; this was why his music possessed such a magic charm. On one occasion, he expressly said that sacred music, as such, did not stand higher in his estimation than any other, because every kind of music ought, in its peculiar way, to tend to the glory of God.

I once said to him, lamentingly, that I found it difficult to conceive Bach's music as aught but a dry arithmetical sum. To convince me that it was something more, he went and fetched the Matthäus-Passion, of which a copy had been given him, a short time previously, from Zelter's stores. We sang a good deal of it with his sisters, and when he perceived that the music deeply entranced me, albeit I was only an unprofessional, he took courage, and we arranged that the performance should be repeated with better resources. We soon enlisted the services of Edward Devrient and his wife, who sang admirably; we soon, too, got together a small chorus of sixteen voices, and held weekly rehearsals. The delight of everyone, whether taking an active part in the matter, or only listening, encouraged and impelled him to get up the public performance of the following year, a performance which restored to the world this masterpiece which had long been consigned to oblivion. If I am not mistaken, it was the first public performance he ever undertook, but it at once proved him a master in the art of conducting. His amiability could not fail to charm every one, and, despite the numerous faults committed at the rehearsals, owing to the great difficulties of the work, and the frequent repetitions necessary, on no single occasion did he lose his patience, or did we, who were the executants, ever feel tired of our task.

How thoroughly he had rendered himself master of this work was proved by his directing one of the later rehearsals at the piano, without any music before him, and by his remarking, at the conclusion of one movement: "In the twenty-third bar, the soprano has C and not C sharp." The Passionsmusik excited perfect enthusiasm in local musical circles. Mendelssohn told us, with hearty delight, a year subsequently, on his return from England, that Bader had met him in the street, and hallooed out: "Oh! here you are again: when are we to sing the Passion a second time?" In addition to Devrient, who sang the part of our Saviour excellently, Stümer distinguished himself as the Evangelist. But, however beautifully he rendered it, he did not at all care for the music. During the performance he had, in the pause between the parts, spoken to his wife, and expressed his amazement at observing traces of tears in her eyes. She replied that she had no reason to be ashamed, for all the gentlemen round her had cried. The circumstance produced its effect, and Stümer confessed to Mendelssohn that he then for the first time had a presentiment that there must be something in the music after all, and in the second part it did really affect him.

It was from this period that Mendelssohn, even at the little rehearsals at home, used the conductor's stick: he had hitherto modestly stated his opinion from the piano or the desk of the tenor. He assumed a more independent bearing, too, as I remember was the case when, in Haydn's D major Symphony, he required the tempo to be taken at a slower rate than that to which we were accustomed. The orchestra kept continually hurrying on, but with an iron will, and marking the time most forcibly with his stick, he held back, till even the faithful Edward Rietz, the leader, began to grumble. For my own part, I must confess that quite a new light was then thrown upon the Symphony. I had always heard the last movement called the "Bear's Dance;" but, on the occasion in question, it was a most pleasing piece of composition. Good old father Haydn must not be hurried.

The amount of delicacy, and the nice and fine gradations Mendelssohn introduced into the orchestra are things so well known, that there is no necessity for me to say aught upon the subject. I think, that, on this particular, he learned a great deal from Weber. When the latter was in Berlin getting up his Furyanthe, Mendelssohn frequently attended the rehearsals, and used to speak with astonishment of what the man did with a strange orchestra. It is true that he as little took as a model Weber's charming rudeness as his exaggerated wavering in the tempo. In this last particular, he rather preserved an equality, with tolerable strictness, and strove to attain effect more by clever gradation of light and shade than by changes of the time.

In the year 1830, I returned from Berlin to my native town, after fully enjoying the society of my beloved friend, during the period he was confined to his room by the measles. In the ensuing spring he made the journey from which the now published Reisebriefe date. He first paid me a visit at Dessau, accompanied by his father, who set out again the next day. Mendelssohn attended a rehearsal, and on being requested to do so, allowed them to try his Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt Overture, then not known here; afforded a small and select party, at Rust's, a rare treat by taking part in trios by Beethoven

(D major), and Haydn (C major), besides extemporizing on "Adelaide" and the commencement of the Ninth Symphony; and went to see the Duchess, from whom he received some commissions to execute in Rome. As a matter of course, we called at the house of Friedrich Schneider, the celebrated composer of the Weltgericht, but he was away travelling. On driving into the country, on the third day, to visit my sister, whose acquaintance Mendelssohn was desirous of making, it so happened, that Schneider was in the place, residing close by at a friend's. We met in the village; I introduced the two; Schneider continued his walk, and, when he returned, some hours afterwards, we felt there was something wrong. Many years previously Schneider had been once at the Mendelssohn's, and expressed his appreciation of the promising boy. But Bach's Passion had annoyed him. Enthusiasm had been excited about something which, though old, was unknown to Schneider: Marx had said, too, plainly, in the Musikalische Zeitung: Any one who did not know the Passion, did not know Bach. Finally, the Duchess, after having been present at the performance, by which she was greatly moved, told Schneider she could not speak in terms of sufficient commendation of the impression it had produced, praising, moreover, the charming instrumentation, which was not so deafening as a great deal of other music. All this annoyed Schneider, so that he could never be induced to have a single movement of the Passion sung. Mendelssohn's name, too, was so intimately connected with the whole affair, that something of Schneider's dissatisfaction fell unconsciously on Mendelssohn. Schneider was then at the full height of his reputation, while Mendelssohn, then twenty-one, was just rising into notice. The consequence was that the former was rather haughty, and this did not please the latter. I must state that Schneider, to his credit, afterwards assumed a different tone towards Mendelssohn; when the corpse was conveyed through this place by rail, at midnight, Schneider greeted it on its way with a "Lament" which he composed on purpose.

Subsequently to 1832, we frequently discussed the subject of oratorio texts. With regard to St. Paul, a considerable amount of preliminary labor had been got through before I knew anything about it; at Mendelssohn's request, I undertook a certain further amount of work of a subordinate kind, such as connecting and introducing suitable passages and songs. During this time, we were a great deal in communication with each other, sometimes orally and sometimes by letter. He always proved himself a thoughtful artist, and strove to obtain a clear appreciation of each separate point, such, for instance, as the admissibility of the choral, of the narrative, recitatives, etc. He rejected, also, much that was suggested, being so well acquainted with his Bible, that he obtained a great deal of valuable materials himself; for any assistance, he was, however, extremely grateful. That he would not accept my suggestions for the Paulinian doctrine of the justification by faith, but, at the appropriate place, substituted merely the general assertion: "Wir glauben all an einem Gott" was something that did not satisfy my theological conscience, though, perhaps, any extension of the work in this direction would have made it too long. We arranged Elijah together from beginning to end, and he was pleased that I should, without any further introduction, have commenced the oratorio with the passage of Elijah, and marked the overture with No. 2, with the addition of: "Muss drei Jahre dauern." Regarding the oratorio of Christus, he never exchanged a word with me; on the other hand, we had often previously talked about St. Peter and John the Baptist. What I told him of the account given in the gospel of Nicodemus concerning the descent of Christ into Hell, interested him in an extraordinary degree, and, from what escaped him, I am inclined to believe he intended turning it sometime or other to musical account.

Some few circumstances concerning our relations with each other have been made known in the published Letters. Together with his musical doings, the loveable and fresh character of his youth is apparent to the world in the Reisebriefe, and his straightforward, manly earnestness in his later correspondence. I will, therefore, conclude my reminiscences by adding one little trait. When he played on the piano and sang to me, in Leipsic, as much of St. Paul as he had written, I thought that, in the principal passage before Damascus, the voice of the Lord, which he had set for a soprano solo, was too thin. He said, in a tone of regret, that the matter struck him in the same light; that he had long endeavored, though in vain, to hit upon something better; but that he could not at all reconcile himself to the notion of producing the effect by a very powerful bass voice. I suggested that he should set the phrase for four parts. After looking at me for a long time, he said: "Yes, and the worthy theologians would cut me up nicely for wishing to deny and supplant Him who arose from the dead." I replied that I would answer for the theologians, for they knew that the transfigured Lord of Heaven and Earth had a different voice from that of a mere mortal. Thereupon he altered the words into a four-part female chorus, and how overpowering was the effect! I was not, however, able quite to keep my promise with respect to the theologians. A sort of theologian, named Fink, took offence, though, it is true, in the contrary sense to what was anticipated, in his musical paper, for he wanted the vox humana to be omitted entirely, and only indefinite sounds of the trombone heard. But that, at the same time, he should take the opportunity of objecting to the words: "Ich bin Jesus von Nazareth, den Du verfolgst" ("I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest,"), and of trying to prove that the Saviour, after his transfiguration and ascent to Heaven, was no longer He of Nazareth, but the Lord of Heaven, afforded us a most hearty laugh. The worthy Fink had undoubtedly been reading the Acts of the Apostles, Chap. 9, Verse 5, and found that the words "von Nazareth" ("of Nazareth") are not there; on this he based his criticism. He had, however, so far forgotten his theology as not to recollect how St. Paul himself, further on in the Acts of the Apostles, twice gives an account of his conversion, and, in Chap. 22, Verse 8, expressly mentions the words to which objection is taken; so that the censure really fell upon the Apostle. Mendelssohn, who was well aware of the circumstance, laughed, but did not say much; friend Schleinitz, however, in a playfully sarcastic manner, afterwards paid out master Fink very nicely.

Postscript.—I have just heard that an unfavorable opinion on a musician whose name is not printed—in a letter of the 6th August, 1834, from Mendelssohn to myself—has been interpreted as referring to Schumann. I can testify that this supposition is erroneous. Why there is no allusion to Schumann in the published correspondence is more than I know; one thing I know, however, and that is, that Mendelssohn once spoke to me in terms of high appreciation of Schumann's musical significance, and that he was on a friendly footing with Schumann and his wife, not merely on account of the latter's pianoforte-playing; on another occasion, too, when I expressed my surprise at the F in the fifth bar of the fourth "Lied," Book Six of the Lieder ohne Worte, he replied, also surprised, that he now knew what Schumann had meant the day before, by expressing from a distance an F with his fingers. He, (Mendelssohn), he added, considered this F perfectly natural, but there must be something particular about it, as it had thus struck both Schumann and me. This little circumstance leads me to infer the existence of a kindly and friendly feeling between the two. A mere accident unfortunately prevented us from keeping the agreement we made at the time to meet at the Rosenthal.

Among the engagements for the Baden Baden season are Mme. Viardot, Mme. Carvalho, Mme. Schumann, Mme. Srolta, Miss Vivier, Seligmann, Vieuxtemps and Kruger. The Italian season runs from August to the middle of September.

Music Abroad.

DRESDEN. The complexion of the past musical season in the Florence of the North is well shown in the following letter to the London Musical World, dated May 28:

According to the annual custom, the concert season was brought to a satisfactory conclusion by a grand musical performance on Palm Sunday, in the Theatre-Royal. The programme at first contained only Handel's Samson, but Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica was afterwards added. As usual on Palm Sunday, the theatre was very full. Both the oratorio and the symphony were received with great applause. If I now cast a glance upon what was offered to the lover of music during the six winter months, I must confess that he was very frequently called upon to open his purse, and if the concert-room was not always as full as the concert-giver desired, the fact is easily explicable: there were too many appeals to the concert-going public in comparison with the number of regular concert-goers. The reason of the latter being so few is to be found in the prices of admission, which are too high. Dresden possesses unfortunately no large concert hall though many small towns can boast of such a building, and the consequence is that there is no room for cheap places, which people of only limited means would willingly occupy. This evil is felt mostly at the Subscription Concerts of the King's Band, which must be classed in the first rank of musical entertainments here. As in former years, so, also, in this, new works have been assigned due space beside the old ones in the programmes of these concerts. It is still, however, a difficult task to introduce a new orchestral work to a public who have formed their taste on the works of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, whom they have learned to love, and whom they have made part and parcel of themselves, because I may always presuppose in very many persons who like music a certain indifference to, if not apathy for, new symphonies. But the composer whose work has been selected for performance by the King's Band here may consider himself fortunate; he may feel assured that it will be treated and fostered with all tenderness, so that it may appear in the best possible light to the public. That the symphonies of our modern composers cannot be placed on a level with the old works of the heroes of music is, it is true, an undeniable fact. The partisans of the Music of the Future will of course rate the Symphonische Dichtungen by Liszt higher. People of sense will allow them to continue in this superstition, while they themselves regard such compositions as musical madness. Still the public listens with pleasure to the works of our modern composers, when performed as they are performed here. Among the productions of this description executed this last season was the Symphony, never before heard in Dresden, of Robert [Norbert?] Burgmüller. It was considered very fresh and full of fancy, and was very well received. Another novelty was a Suite, in five movements, by Joachim Raff, but it was not equally successful. According to the Dresdeners, there is more intellect than imagination in it. The part which pleased most was that which reminded the hearers of Mendelssohn's fairy-music. Abert's Columbus, too, a piece of programme music, did not meet with the desired amount of success. On the other hand, the admirable performance of J. S. Bach's A-minor Violin Concerto by Herr Lauterbach was greatly admired.

Second in rank were the Quartet Soirées given by Herr Lauterbach, in conjunction with Herren Hüllweck, Göring, and Grützmaier. Here again, a great many new works were given with the old ones, full justice being always done to them. The way in which Herr Lauterbach himself executed the violin part in the various compositions was a fruitful theme of praise. The other three gentlemen, also, deserved to be highly commended. In the shape of novelty, there was a Quartet in C minor, by Rubinstein. Nor must the performance of Mozart's Divertimento for Quartet and two Horns, a piece so seldom heard, be forgotten. It was something to be forever remembered.

The Tonkünstlerverein, or Society of Musicians, which, besides the weekly meetings of its members, gives four public performances a year, frequently introduces to the notice of its hearers some highly interesting old and modern works. This Society can effect in the way of instrumental music what no other can. Nowhere else are Mozart's Serenades and Divertimentos, Handel's Orchestral Concertos, or Bach's Suites executed in such masterly style. Among the pianoforte performances Herr Blasemann's rendering of Robert Schumann's Fantasia, Op. 16, deserves especial notice. Herr Körner figures with credit as first violin in the stringed quartet.

The Trio Soirées of Herren Rollfuss (pianist), Seelmann, and Büchli have for many years enjoyed a large share of public support. Thought not first-rate, Herr Rollfuss is a thoroughly sterling player.

A Soirée given by Herr von Wasilewsky was invested with peculiar attractions, because Herr Reincke, Capellmeister at Leipsic, appeared as pianist. This gentleman is considered a very first-rate performer of classical chamber-music. He played with Herr Wasilewsky Mozart's Sonata in B flat major for Piano and Violin; and with Herr Grützmann, Beethoven's Trio in B flat major, Op. 97.

Pianoforte Concerts were given by Mme. Clara Schumann, Mlle. Marie Krebs, Mlle. Anna Schloss, Mlle. Doris Böhme, Mlle. A. Mehlig, Herren G. Satter, K. Tausig, A. Blasemann, and a boy of 12: George Leitert. The givers of vocal concerts were Mlle. Auguste Gütze and Mlle. Beraldi dell' Ara, not to mention Mlle. Patti. Mme. Schumann returned with Joachim. Joachim's name on the bills attracted immense crowds. The great violinist was magnificent in Spohr's Barcarole and Scherzo, and an "Abendlied" by Schumann. Mlle. Marie Krebs had no reason to complain of any lack of patronage. Mlle. Anna Schloss played in a very charming manner Beethoven's poetic Concerto in G major. The same may be said of Mlle. Doris Böhme with regard to Chopin's E-minor Concerto. The boy pianist, George Leitert, possesses talent, and, with proper application and study, bids fair one day to attain a foremost place among pianists. As it is, or rather, as he is, he performed Mendelssohn's G-minor concerto exceedingly well. Herr A. Blasemann executed R. Schumann's A-minor Concerto; a "Concertstück" by Volkmann, and a Barcarole by Rubinstein. Dr. G. Satter is a very tolerable performer of pièces de salon, but, as an interpreter of classical music, he is, in sporting parlance, "nowhere." His orchestral compositions are simply ridiculous. Mlle. Auguste Gütze, Chamber-Singer to the Grand Duke of Weimar, was especially good in Beethoven's song: "In questa tomba oscura." Mlle. Beraldi dell' Ara produced no very favorable impression.

MUNICH. We learn from the correspondence of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, that, uninfluenced by factious disturbances and all the Wagner Storm, musical matters in the Munich Allerheilige Hofcapelle last winter, especially at Christmas and Easter, the two great festivals of the Church, gave evidence of varied and profitable activity under the directions of Herr Franz Wüllner. Besides Beethoven's Mass in C major, and Cherubini's Requiem, the following pieces of sacred music were sung a capella:

Sunday, 24th December, 1865: Missa: "Eterna Christi Munera," Palestrina; Graduale: "Ave Maria," Aiblinger; Offertorium: Prope est Dominus, Ett (born 1788).—Christmas Day, * Mass for vocal solos and chorus, Fr. Wüllner; Graduale: "Exultandi Tempus est," Sale (five part); Offertorium: "Hodie Christus natus est," Palestrina (for two choruses).—The day after Christmas Day, Missa: "Assumpta est Maria" (six-part) Palestrina; Graduale: "Sederant Principes," Aiblinger; Offertorium: "Lapidabant Stephanum" (five part). Palestrina.—Sunday, 31st December, Missa (four-part) Gosswinus (1576). In the afternoon on the close of the year, "Te Deum for two choruses, Allegri.

Palm Sunday, the 25th March, at 11 a.m., Missa: "Vidi Speciosam" (six-part), Vittorea; Graduale: "Super Flumina" (four-part) Orlando di Lasso; "Passio" with Responsories, G. A. Bernabei; Offertorium: "Stabat Mater" (two-part) Palestrina.—Wednesday, the 28th March, 4 o'clock, p.m., Matutine with *Responsories, Palestrina; "Benedictus," F. Lachner.—Maundy Thursday, 29th March, half-past ten, a.m. Missa: "Assumpta est" (six-part), Palestrina; *Graduale: "Christus factus est" (four-part), Palestrina; *Offertorium: "Fratres ego enim," (two-part) Palestrina. At four o'clock, p.m., Matutine with Responsories, Palestrina; *"Benedictus," Jac. Handl (Gallus). At half past seven, p.m., "Miserere," for two choruses, Leonardo Leo.—Good Friday, the 30th March, 10 o'clock, a.m., "Passio" with Responsories, G. A. Bernabei; "Popule meus," Vittoria; *"Adoramus" (four-part), Roselli (born about 1520), "Vexilla Regis," Ett. At half-past seven, p.m., *"Stabat Mater" for chorus, solos, and orchestra, Astorga (born about 1680).—Saturday, the 31st March, at 11 o'clock, a.m., "Kyrie" (chorale); "Gloria," "Sanctus," and "Benedictus," Stuntz; "Laudate Dominum" and "Magnificat," Aiblinger. At half-past seven, p.m., Procession of the Resurrection, with "Pange Lingua," Ett.—Easter Sunday, the 1st April, 11 o'clock, a.m., *Missa for chorus and solos, Hauptmann; Graduale: "Hæc Dies" (first part) Nanini (born about 1540); Offertorium: "Terra tremuit" (two-part) P. Cannicciari (born about 1670).—Easter Monday, the 2nd April, at 11 o'clock, a.m., *Missa "Hodie Christus" (two-part), Palestrina.

The compositions marked with a * were performed for the first time. From the above list, it will be evident—observes our contemporary—that, as far as selecting the pieces is concerned, there is no partiality or exclusiveness, but that proper appreciation is paid to what is good in every age. By the side of Palestrina, Lasso, etc., we find Aiblinger, Ett, Stuntz; and, among the most modern composers, Lachner, Hauptmann, Wüllner. The latter's Mass, sung on Christmas Day, is one of his new compositions, and was very successful.

DÜSSELDORF. Watson's American Art Journal publishes a private letter from Theodore Eisfeld, the well-known New York conductor, about the Whitsuntide Musical Festival, which probably sums up the whole business as well and as briefly as any account that we shall find. He says:

1st day—Messiah. Opening of the new splendid concert hall with Beethoven's overture "Die Weihe des Hauses" (The consecration of the house).

Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, glorious as ever. Her voice has lost some clearness, too much veiled in the middle register, but her singing, style and reading, always the very perfection, and her effect on the public and the artists is immense. With the exception of grumblers, like some critics who find fault with everything, I dare say that Mme. Goldschmidt is still an invaluable, living lesson to all singers that I know. Mme. Parepa did not come—got sick. Some numbers of her allotted share Jenny Lind sang, the rest were attempted at the eleventh hour by Mme. Rothenberger from Cologne (no great shakes, but shaky), and Mme. d'Orville from Leipzig, a good concert singer, but small voice.

2d day—Overture by Tausch, conductor in Düsseldorf, pupil of Mendelssohn; so, so.

Pfingsten, (Whitsuntide) chorus by Hiller, fine and effective.

Concerto in A, for piano, by Schumann, performed by Mme. Clara Schumann. I may say that this was the best solo performance that I ever listened to—the highest imaginable perfection.

Music to Athalie, by Mendelssohn. A beautiful vocal and instrumental work that I heard entire here for the first time. Soli by Jenny Lind, Mlle. Daberkow (a good amateur lady from here), and Mlle. Von Edelsberg, a wonderful alto voice, and, besides, a splendid woman; but rather cold in her singing.

From Gluck's Armida, 2d and 3d act.

Hidsoal—Herr Stockhausen, a really great artist as a bass singer, sweet intonation, finest voice, and perfect reading and declamation.

Armida—Frl. Rothenberger.

Rinald—Dr. Gunz, from Hanover, an excellent tenor, well known in London. (Florestan in Fidelio and Arnold in Tell, etc., etc.)

Furie of Hate—Mlle. Von Edelsberg.

3d day—Symphony, Eroica—conductor Mr. Tausch, splendid orchestra, performance a little tame. With such a body of stringed instruments it would, in New York, under the direction of my worthy colleague, Carl Bergmann, go very differently, I assure you.

Air from Belmont and Constanze, by Mozart—Dr. Gunz.

Air, "The Bride of Venice," by Benedict—Mlle. Edelsberg.

Spohr's 9th Quartet Concerto for violin, performed by L. Aner, a pupil of Joachim, but a most famous one, got a real ovation from the public.

"Paradise and Peri," (2d part)—Schumann, Mme. Lind as Peri.

Festival Overture, by Riets.

Air from "Allegro and Penseroso," Handel, with Flute obligato—Mme. Goldschmidt and Mr. Leonard, from Brussels. You could not make out who made the trills better, quicker and longer, the voice or the flute; and observe, with the note upwards, and not downwards, as 99 out of 100 singers do when they attempt a spasmodical shake and make believe it is a trill.

Some songs, duets, and a Concerto for the violoncello, by Molique, performed by a Belgian, Mr. Deswert, a very excellent player.

Finale—Doppelchor, by Bach.

Splendid! Splendid!! Splendid!!!

I go to Hanover, where I am invited likewise to the great Music Festival, on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of June.

We resume our summary which was cut short in the middle. Of the old Philharmonic concerts we have spoken. Next in order come the NEW PHILHARMONIC. These appear to hold the good character they promised at their beginning (1852), and which was fully established when their conductor, Dr. Wylde, assumed the whole responsibility of them. The present season began late in April, with the same splendid orchestra, Herr Ludwig Strauss and Mr. Henry Blagrove being the leading violins. The Symphonies the first night were Schumann's in E flat, and Mendelssohn's "Italian." For the rest, overtures to Struensee and "Men of Prometheus," a clarinet Concerto by Weber, and operatic vocal selections by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and others. —Second concert: Spohr's "Weihe der Tone Symphonie; overtures to Meerestille, &c. and Oberon; Violin Concerto in D by Mozart, played by Strauss; singing by Mme. Harriers-Wippner and Mr. Santley. —Third concert: Schumann's "grandly gloomy overture" to Manfred; air from Mozart's Seraglio, by Tietjens; air from Gounod's Faust, by Sig. Gardoni; the Eroica Symphony; Duets from Linda; air: "In diesen heil'gen Hallen;" overture to Semiramide; Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto (Arabella Goddard); air from Gluck's Iphigenia; air from Semiramide; March from Egmont. In the succeeding concert Alfred Jaell played Beethoven's E-flat Concerto, and enthusiastically received. The Pastoral Symphony, overtures to Freyshütz, Gazza ladra and Medea (Cherubini's), airs from Mozart and Donizetti, by Mll. Ilma de Murska and Sig. Mongini, filled out the programme.

CRYSTAL PALACE. Of the first summer concert in the great Handel Orchestra, the Times says:

There were altogether nearly 1,000 executants, vocal and instrumental, so that it had the aspect of a Handel Festival en petit. The music, too, was Handel's—the serenata, entitled Acis and Galatea, upon which—although nearly a century and a half has elapsed since it was composed for the Duke of Chandos, at Canons—time has written "no wrinkle." The principal singers were Signor Stagno—who, in consequence of the indisposition of Signor Gardoni, undertook the whole tenor part; Mlle. Titieni—who sings the music of Galatea with a perfect comprehension of its meaning, and was alike successful in "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir" and "Heart the seat of soft delight;" and Mr. Santley—a Polyphemus without equal, whose vigorous delivery of the giant's characteristically overflowing love ditty, "O ruddier than the cherry," called forth an "encore" from the vast audience, so emphatically expressed that it was impossible to disregard it. Herr Mauns conducted with singular energy.

The SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY have given Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Athalie, with Mmes. Sherrington and Sainton and Messrs.

Sainton and Lyall—the latter in the place of Sims Reeves, who was ill: Afterwards Elijah, with Mme. Parepa, Mme. Sainton Dolby, Sims Reeves, Sainton, &c.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. As the season gets further advanced the Monday Popular Concerts no longer make their hebdomadal appearance, as they are wont to do in the winter and spring months, but peep forth occasionally only. The concert on Monday last was for the benefit of Signor Piatti, who may now be designated, happily, as one of the fixtures of the institution. The great Italian virtuoso provided a splendid programme, which included Beethoven's Quartet for strings, in C major, Op. 59, No. 3; Bach's Prelude, Sarabande and Lourses, from Sonata in C, for violoncello alone; Mozart's Sonata, in A major, Op. 6, No. 2, for pianoforte solos; Mendelssohn's Sonata, in D, major, Op. 58, for pianoforte and violoncello; "Air Varié," for violin with pianoforte accompaniment; and Haydn's Quartet for strings in D major, No. 45. MM. Wieniawski, Wiener, H. Blagrove, and Piatti, were the executants, better than whom it would have been difficult, if not indeed impossible, to find. Both quartets were played to perfection, that of Beethoven's showing the performers to greatest advantage, although the animated finale to that of Haydn never in our recollection was given with greater spirit, precision and force. Signor Piatti created a profound impression in the suite of pieces by Bach, his execution of which was nothing less than astonishing. The audience at the end recalled him enthusiastically. MM. Wieniawski, also made a great hit in Vieuxtemps' "Air Varié," and the last variation was encored in a tumult of applause.

Mme. Arabella Goddard's supreme delicacy and refinement of style were of inestimable value in Mozart's Sonata in A major, which the composer evidently wrote in one of those moods of abstraction when music, like the dove, seemed to fall upon him from on high, and nothing was further from his thoughts than the earth and the sublunary doings.

The performance of Mendelssohn's Sonata by the illustrious twain. Mme. Arabella Goddard and Sig. Piatti were incomparable throughout, and created a prodigious effect.

The singers were Mr. Sims Reeves and Miss Julia Elton. Mr. Reeves sang the grand air from Elijah, "If with all your hearts," and "Adelaide"—certainly two of the grand tenor's highest and most perfect achievements.

The next concert—the last but one of the season—is announced to take place on Monday, the 18th instant. This time both Schumann and Schubert are to be largely represented—the first by a quartet, the second by a trio.

Paris.

OPERA. The correspondent of the Orchestra, June 6, writes:

"Zilda," a two act work by MM. de St. Georges and Chivot, music by M. de Flotow, was given at the Opera Comique, on the 28th of May. The story is of the "Thousand and one Nights" class, and runs as follows. Zilda is the wife of a merchant at Mosoul, and comes to Bagdad to receive a thousand sequins due her husband by an old physician. He is about to hand over the sum, when Zilda lets fall her veil, and discloses such a lovely face that the old doctor falls in love with her, and refuses to pay off his debt unless she will grant him a rendezvous. A "cadi" passes by, and Zilda appeals to him for justice; but the "cadi" becomes as épris as the doctor, and imposes the same conditions. The Vizir to whom she next appeals, is a vieux coureur as well; he wants her to appoint a meeting, and she does not know what to do, nor how to get rid of her three admirers. But the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, who is out on one of his nightly "prowls" disguised as a dervish, has heard the whole affair, and advises Zilda to assign a rendezvous to all three. All being arranged the Doctor arrives first; and the young wife feigns an attack of hysterics and beats him unmercifully. As for the Cadi, she forces him to dance; and when the Vizir, who has sent a rich supper, arrives, he finds his place taken by a fierce looking Corsair (the Caliph in disguise), who forces him to wait at table. At last the Caliph throws off his false attire, and condemns the three "elders" to pay 3000 sequins each to Zilda, who returns home, as the Commander of the Faithful observes, without the slightest spot on her reputation."

M. de Flotow's music, if not the most original in the world, is always graceful and carefully written. The present work has not the importance of "Marta," but still contains some numbers deserving praise. Among these are a charming pair of couplets, "Malgré les re- gards d'un jaloux," one of the prettiest melodies of the whole score; a song in B flat, for the Cadi; a well written trio in G; a Chœur de femmes at the beginning of Act II, the subject having already appeared in the overture; the hysterical scene; and the duet in which Zilda forces the Cadi to dance. A romance for the Vizir, and the Air du Bengali for Zilda also deserve mention. The piece was well put on the stage, and the principal artists Mme. Cabel (Zilda), MM. Prilleux (The Doctor), Sie Foy (Le Cadi), Crosti (Le Vizir) and Bernard (Le Calife) were much applauded. There is some talk of remounting Mehul's "Joseph" at this theatre, and an opera by Ambroise Thomas is promised for next winter.

At the Theatre Lyrique the performance of Nicolai's opera, "Les Joyeuses Comédiennes de Windsor," has been interrupted by the retreat of M. Du Wast. At the Opera we expect the reprise of Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète," with Mlle. Bloch as Fidès and Mme. Gueymard-Lauters as Berthe.

The Past Musical Year in Boston.

V. CHAMBER MUSIC.

In this department the concerts of the year have not been as numerous as last year, but the quality has averaged high and the selections have been mostly very choice. To begin with

1. THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

They gave during the winter only four concerts; but never with finer programmes, never with more care and spirit in the performance or more lively interest on the part of their audience. These were the works presented.

Quintets (for strings): Mozart in E flat, No. 5.—Mendelssohn, in B flat, No. 2, Op. 87.—Schubert, in C, op. 163 (with two 'cellos).—Rubenstein, in F, op. 59.

Quintet (for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon)—pianist, J. C. D. Parker, Beethoven.

Quartets (strings): Beethoven, in A minor op. 132 (twice); in C, op. 59, No. 3.—Mendelssohn in E flat, op. 44.

Trio (piano, violin and 'cello): Beethoven, in D, op. 70 (Mrs. Frohock, Messrs. Schultze and Fries).

Pianoforte pieces: Bach, Concerto in G minor, with Quintet accompaniment (B. J. Lang).—Mendelssohn, Caprices (do).—Mozart, Fantasia from piano Sonata in C minor, No. 1 (Hermann Daum).—Schumann, Adagio and Allegro, for piano and 'cello, op. 70, in A flat (Daum and Fries).

2. Messrs. AUG. KREISSMANN, the tenor singer, and HUGO LEONHARD, pianist, gave five Soirées, in Chickering's Hall, in November, December and January. The piano-forte compositions were the following:

BEETHOVEN: Sonata, op. 7 (twice); Sonata, op. 27, No. 2; Sonata Appassionata, op. 57.

J. S. BACH: Gavotte, from one of the "English Suites" (twice); Allegro from a Suite Anglaise. First movement from Concerto in D minor, (the string quartet accompaniments arranged for a second piano); Gavotte in B minor.

CHOPIN: Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2 (twice); Scherzo, op. 20 (twice); Ballade, op. 52; Etude, op. 25, No. 1; Scherzo, op. 54 (E major); Etude from op. 25: Andante spianato and Polonaise, op. 53: Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1.

LISZT: Song of R. Franz, transcribed (twice). SCHUMANN: Trio (piano, violin and 'cello), op. 63, (twice); last movement from Fantasie, op. 17.

MENDELSSOHN: Caprice, op. 16, No 1, (2).

SCHUBERT: Trio (piano, violin, &c.) op. 100.

Songs, the following:

SCHUBERT: "Der Neugierige"; "Ungehduld"; "Am Meer"; "Aufenthalt"; "Der Erlkönig."

SCHUMANN: "Waldesgespräch" (2); "Mondnacht" (2); "Frühlingsnacht" (2); "Der Nussbaum"; "Widmung"; several from the "Dichterliebe" cyclus.

ROBERT FRANZ: "Auf dem Meer"; "Liebchen ist da"; "Rastlose Liebe" (Goethe), twice; "Für Musik"; "Frühlingsgedränge"; "Willkommen mein Wuld"; "Erinnerung"; "O danke nicht"; "Im Wald, im Wald"; "Er ist gekommen"; "Er ist's"; "Ständchen"; "Die Harrende"; "Stille Sicherheit"; "Trübe wird's"; "Sonnenuntergang"; "Mailed" (Goethe); "Die Lotosblume"; "Das dunkelgrüne Laub"; "Schlummerlied" (Tieck); "Im Frühling."

BEETHOVEN: Liederkries: "An die ferne Geliebte."

MOZART: Aria from the Seraglio: "O wie ängstlich" (with orchestral accompaniments arranged for two pianos by Otto Dresel).

BACH: Aria from a religious Cantata (accompaniment arr. by R. Franz).

3. Mr. CARL ROSA, who came to this country in Mr. Bateman's concert troupe, with Mme. Parepa, had one chamber concert, complimentary to him on the part of the Harvard Musical Association. The instrumental pieces were:

BEETHOVEN: Sonata, in F, for violin and piano; Kreutzer Sonata, do,—both by Messrs. Rosa and Dresel.

BACH: Chaconne for violin, with Mendelssohn's accompaniment (Rosa and Dresel).

SCHUMANN: Phantasie-stück, piano and violin; "Abendlied," arr. for violin by Joachim.

On that occasion Mr. Kreissmann sang the following songs by FRANZ: "Die Lotosblume"; "Hör ich ein Vöglein"; "Nachtgesang"; "Rastlose Liebe"; "Willkommen mein Wald."

4. We may add here various classical performances by CARL ROSA, as well as piano pieces by MR. DANNREUTHER and Mr. LANG, in the PAREPA concerts, besides some of the vocal selections of Mme. Parepa.

BACH: Chaconne for violin (twice); Fugue in D, from Well-tempered Clavichord."

MOZART: Sonata in B flat (violin and piano); Aria: "Non mi dir" from Don Juan.

HAYDN: Sonata duo in G; Airs from Creation (With verdure clad," &c.).

BEETHOVEN: Kreutzer Sonata; Aria: "Per pietà, (Mrs. Cary.)

MENDELSSOHN: Capriccioso in B minor (Dannreuther); Prelude in E minor (Lang); Air: "Hear ye, Israel."

HANDEL: "From mighty kings"; "If guiltless blood" (Susannah); "I know that my Redeemer"; "Let the bright Seraphim."

WEBER: Invitation to the Dance (twice); Scena from Freyschütz; do. from Oberon ("Ocean").

SCARLATTI: Harpsichord Lesson (Dannreuther).

CHOPIN: Waltz in C sharp minor (Do.) &c. SPOHN: Adagio for Violin.

ERNST: "Elegio" (twice).

5. HERMANN DAUM's two Soirées.
MOZART: Trio in E flat, op. 14, for piano, clarinet and viola.

BEETHOVEN: Sonata in C, op. 2, No. 3; Trio in B flat, op. 11, for piano, clarinet and 'cello.

SCHUBERT: Song: "The Wanderer" (Miss Ryan); Sacred Song, transcribed by Liszt.

HUMMEL: Grand Septet in D minor.

SCHUMANN: Quintet in E flat, op. 44, for piano, violins, &c.; Song: "Now say, my little birdie bright."

WEBER: Rondo ("Perpetuum mobile").

FRANZ: Songs: "Out of my soul's great sadness"; "Forest birds"; "Darling is here"; "Good night"; "Supplication"; "Now the shades are falling."

6. Miss ALICE DUTTON, in a Soirée in October, played:

BEETHOVEN: Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3; "Moonlight" Sonata.

BACH: Prelude and Fugue in C sharp.

MENDELSSOHN: Song without Words, in B minor, Book II; transcription of "Auf Flügeln der Gesanges."

SCHUMANN: Notturmo in F, op. 23.

CHOPIN: Impromptu in A flat.

7. Mr. ERNST PERARO's three concerts and private Matinée:

BACH: Concerto, for 3 pianos (Peraro, Dressel and Leonhard); Partita in B flat (six movements), twice.

BEETHOVEN: Sonata in E flat, op. 27 (twice); Sonata in B flat, op. 106 (several movements); Trio in B flat, op. 97; Sonata in F, for piano and violin (H. Suck).

HUMMEL: Grand Septet in D minor.

SCHUBERT: Sonata, op. 53, in D major.

CHOPIN: Rondo for two pianos, op. 73, in C, (with Mr. Lang).

BENNETT: Etude; Allegro grazioso; several of the "Diversions" for 4 hands, op. 17.

E. F. RICHTER: Gondellied. — BARGIEL: Suite; Scherzo, &c. — THALBERG: Scherzo. — N. BURGMEULLER: Andante and Finale from Concerto.

8. Mr. PARKER's Club of amateurs have sung some fine things in the concerts given to their friends during the season (each of which was repeated); namely:

BACH: Choral: "Grant, Lord," &c.

SCHUMANN: New Year's Song (or Cantata); Song: "Der Nussbaum." — FRANZ: "Mailed."

PARKER: Part Song: "The West wind."

HAUPTMANN: Offertorium (Lauda anima).

MENDELSSOHN: 115th Psalm (Non nobis Domine); Ave Maria (tenor solo and chorus); Part-songs: "Hunting Song" and "Song of the Lark."

GADE: "Comala," subject from Ossian, entire.

HUMMEL: Benedictus; Agnus Dei.

SCHUBERT: Miriam's Song of Triumph, (Soprano solo and chorus).

BEETHOVEN: Quartet from Fidelio.

And here must end our resumé of the good music sung or played publicly in Boston during the past year. The list is by no means carefully complete, but it makes a good tide-mark to show how greatly the taste of audiences has improved, and (considering how few have been the miscellaneous, the operatic, ballad concerts, &c., compared with those above enumerated), it shows how much higher are the kinds of music now required to win the public confidence.

MUSIC AT HARVARD. We had not room in our last to speak of the three subscription concerts given lately under the shades of our old University, in Appleton Chapel, under the direction of Mr. J. K. PAINE, who is organist and musical instructor there; yet they were occasions of too much interest to go unrecorded. The object was to raise funds to reimburse Mr. Paine and others who had at their own expense had important repairs and additions made to the college organ; and the response was liberal, though it will perhaps require further concerts in the autumn to fully meet the outlay; if so, the music-lovers of Cambridge, and not a few of Boston also, will be only too glad in view of a revival of such pleasant hours. The company was large, although it by no means filled the Chapel, and of the most refined character. The music consisted of Organ performances by Mr. Paine, and vocal selections by an amateur choir or club of Cambridge ladies and gentlemen, who have been practising good things during the past season under his direction, aided by a couple of excellent solo singers from Boston—Mrs GILBERT, soprano, and Mr. G. H. POWERS, basso.

There was only one drawback to the general charm of the music; and that was accidental and of a character which must have been very annoying to Mr. Paine, while it offered the most palpable illustration to the audience of the necessity which called the concerts into being. The work upon the organ was not quite completed; the concerts had to be given somewhat prematurely in view of the approaching close of the academic term; and, though the instrument had gained much in power and efficiency and was in many portions highly satisfactory, yet accidents from time to time occurred, which balked the organist's best intentions, and which no artist's skill could remedy. For instance, the great lungs repeatedly gave out before he was able to go uninterruptedly and grandly through with the famous Bach Toccata in F; one or two pieces had to be omitted altogether and others substituted, while others were disturbed by the rattling of the mechanism in certain stops, especially in accompaniment. In spite of all this there was a great deal which a cultivated taste could enjoy in all the concerts; the taste, the high tone which pervaded the programmes and the whole design, was in itself a source of pleasure, more than compensating for some short-comings in the execution.

The first concert, on Saturday afternoon, June 9, opened with Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, —perhaps the greatest of Bach's works in that kind, which was fortunate as well as skilful in the rendering. Then the choir (some sixteen voices) sang the Lacrymosa and the Sanctus from Mozart's Requiem, followed by the quartet Benedictus from the same; —all rich and clear in tone, well blended, tastefully accompanied upon the organ. Next came the Andante and Allegretto from Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata in B flat. Hauptmann's (who now holds old Bach's place of Cantor in the Thomas Kirche at Leipzig) Salve Regina, a beautiful piece of clear, smooth, learned and expressive harmony, was well sung by the choir and gave real pleasure. Next an Organ Sonata in E minor, by Ritter; and then, what was most enjoyed by the most, five pieces from the Lauda Sion of Mendelssohn. The soprano solos, Sit laus plena and Caro cibus were given with rare truth and beauty; and we know not where else in the country to look for a tenor of such pure, refined, expressive quality, of good power and compass, controlled by true, chaste musical feeling, as that which lent such charm to the quartet, and which belongs to a young gentleman of the present graduating class. Properly nursed and developed, it would be invaluable in oratorio and other higher uses. The Toccata in F, as we have said, was grand when it at length was allowed full career.

Monday Eve, June 18. The second concert had for vocal pieces: Mozart's perfect, only too short,

Ave verum chorus; the bass aria from St. Paul, "O God, have mercy," admirably sung by Mr. Powers; the bright, inspiring "trumpet" chorus from Samson, made as effective as it well could be with so few voices (the room, however, gave them great sonority). Cherubini's Ave Maria, nicely sung by Mrs. Gilbert; and selections from Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio Christus. The last were very impressive, including the Trio for a tenor and two bass voices, the rich and mournful chorus: "Daughters of Zion," and a Choral.—The Organ pieces were: the other great Toccata of Bach, that in D minor; a beautiful Choral Vorspiel (or Choral sung line by line, intermittently, on a prominent reed stop, with figurative, poetic prelude accompaniment and variation upon blended softer stops); and three pieces of the organist's own composition: an Andante with variations, musician-like, of rather a tamely respectable old cut, —a "Caprice," something like a song without words, captivating by its grace and freedom, and somewhat original,—and that Fantasia and Fugue in E minor, in which Mr. Paine seems to us to have most successfully studied and wrought, though of course at a distance, in the spirit of his great master, the master of all true organists.

Wednesday Eve, June 20. This was the rarest of the three programmes. The great novelty was the selections from Bach's Passion music (according to St. Matthew). These were a Contralto Solo: "O Father, hear," a bass solo: "Give me back my dearest Savior," and the double chorus (the finale of the work) "We bow us down." The last suffered the least in the rendering and was indeed deeply impressive. The solos suffered by the refractory humor of the organ in the stops called in play for the exquisite preludes and accompaniments, which in any case require separate orchestral instruments to make their meaning and their beauty fully palpable. Besides, the best of our singers are as yet too slightly initiated into the peculiar form and spirit of Bach's melody, to render it with ease and full expression. But all honor to the singers and to Mr. Paine for this beginning in a direction, which it behoves our great choral societies to enter and pursue, at the cost of whatsoever cost of rehearsal and patient putting up with failures, until they reach the crown of fair success.

The selections from Cherubini's Requiem (Introit, Graduel and Sanctus), were also a novelty—all but the Sanctus, which was sung at the Harvard "Commemoration" last July, and highly edifying. And again, a third novelty, in the shape of three selections from a Mass in D, by Mr. Paine, which he has lately finished with great care and has now in press. The chorus: Confiteor a part of the Credo, impressed us as learned, ingenious in treatment, both of voice parts and accompaniment, and full of strong religious confidence in tone,—free from what is commonplace, or dry, or feebly sentimental,—churchlike and not operatic. The Quoniam, a tenor solo, has some rather original phrases, while the whole melody is developed and sustained with so much grace and freedom, and was so beautifully sung, that it had to be repeated. We were most struck, however, by the power and beauty of the Dona Nobis, which the composer has treated gravely, and not in that light, almost playful operatic style in which so many Masses, those of Haydn and Mozart included, have indulged. The individuality of style was also marked. We would not, however, presume to judge this music on this single hearing; but it has increased our desire to hear the Mass brought out some day entire with orchestra.

The concert opened and closed with a Prelude in E-flat major and the Fugue in G minor by Bach, both very noble works,—the latter grown familiar now to those who often hear the great Organ of the Boston Music Hall. Mr. Paine also played extracts from Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas, and would have played an Andante by Mozart, had the temporary rig of the instrument held out; as it was, another tenor solo, by the same sweet voice, one of the sacred airs of Beethoven with the text Agnus Dei put to it, proved extremely acceptable to the audience in its place.

THE GERMAN SAENGER FEST at Providence, on the 26th, 27th, 28th and 29th ult., seems to have been musically and socially a real success, in spite of terrific midsummer heat and remarkable apathy on the part of the Rhode-Islanders; for the audience at each of the concerts was far too small to remunerate the Providence Liederkrantz for the great expense at which they, as sponsors of the Festival, and guests to all the singing hundreds, had arranged the whole affair upon so generous a scale. To our great regret we were unable to be present as we had intended; we can only glean from various sources some notion of what was done; and that too must be brief and partial; perhaps we shall be able to present a fuller account in our next.

Of course there was the usual amount of receptions, processions, banners, wreaths, arches, musical and Vaterland mottoes, speeches (by Gov. Burnside, by Dr. Gottschalk, president of the Fest, &c., &c.) and all Providence, outwardly at least, was alive and gay and resonant with song and shout, and flowing with streams from the ever full horn of Gambrinus. There were some 600 singers. New York sent 11 societies; Philadelphia, one; Newark, N. J., two; Boston, Springfield, Worcester, Westfield, Hartford, Williamsburg, one each; and Providence was represented by its Orpheus Club (names most American), besides the giver of the feast, the Liederkrantz. The vocal directors were, Herr Agricola Paur, of New York, and Herr Eugene Henri, of Providence. Carl Zerrahn conducted the orchestra of some 50 performers, mostly from Boston. This was the first programme (Tuesday evening, 26th) —

1. Overture, Leonora, in C, No. 3, Beethoven. 2. A Mighty Fortress is Our Lord, Luther, arranged by Fincke, grand chorus and orchestra. 3. Wachet Auf, Sangerbund, Philadelphia, Hencken. 4. Union Song, grand double chorus, H. Marschner. 5. Chorus from the Pilgrimage of the Rose, R. Schumann, by the Orpheus of Boston. 6. The Free Sword, grand chorus with orchestra, C. Schuppert. Part 2: 1. Overture, characteristic, Carl Bergmann. 2. Nachthelle, chorus, with tenor solo and orchestra, Fr. Schubert, by the Liederkrantz, New York. 3. The Singers' Greeting, grand chorus and orchestra, J. G. Mueller. 4. a. How Can I Leave Thee. b. Frozen Flowers, by the Arion, N. Y., Silcher. 5. Hymns, Jubilant Creation, H. Bohr, Grand chorus and orchestra.

The orchestral pieces, if we may trust the Tribune's correspondent, were executed to perfection; and the choruses and part-songs by single Clubs are highly praised, especially those sung by the Philadelphia Liederkrantz, and the Arion of New York.

The Matinee at 2 P. M., on Wednesday, was the chief occasion for instrumental music, but the vocal parts were also interesting; this is the programme:

PART I.—1. Overture Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn. 2. Am Meerestrande, solo quartet Th. Eisfeld; Hartford Quartet Club. 3. Baritone Solo, Mr. Steins, of the Liederkrantz, N. Y. 4. Andante, 5th Symphony, Beethoven. 5. Farewell, Orpheus Club, Providence, Otto. 6. Andante, and Finale, Symphony in C, Schubert.

PART II.—1. Les Preludes, F. Liszt. 2. Solo Tannhauser, Wagner; by Mr. Schraubstedter, Orpheus, Boston. 3. Wandering, solo quartet, Kreutzer, Liederkrantz, N. Y. 4. Andante from the Jupiter Symphony, Mozart. 5. The Water Lily, by the Orpheus, Boston, Fr. Abt. 6. Concert Overture in A, Jul. Rietz.

That time the Liederkrantz Quartet, of New York, and the Orpheus, of Boston, won the vocal honors.

The third and last concert followed in the evening. It was almost wholly vocal,—a competition between the several societies, each limited to one part-song, the only prize being the verdict of the public.

PART I.—1. Overture, Tannhauser, Wagner. 2.

Love and Mercy, by the Saengerbund of Philadelphia, Fr. Otto. 3. Wandering at Night, by the Frohsinn of Worcester, Mass., Fr. Abt. 4. Frühlingsnahen, by the Mozart Verein, New York, Kroutzer. 5. Soldier's Love, by the Erato, New York, L. Schroeder. 6. Zwiegesang, by the Quartet Club of Hartford, Ct., Dudley Buck of Hartford. 7. Good Night, by the Eintracht of Newark, N. J., Fr. Abt.

PART II.—1. Overture, Oberon, C. M. Weber. 2. Deutsches Volkslied, by the Arion Society of New York. 3. Dem Vaterlande, by the Teutonia of New York, Meyerbeer. 4. Waldabend-scheid, by the Liederkrantz of New York, Fr. Abt. 5. Reitarlied, by the Orpheus of Boston, Mass., Fr. Liszt. 6. Ruhe, by the Jungen Mannerchor of New York, Fr. Abt. 7. An die Freunde by the Beethoven Mannerchor of New York, Greger. 8. Wanderers Nachtlied, by the Sociale Mannerchor of New York, Lenz. 9. Hymnus, God is the Lord, by the Colonia Mannerchor of New York, Berner. 10. Orchestral (Der Fakeltanz), Meyerbeer.

We have not heard of any formal verdict of superiority. Here is what the Tribune says of the singing:

The Philadelphia Saengerbund opened the concert—a position which would have been fatal to a society of lower standing. They choose Otto's piece, Love and Mercy, a very elaborate and difficult, but beautiful composition, abounding in modulations sudden and delicate, and frequent changes of tempo. From some reason or other, the voices were not as well under control as usual. In the commencement the intonation was a little untrue. This, however, disappeared when the piece was well under way. The points of excellence which the performance of this society displayed were decision and promptitude, just expression and enunciation, firmness in all the modulations, the grace of the portamento and the sharpness of the staccato. All these points were displayed in this piece, which concluded with a very complicated Fugue, which was clearly and powerfully interpreted. This piece gained an unanimous encore. Taking into consideration the work performed, which was of the highest character in the programme, and the perfection, and making allowance for certain vocal inequalities which must be attributed to unavoidable circumstance: we consider the Saengerbund of Philadelphia the most thoroughly instructed and competent singing society of all who performed at the Providence Saengerfest.

The Frohsinn Society of Worcester is very weak in the article of voices. Their singing was fair, but the voices, especially the tenors, were weak and inharmonious.

The Mozart-Verein of N. Y. sang very beautifully; the pianissimos and the crescendos were finely given. The tenor voices are good in passages of power, but they are apt to partially break in the medium power. Still they must rank among the first class. They gained a hearty encore, which called out the Fest-President, who stated that no more encores would be allowed, in consequence of the length of the programme.

The Erato Society of N. Y. distinguished itself greatly. The conductor, who is also the solo tenor, has a fine and extensive voice, and sang with so much taste and expression, and was supported by the Society with such skillful and careful coloring, that at the close of the selection the applause came down like a roar of thunder.

The Quartet Club of Hartford sang very tastefully, and merited the warm applause they received.

The Eintracht Society of Newark, N. J., stands high among the first-class societies. It has the best tenor voices of all the Societies, although we must remark that it had, on this occasion, the invaluable vocal assistance of the talented leader of the Erato, above alluded to. Their performances were admirable throughout, being distinguished by fine taste, color and smoothness.

The Arion Society of New York sang magnificently, fully sustaining the brilliant reputation it so honorably won, displaying all those artistic excellencies which belong to the first among the first-class societies. The Arion Society has but one or two equals, and may be justly proud of the high excellence which it has attained by intelligent practice. The applause which followed this performance was deafening and long continued.

The Teutonia Mannerchor of N. Y. is a well-drilled society, and displays germs of excellence, which, if cultivated, will soon place it among the first-class singing societies. They must, however, strengthen their tenors.

The Leiderkrantz of N. Y. created a perfect furore, by their singing of an admirable composition written for them by Abt, who is an honorary member of the Society. The composer seems to have taken the measure of the singers, for the work brings out their best and strongest points. The subject is beautiful and the alternate measures of solo for tenor and baritone, beautifully sung by Mr. William Steinway and Mr. Steins, were wonderfully telling. The Leiderkrantz like the Arion, displayed all the artistic requisites of a first-class society, foremost in the ranks, and executed the work without blemish. The applause which followed was unanimous and deafening, and continued on so persistently, that the Leiderkrantz re-appeared and sang as finely as before. We think they should have abided by the rule established in common faith, with the societies which preceded them, and who had won like honor, without accepting it. Under the circumstances the encore replied to counts no more than the encore received and not responded to in obedience to a rule laid down.

The Orpheus, of Boston, sang admirably in all respects, saving that the modulations were somewhat wavering and uncertain. It is a competent and excellent Society, and ranks in the first class. A weeding out of some of the poor voices would much advantage this Society.

The Jungen Mannerchor of New York are well trained, and sang well, but there are some bad voices among the members, the baritones especially, which refuse to harmonize, and should be excluded.

The Social Mannerchor of New York sang the Wanderers' Nachtlied by Lenz, in a very masterly manner. The voices are all good, the tenors especially. This is a first-class Society.

The Beethoven Mannerchor of New York exhibits excellent training, and sang effectively and well. The first basses were a little untrue in intonation, and detracted somewhat from the otherwise highly creditable performances.

The Colonia Mannerchor of New York selected a piece which was certainly beyond their executive power. Their training in certain respects has been good, but more care should be taken to insure true intonation, and more judgment shown in the acceptance of voices.

THE ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY held its semi-annual meeting on Tuesday evening last. After unanimously re-electing the old board of officers for another year, and transacting other business, among which was the adoption of a new constitution, adapted to the wants of this now large organization, the society, presented its musical director, Carl Zerrahn, with a handsomely bound set of the Symphonies of Beethoven, in score, Breitkopf and Härtel's new edition. This testimonial was in recognition of his eminent services as director, during the last musical season. No more appropriate gift could have been made to one who has been for years the conductor of our best orchestral concerts. Mr. Zerrahn responded in a modest manner, appreciating most highly this token of confidence and esteem.

A contemporary states that botanical nomenclature is to be enriched with the name of Mlle. Arabella Goddard—that a flower is to be called after her. We understand the practice will be amplified, as many other artists will also supply horticulture with designations. The Simserevrensia is to be the title of a very rare exotic, while an entire order of plants will henceforth be known as the Madeline-schillerueia.

Two hundred and sixty-nine concerts have been given in Paris during the past winter season, as a patient statistic has reckoned:—37 at the Conservatoire and Cirque Napoléon, 72 at the Salle Herz, 85 at the Salle Pleyel, 51 at the Salle Erard, and the rest in miscellaneous salons. The Revue et Gazette Musicale recommends these figures to those artists who complain of the scanty notices given them by the journals.

Like Felicien David, Bottesini has met with great applause in his Russian tour, magnificent eulogies, and very little money. His retreat from Moscow has therefore been precipitated, and he is now in Trieste.

The "Africaine" is going to Stockholm. A young lady named Jigné Hobbe is studying in Paris the Selika, for its representation in the Swedish capital. Frøken Jigné Hobbe is said to be one of the best singers in Sweden.

"A Few Facts concerning the Grand Opera in Paris, and the Salaries of the Artists," is the title of a recent article in the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung. As it contains several facts not generally known, we condense it for the information of our readers.

The first managers of this famous art-institute were the Abbé Perrin and Cambert, the composer, associated with a certain Marquis Sourdeac, who, from love of the occupation was—the machinist. At the end of a twelvemonth, during which the managers cleared 120,000 francs, the management was taken from them and given to Lulli, the Musical Director to Louis XIV. Lulli did quite as well as his predecessors, for he made a fortune of 800,000 francs in fifteen years. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Francine, who leased out the speculation to several capitalists, from whom he afterwards took it back. By the king's command, the Dauphin's Master of the Horse was received into partnership with him in the year 1698. But the new-comer ruined him. The enterprise again passed into the hands of capitalists; was again resumed by Francine; was then carried on by a farmer of the customs, who was ruined, and then once more reverted to Francine, who was again unable to retain it. The king, who had himself hitherto been the principal director of his musical amusements, was so little edified by these continual changes, that he entrusted the management to the Chamberlain of the Palace. Matters then became involved in good earnest. The Duc d'Antin, brother of the Marquis de Montespan, was appointed stage-manager, but soon resigned the post. In 1728, a composer of the name of Destouches obtained the management, and disposed of it for the sum of 300,000 francs, to a M. Gruet, who was granted the patent for thirty years. He was, however, deprived of it by a peremptory resolution of the Council of State, and his previous partners, the Count Saint-Gilles and the President Lebeuf, became his successors, but after the lapse of ten months, were sent into banishment. In 1732, Prince Cavignon was Head Royal Inspector; in 1733, Captain de Thuret obtained Gruet's patent, and in eleven years was ruined in health and fortune. In 1744, Berger entered upon the management with the same result. Next came a M. Tréfontaine who, in sixteen months, left the manager's room for the Bastille. By Royal command, the Municipality now undertook the management—fresh troubles. In the year 1778, the Grand Opera received for the first time a subvention of 80,000 francs, an enormous sum for the period, yet, after a twelvemonth's trial, the manager, De Vismis, would not retain the office. In 1780, Louis XVI. again leased out the theatre to the Municipality, and Berton, the composer, became manager. In 1790, the Municipality again undertook the burden, and, in 1792, Francœur obtained the patent for thirty years. He was, however, deposed no later than in 1793, and replaced by a committee consisting of the most violent sans-culottes. Danton, Hébert, Henrion, etc., were now to be met behind the scenes once frequented by crowds of elegant gentlemen. One evening, after Lainez, the singer had sung a patriotic ode, a man, who had been talking upon the stage to the above chiefs of the Revolution went up to him and said good-humoredly: "Citizen, your ode is worth nothing. I know you did not write it, but I advise you, for the future, before offering the Nation such stupid trash, to show it to me; I will act as censor." "Yes," observed one of the choristers present, "and our good-natured censor knows all about slashing and cutting." Lainez afterwards learned that his critic was the Executioner of Paris, who spent his spare time at the Opera. The affrighted artist then perceived the hidden meaning of the chorister's words.

After the Reign of Terror, a manager was again appointed. During the Consulate, the Grand Opera was placed under the supervision of the Prefect of the Palace. In 1807, the High Chamberlain was director of the Theatres, and Picard manager, which he continued under Louis XVIII. also. In 1821, Habeneck was manager under the Chief Intendant and Minister of the Royal Household, Count de Blacas. After the Revolution of July, the Opera was made a private undertaking, and M. Véron became manager. In 1835, he gave up his place to M. Duponchel, and retired a millionaire. (It was during his management that Robert le Diable and Les Huguenots were produced). After Duponchel came, in 1840, Leon Pillet, who, in seven years, contracted debts to the amount of 513,000 francs. Duponchel then again undertook the management with M. Nestor Roqueplan. The latter remained as sole manager after the events of 1848.

On the establishment of the Empire, the Opera was once more placed under the control of the Minister of the Imperial Household. The last three "Imperial" managers have been: 1854, M. Crosnier; 1856,

M. Alphonse Royer; and 1862, M. Perrin, who is now the first private manager. Previously to 1789, the salaries of the principal singers amounted to 9000 francs, and those of the dancers to 7000; during the Revolution, they amounted to 20,000 and 15,000 with certain state grants. Before 1789, a figurante received 700 francs, and during the Consulate, 1,300. In the time of Louis XVI., the orchestra cost 46,000 francs, and in that of Napoleon I., 132,000. At the present day, the first singers cost annually sums of 60,000, 80,000, 120,000 or 150,000 francs each. The other expenses, amounting before 1789 to a few hundred thousand francs, and during the first Empire to a million and a half, have now risen to four millions.

The Musical Institute of Florence offers for the best orchestral overture a prize amounting to $20.

A new opera, entitled "Astorga" has been given at Stuttgart. It is by Abert, and is highly spoken of.

War and the rumors of war have caused the adjournment of the Coburg and the Hanover festivals.

Félicien David is spoken of as likely to obtain the next vacant membership of the Institute, Paris.

The maestro Pacini is writing for the San Carlo, Naples, an opera which will be called "La Streghe di Hofbau."

The artists largely employed in the Dusseldorf Festival have in large numbers been called off for the conscript.

The next three act opera which Offenbach will produce in the winter is to be named "Caliph Haroun al Raschid."

La France Musicale lets in some light on Shakespeares which is calculated to dazzle his English admirers. Treating of Nicolai's "Merry Wives," the critic says, "A descendant of sir John Falstaff, the brave companion of Talbot, the hardy captain who fought so well at Agincourt and the siege of Orleans, had the misfortune to insult Shakespeare: Shakespeare has made of sir Falstaff a type of vaunting cowardice. Posterity has effaced history; she has put in its place a phantasm of grand dramaturgy." Our readers will learn for the first time, and probably with some astonishment that rare Jack Falstaff and Sir John Fastolfe were identical, and that Shakespeare's creation was caused by an "insult." We had some vague idea that the prototype of Falstaff was named Oldcastle. But the France Musicale critic—especially a critic who can talk learnedly of "Mme. Ford, Mme. Page, Fenton and Miss Anna," must know best.

The last of the illustrious Hungarian family who have maintained at their own expense an orchestra and choir of singers—Paul Esterhazy—has died at Ratisbon. Hummel was at one time his Kapellmeister, as Haydn was Kapellmeister to his father.

The Semaine Musicale having questioned the vote of the Académie des Beaux Arts, in favor of Gounod over Félicien David, the France Musicale defends him. The Semaine maintains that David had the right of preference on the ground of priority of age. The France replies that if he Félicien David, is happy in being 55, M. Gounod is no infant at 48; neither is the Institut an Hotel des Invalides.

There are in the whole of Europe, 1,480 theatres; of these there are 337 in France; 168 in Spain; 159 in England; 152 in Austria; 115 in Germany; 76 in Prussia; 44 in Russia; 34 in Belgium; 23 in Holland; 20 in Switzerland; 10 in Sweden; 8 in Norway; 16 in Portugal; 10 in Denmark; 4 in Greece; 4 in Turkey; 4 in Roumania; and 1 in Servia. In Italy there is one theatre for every 75,000 of the inhabitants.

Moscheles has been fêted at Leipsic by a musical performance of his works. The veteran pianist improvised a fantasia with great spirit and success. Since the death of Czerny, Moscheles is among the few living artists personally acquainted with Beethoven. The reminiscences of this pianist and composer, of Vienna, London, and Leipsic, would form an interesting publication. His performances in London of Beethoven's Sonatas have never been surpassed, if equalled, for their traditional tempo and character. Since the period when Moscheles left London, the taste for Chamber Music has spread far and wide. Moscheles did much in his time to improve English taste, and his Concertos are even now too good and interesting to be neglected.—Orchestra.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC;

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Les Harmoniennes. Concone. 3 female voices. 40
Behold the storm. (Voici l'orage).

This capital set of trios is so admirably adapted for all kinds of ladies' classes in seminaries and elsewhere, that a teacher, after one, must necessarily use another. They are quite melodious, thoroughly made, and are quite easy. Concone has managed to make the part of the third voice, which is not usually a popular one, quite pretty, as well as easy, and the whole of this "storm trio" fits well in a programme.

I'll say good night. Song. F. Wilmarth. 30

A sort of serenade, or end of a serenade, containing a pleasing "good night" chorus.

Far from home. Song. F. Wilmarth. 30

Excellent for the far away one to sing, and commended to all exiles from home.

Etta Moore. Song. F. Wilmarth. 30

One more to join the great company of musical heroines, who never really were, and have now, (alas,) left us forever. But their sad fate is a very touching subject to sing about, and this bids fair to be one of the favorite ballads.

Wherever I wander, I'm never alone. L. V. Crosby. 30

A good song, and has been brought out before the audiences of Mr. C.'s concerts.

Instrumental.

L' Etoile du Nord. (Revue melodique). 4 hands.

Beyer. 75

A sparkling resumé of the airs of Meyerbeer's brilliant opera, which contains a large number of taking pieces, and bright bits of melody.

Piano piece, No. 3. Op. 23. Bargiel. 35

In sextuple measure, the second and fifth strokes, throughout, with the left hand. In this simple form is included a great variety, and the whole is very pretty and suggestive, and a little different from any thing else. If you wish something strangely pretty, buy these pieces.

Petitionen waltzes. Op. 153. Strauss.

Very brilliant and Strauss-like, throughout, and of a style just now very popular.

Immortellen waltz. (Rustic pictures). Baumbach. 30

Another excellent instructive piece of the above series.

Harp on the tree. Romance for piano.

E. Hoffman. 75

Mr Hoffman, in a very elegant manner, reproduces in music, thoughts suggested by the sighing of the breeze past the strings of a harp, suspended on a tree. There is a harmonious succession of chords, garnished with a fret-work of arpeggios, runs, trills and all sorts of graceful turns, which are quite a sight to see, somewhat difficult to play, but very agreeable to the listener's ear.

Books.

THE ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO. A series of Voluntaries, selected from the works of Ancient and Modern Composers. E. F. Rimbault. $4.00

One of the most pleasing books ever prepared for the organ; meaning by that, of course, no superiority to the great works of the great masters. But this is selected, with a very good judgment, from those masters, and is very skillfully adapted to the capacity of common organists, and the average taste of congregations. Most of the pieces have marked and striking melodies. Music is selected from Rinck, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Mozart, Handel, Beethoven, Weber, Hummel, Hesse, Andre, Gluthman, Dussek, and others.

These voluntaries are for Reed, as well as Pipe Organs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Cavalry Song:—The Forlorn Hope.

From the German of G. HERWEGH.

[This song was translated for the Singer-Fest at Providence, where the original "Reiterlied" was sung by the Orpheus of Boston to music composed by List].

The night is o'er, the morrow come,
And on we ride, so still and dumb,—
We ride to our undoing!

The morning wind is blowing chill;
A glass more, landlord, quickly fill,
For Death waits the wooing!

Thou tender grass, ah! why so green?
Thou'lt blush all roses soon, I ween,
My blood thy leaves imbruing.
First swallow now!—On sword my hand—
For this I drink to Fatherland,
The death-vow renewing!

Quick now, again! the second quaff!
And this in Freedom's dear behalf,
This quaff o' the bitter brewing!
A heeltap! quick, whose shall it be?
This drop, O Roman Realm, to thee!
So here's to thy undoing!

To Sweetheart!—but the glass is dry—
The sabres flash, the bullets fly—
There! give my child the pieces!
Now thunder on the foe! Away!
O wild delight! At break of day,
Thro' death, away,
Pursuing! pursuing!"

J. S. D.

* The rhyme can only be preserved here by some sacrifice of simple, terse expression; thus:

To Sweetheart!—but the bullets fly,
Spears glitter—there the pieces lie—
These to my boy that's growing!

Here is the original German of the whole poem:

Die bange Nacht ist nun herum,
Wir reiten still, wir reiten stumm,
Und reiten ins Verderben.
Wie weht so scharf der Morgenwind!
Frau Wirthin, noch ein Glas geschwind
Vorn Sterben, vorn Sterben.

Du junges Gras, was stehst so grün?
Must bald wie lauter Röseln blühen,
Mein Blut ja soll dich färben.
Den ersten Schluck, ans Schwert die Hand,
Den trink' ich für das Vaterland
Zu sterben, zu sterben.

Und schnell den zweiten hinterdrein,
Und der soll für die Freiheit sein,
Der zweite Schluck vom Herben!
Dies Restchen—nun, wem bring ich's gleich?
Dies Restchen dir, O Ehemalch Reich,
Zum sterben, zum sterben!

Dem Liebes—doch das Glas ist leer,
Die Kugel saust, es blüht der Speer;
Bringt meinem Kind die Scherben!
Auf! In den Feind wie Wetterhagel!
O Reiterlust, am frühen Tag
Zu sterben, zu sterben!

Simple Counterpoint.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

The general idea of the science of Counterpoint is to reduce to a system the principles that must govern our proceeding in composing one or more voice-parts additional to a given melody, or subject. This process was for a long time managed empirically. That is, the ancient writers observed that the best effects possible for the union of two voices were to be attained only by avoiding certain progressions and relations, and by adhering as closely as possible to certain favorite consonances and modes of melodic progression. Hence arose a great body of rules, all of which rested upon inductions made from actual observation, but with no apparent connection among themselves, and no very obvious relation to any great general principle or principles, such as in other sciences are ultimately found to underlie any body of related facts.

This system arose in the middle ages among the ecclesiastical writers, who, for the most part removed from the world by their monastic vows, found their labor and delight in beautifying and elaborating the song worship of God. The anthems of the Mass and the canticles of Vespers, according to the rubric, were always to be sung to the same melodies. But such monotony was inadmissible and uninteresting to choirs of trained singers, such as were to be found in most of the great churches and religious houses of that period. According to the usual law of commerce, the demand for variety created the supply. It was found that within certain limits the people and uneducated singers might perform the canticles according to time-honored custom; while the choir could, at the same time, surround this plain song of the people with a harmonic embellishment of independent, yet subsidiary, melodies. Hence arose successively the various orders of two-part counterpoint; namely: First Order, note against note; Second Order, two notes of the counterpoint against one of the subject; Third Order, four notes against one; Fourth Order, syncopations; and Fifth Order, florid counterpoint, a combination of all the preceding. So also of the Three-voice, Four-voice, and Many-voice varieties of counterpoint.

We proceed to a summary of the rules of two-voice counterpoint; the problem being: To invent a second voice-part, which, sung at the same time as the subject, shall produce the most complete harmonic effect possible for two voices, under the voluntarily imposed limitation of employing exclusively either order of this class of composition that may be selected. First, then, of note against note.

I. Instrumental aid is dispensed with. Our task is to compose a secondary voice having always one single tone contemporary with each tone of the already-existing melody, called the Subject: and the new voice must not only produce a good harmonic effect when united with the subject, but it must have an individual and characteristic movement, or tune, of its own. Hence arise two classes of rules; of which one class answers the question: How shall the counterpoint progress, so as to secure its own separate recognition, while preserving due subordination to the subject? And the other:—What intervals is it most desirable to produce with the subject, so as to produce the most complete and satisfactory effect?

1. We proceed to consider, then, the melodic movement of the counterpoint. And first, to define terms. When the tones of a melody succeed each other by seconds, the melody is said to progress in conjunct movement. When skips are introduced, the movement is said to be disjunct.

It is evident, also, that, as compared with each other, there are three ways of progression possible to the voices. Namely: one voice may ascend while the other descends—in which case the movement is said to be contrary; one remains stationary while the other ascends or descends, making oblique motion; both voices ascend at the same time,—if by the same intervals, making parallel motion, or if by different intervals, making similar motion.

We are now prepared to consider the melodic movement of the voices, both absolute and relative. Conjunct movement is, in general, preferable to disjunct, because more easily sung; and because if the melodic thread have no breaks or interruptions, the listener may more easily follow both melodies.

The following considerations govern the progression of the voices as compared with each other. It will be remembered that the task is to give to the counterpoint as characteristic a movement as will be compatible with due subordination to the subject. Hence the rule: "Contrary motion is preferable to either oblique or similar. And oblique is to be preferred to similar; and similar to parallel. Parallel motion by perfect consonances is inadmissible; and not more than three imperfect consonances of the same denomination are allowed to succeed each other in parallel motion." Aesthetically considered, it is to be remarked that from the contrary motion of voices the mind receives the impression of a higher kind of unity than from the other varieties of motion: namely, "The union of separate and distinct things into one complete whole." Still another element is to be taken into consideration in determining how great a degree of melodic interest in the counterpoint would be compatible with the due super-eminence of the subject. Namely: the question whether the subject, or the counterpoint is to be enunciated in tones of the greater power, or more striking timbre. For it is very evident that if the subject is to be sung by a large number of voices, while the counterpoint is to be executed by a few, that the mere weight of the tone-mass will attract enough to the subject, while a very considerable degree of melodic superiority may be allowed to the counterpoint, without thereby destroying the symmetry of the work in this respect.

2. With regard to the harmonic relationship of the voices the following considerations prevail. The tone that gives coloring to the chord is the third, for it is this that determines whether the harmony be major or minor. Now in the inversions of the triad the third makes with the other elements always a third or sixth. Hence the rule:

"Voices are to stand as much as possible in the intervals of thirds or sixths with each other. These intervals, however, are not to be attained by direct or similar motion, but as much as may be by contrary. Octaves and unisons are to be avoided, except in the opening and closing. And this for the reason that it is easier for two voices to commence in these intervals than in any others; but in the progress of the work we are to employ other consonances in order to obtain a more satisfactory harmonic effect. In this order, discords are not used. The consonance of the fourth is also forbidden because it does not sound well: and this for the reason that an additional voice is required in order to give a distinct idea of the harmony intended.

II. The second order of two-part counterpoint requires two notes in the counterpoint against one in the subject. This variety affords more license than the one already noticed. A limited use of discords is allowed; but they must appear, generally, as passing notes. Usually the accented part of the measure must be a concord. The counterpoint may begin with half a measure rest; in this case the tone following the rest must concord with the subject.

III. In the third order, there are four tones of the counterpoint against one of the subject. The use of four tones in the counterpoint allows the introduction of passing notes and appoggiaturas. The counterpoint may commence with a rest equal to one of its own notes, but the rest must be followed by a concord.

IV. Syncopations. In this order we have two tones of the counterpoint against one of the subject, as in the second order; but it differs from that in the fact that in this order the last tone of the counterpoint in one measure may be suspended into the measure following,—making discords of suspension, and producing the rhythmic effect known as syncopation.

V. Florid Counterpoint. In this order, which is the form of composition usually met with, all the preceding styles may be employed in the counterpoint. Each must be governed by its own laws; and the order of their introduction is subject only to the fancy of the composer.

In a similarly systematic manner are discussed the five orders each of Three-part, Four-part, and Many-voiced counterpoint; for even an outline of which space and time do not now suffice us. Reference is made, therefore, to Cherubini's COUNTERPOINT AND FUGUE, from a perusal of which it will appear that Simple Counterpoint is not such a very simple matter. And it is respectfully but earnestly suggested by the present writer that the study of the science of counterpoint would not be amiss in those who contemplate musical composition as among the possibilities of their future employment. And we offer this suggestion with less hesitation, because examination of several recent collections of Church Music has led us to believe that it is not always safe to expect a knowledge of this science to come by nature.

M. Bach's Dream.

(From the New York Nation.)

The report of the singular adventure which has created so great a sensation here, viz. the revealing of a couple of airs and the words of a song to M. Bach of Paris, in a dream or vision, determined your correspondent to undertake a visit to that gentleman in order to ascertain from him what amount of truth there might be in the romantic story that has so deeply stirred the curiosity of this lively and incredulous city. Accordingly, having learned the address of M. Bach, I proceeded to the house indicated, No. 8 Rue Castellane, opening out of the broad and busy Rue Tronchet, just behind the Madeleine. To my great vexation I found that M. Bach had just flitted, driven away probably by the enormous rise of rents in that part of the town; the portress, however, gave me the new address of the professor, No. 61 Avenue des Ternes, and thither proceeded your correspondent only to find that the descendant of the great Sebastian was taking, with his family, advantage of the sunny holiday, and was away for the afternoon. But, being bent on seeing M. Bach, and learning from him the particulars both of the "vision" itself and of the yet more surprising events which are said to have happened since then in connection therewith, I went again to the house two days ago, and had the satisfaction at last of finding him at home.

Having sent in my card, I was ushered into the parlor, where I saw the beautiful old spinet which holds so prominent a place in this strange affair. The parlor—the picture of neatness and order—shows evident traces of the refined and antiquarian tastes of its master. The clock over the mantelpiece dates from the time of Louis XIII.; the prints on the walls are all old and interesting; bits of old porcelain and other stray waifs of the past are scattered about the room, the centre of which is occupied by a long case of ancient coins, whose collection has been one of the "favorite pleasures" of the professor's life. The precious spinet, of oak, ornamented with much fine carving, tasteful gilded arabesques, intermingled with turquoises and gilded fleurs-de-llys, is placed, for the present, on a harmonium that stands near one of the windows.

The spinet is to the modern piano what the black and bitter sloe is to the golden "magnan bonum," or luscious "green gage," of modern gardening. It is the small, weak, modest beginning of the long series of "improvements" which have resulted in the glorious scope and tonality of Erard's pianos. It consists of a box, about a metre and a half in length, rather more than half a metre wide, and without legs, so that it was portable, like a violin, enclosed in a case. When played upon, the spinet was placed upon a table or on the old fashioned stand, shaped like an X, and called after that letter. The greater part of the box is occupied by the wires, very small and weak in comparison with those of a modern piano, but disposed in the same way. In the front of the spinet is a key-board, containing four octaves, identical with those of the piano in point of musical sequence, and the white and black keys arranged in the same order, but of smaller dimensions. These keys, when played upon, move a set of wooden sticks, about the size of a finger, the tops of which are furnished with metal points that strike the corresponding wires.

My contemplation of the particular spinet which has now become so famous was interrupted by the entrance of its owner, who, being made acquainted with the object of my visit, assured me of his perfect readiness to inform me of all the circumstances of the affair. I must premise that M. Bach, great-grandson of Christian Bach, one of the sons of the immortal Sebastian Bach, is himself between sixty and seventy years of age, in delicate health, but in full possession of all his mental faculties, a busy composer, and highly esteemed by his brother artists, both as a musician and as a thoroughly upright, honest, and amiable man. He is very well known in this city, having come hither when very young, received his musical education at the Conservatoire, and resided here ever since, engaged as a composer and teacher of music. "My son Louis picked up this instrument," said M. Bach, "at a bric-a-brac shop. Knowing my liking for curiosities of the kind, he at once presented it to me. Being, as you see, of remarkable beauty and finish, and in so unusual a state of preservation, this acquisition afforded me no little satisfaction. I wished to learn something of its history, but the dealer from whom Louis had bought it could only tell him that it had just been brought from Italy, by the person from whom he had purchased it, shortly before. I spent most of the day in examining my new treasure, and, at last, having as I thought, ferreted into every part of it, I discovered the inscription: "Roma, 1564," showing where and when the instrument was made. I amused myself with examining and playing on the spinet during the evening, and went to bed with my thoughts still running on my new acquisition. During my sleep I dreamed—as you have seen it stated in the journals—that a foreigner, elegantly dressed in the costume of the French court in the middle of the sixteenth century, with the pointed hat, slashed garments, broad-toed shoes, and numerous ribbons of that day, came towards me, bowing and smiling, and told me that the spinet now in my possession had formerly belonged to him, having been presented to him by his master, King Henry III., whose favorite musician he was; that the king had been greatly in love with the beautiful Princess Marie of Cleves, Marquise d'Iely, whom he had first seen at a hunt, and wished to marry her, but that this lady had died in a cloister; that the king used often to sing a song he had composed in memory of her, and that he (the musician) would then usually play a 'saraband' he had composed, to amuse the king in these moments of sadness: that the man in the dream had then sung and played the song and the saraband on the spinet, and that he had wakened in tears touched by the pathos of the song." In short, M. Bach repeated the whole story as your readers may remember it, vouching for the truth of the published account in every particular, even to the finding, to his unbounded amazement, of the copy of the two airs and the words, which he saw lying upon his bed when he opened his eyes next morning.

The mysterious production, which Mr. Bach showed me, is written on the blank half of a sheet of music paper, on the other half of which he had been engaged, the day before, in writing down something he was in the midst of composing. The notes are written like those now in use, but the clefs are different, so that it has been necessary to transpose the song and the saraband (both of which have been published) into those in ordinary use. The words of the song, like the notation, are written very small, with extreme neatness and delicacy, apparently in pencil, and many of the letters are formed with the exploded "Gothic tails" in use in the time of Henry III.

The historic particulars since discovered by M. Bach and his friends show that an Italian musician, named Baldassarini, or Baltazarini (for the name is variously spelt), was in great favor with Henry III., and also that the young Princess of Cleves, whom the king fell in love with at a hunt, was shut up by the ambitious and unscrupulous queen-mother in a convent, where she was believed to have died of poison. The old and rare Journal de l'Etoile, a sort of gazette then published, and now to be seen at the Bibliotheque Imperiale, adds that the king went to the convent and demanded to see the corpse of his lady love, but that the abbess refused to let him do so, alleging that "decomposition had begun," but, in reality, it was thought, because she feared that the traces of poison would be discovered.

But the strangest part of this strange story is still to come. M. Bach assures me that at the period of his dream he had never even heard of the so-called "spirit manifestations" of modern times, and that, being utterly unable to account for the page of written music found on his bed, he was immensely perplexed, agitated, and troubled by the occurrence. "The dream alone," said M. Bach, "would have struck me as a very remarkable one; but still I should have regarded it as a dream, and should not have been made uneasy about it. But what was I to think of the tangible, visible proof of somebody's having been really there, afforded by the presence of the written music, this actual copy of the verses I had heard in my dream?" He spoke of the occurrence to his friends, who mentioned it again to all their acquaintances, and a host of literary men, artists and others came to see him and hear the surprising recital from his own lips. Alteric Second published a full account of the occurrence in the Grand Journal, from whose pages it was copied far and wide. And as, among the numerous visitors attracted by the story, came several firm believers in the developments of modern spiritualism, M. Bach soon arrived at the conclusion that the occurrence in question was of this nature.

"About a month after my dream," continued M. Bach, "I had a violent headache and a nervous trembling of my hand that I could not account for. I felt ill and uneasy. Suddenly, having heard of 'writing mediums,' the thought struck me, 'perhaps Baltazarini is wishing to make me write!' I can't imagine what put the idea into my head; but I took a pencil and held it on a sheet of paper. I lost my consciousness at once, and my hand wrote a verse of four lines saying that the king had given the spinet to Baldassarini. The turn of this verse being obscure, my hand then wrote as follows: 'King Henri, my master, who gave me the spinet you possess, had written a quatrain on a piece of parchment, which he had nailed inside the case, and sent to me. Some years afterwards, having to take a journey, and fearing—as I took the spinet with me to play on—that the parchment might be torn off and lost, I took it off, and that I might not lose it, I put it into a little hiding place to the left of the key-board, where it is still.'"

"At that time my spinet had been lent to the Retrospective Museum in the Palace of Industry, I could not ascertain whether this true or not. But as soon as the spinet was brought back to me, my son and I searched carefully for this parchment, but could see nothing of it. At last, having taken it almost to pieces, we found a niche under the hammer so small that we could not get at it without taking out several of them; and there, hidden under the dust and cobwebs of three hundred years, we found a piece of parchment, blackened by time, thirty centimetres long, seven and a half wide, on which, when he had cleaned it, we found the verse alluded to, and running thus:

"Moy le Roy Henry trois octrois cette espinette,
A Baltazarion mon gay musicien,
Mais sis dit mal sone, on bien (ma) moult simplette, Lors, pour mon souvenir dans l'estuy garde bien."

This parchment, which your correspondent has seen and copied, has a nail-hole on each corner; it is also pierced all around with a multitude of very small holes, which, which seem to show that it has been nailed all round with very fine nails. The writing and signature are exactly similar to those of Henry III. in authentic documents, and there can be no doubt that the piece is authentic, however obtained.

"No one could imagine," continued M. Bach, "the meaning of the word ma, surrounded by a line, as you see. But one day my hand was again moved involuntarily, and these words were written: 'Amico mio,' the king joked about my accent in the verse he sent with the spinet. I always said ma instead of mais."

M. Bach and his friends have told me a number of other particulars relative to this singular affair, all extremely marvellous and all confirmatory both of the occurrence and of the historic truth of the statements thus strangely made; but these I really dare not give in this place, lest some of your readers should begin to doubt the sanity of your correspondent, who, faithful to the duty of a mirror, has but given you a faithful reflex of one of the topics which has been exciting the curiosity of the Parisians.

The Sword of Freedom.

[A free translation of "Das Deutsche Schwert," as sung by the grand chorus, with orchestra, at the Sönger-Fest in Providence.

The noblest weapon ever worn,
With fondest pride by hero borne,
Is Freedom's shining blade;
And it shall flash with might again,
And it shall smite oppression's chain,
And Kings shall be afraid.

That weapon is not bought and sold,
The freeman not from greed for gold
Will lift that sword of might;
But only in his Country's cause,
For hearth and home, for equal laws,
For Fatherland and Right.

And so its hilt is like the cross,
That men may count all else as loss,
Save Love that maketh free;
And so its blade, how bright to-day!
On time's great dial points alway
To Death and Liberty!

O evermore, my faithful sword,
Till Peace with Freedom be restored,
Still dye thee crimson red!
Th' exulting hero swings thee high,
Exulting rushes on to die,
Thee whistling round his head!

Mendelssohn's St. Paul.

BY ROBERT SCHUMANN.

This is a work of the purest style, the production of a mind full of peace and love. It would be a mistake, besides being unfair to the composer, to compare it, even remotely, to the Oratorios of Handel or Bach. They are alike just as much as all kinds of sacred music, all churches, all pictures of the Madonna are alike; but Bach and Handel had reached maturity when they began to write, whereas Mendelssohn was still a mere youth. The work of a young artist whose imagination is overflowing with graceful images, and to whom life and the future are still full of charm, cannot fairly be compared with a work of an earlier and severer period by one of those divine masters who, from their seats among the stars, looked back over a long and hallowed life.

It has been rightly remarked that the chief drawbacks to the general effect of the work are to be found in the first half; that the minor part of St. Stephen, if not absolutely throwing St. Paul into the background, diminishes his importance; that Saul is presented more in the character of a convert than of a converter; also that the oratorio is too long and might with advantage be divided into two. A most inviting subject for criticism is the poetical manner in which the appearances of our Lord are treated (by a chorus of trebles and altos); but surely such speculations only spoil the idea, while it would be impossible to wound the composer's feelings more easily than in this, one of his most beautiful inspirations. To my mind nothing can be more appropriate than to represent God as speaking with many voices, and revealing His will through a choir of angels; just as in painting, His presence is indicated more poetically by cherubs hovering in the upper part of the picture than by the representation of an old man, or by the so-called sign of the Trinity, &c. Where the reality is unattainable, it is surely allowable to use the most beautiful symbol within reach. It has also been objected that some of the chorales in "St. Paul" lose their simple character by the ornaments with which Mendelssohn has adorned them. As if chorales were not just as well adapted to express joy and confidence as earnest supplication; as if there were not every difference between "Sleepers wake, and "In deep distress;" or as if a work of art had no demands to fulfil beyond those of a parish choir! Then, again, people wanted to make out that "St. Paul" was not even a "Protestant Oratorio," but only a "Concert Oratorio," which suggested to some wag the happy middle course of calling it a "Protestant-Concert-Oratorio."

It is always possible to make objections, and even plausible ones, and the industry of the critics deserves every respect. But granting all that can be said, how much there is in the oratorio with which no one can find fault! Besides its ruling spirit, the deeply religious feeling which pervades it, consider the masterly way in which, from a musical point of view, every situation is brought out, the uninterrupted flow of noble melody, the intimate connection of words and sounds, speech and music, so that the whole thing seems actually embodied before you; think of the grace which it breathes throughout, the admirable grouping of the characters, the endless variety of color in the instrumentation; realize its perfectly mature style and playful mastery over all forms of composition, and then say if there is any cause to be discontented.

I have only one thing to add. The music of "St. Paul" is, on the average, so easy to understand, so popular, and so effective, that it almost seems as if the great idea of its composer throughout had been to interest the public. Now, noble as this aim undoubtedly is, it may, if indulged in, rob his future compositions of that power and inspiration which is found in the works of those who, regardless of either aim or limits, gave themselves up singly to their great subjects. Lastly, it must not be forgotten that Beethoven wrote a "Mount of Olives" as well as a "Missa solennis;" and bearing this in mind, we may well believe that as Mendelssohn the youth has written a fine oratorio, Mendelssohn the man will write another that shall be still nobler.* Till then let us be content with what we have, and profit from it, and enjoy it.

Music Abroad.

HAMBURG. The long announced Musical Festival in May began with a performance of Handel's Messiah in the church of St. Michael. A correspondent of the London Musical World writes of it:

That this large edifice, which can accommodate 4000 persons, should only be about half full, was a fact for which it is easy to account; the present state of affairs excites the most anxious misgivings in all classes. Nevertheless, the interest taken by the public in the proceedings increased each day, for the performance of The Messiah was marked by an unusual combination of talent. The chorus, made up of the choruses of the several local academies, was exceedingly good; the orchestra, highly satisfactory; and the organ, which possesses 80 registers, played by Herr Franz Weber of Cologne. There is certainly something magnificent and grand about the performance of an oratorio in a church, especially in one like St. Michael's, the acoustic qualities of which are so favorable that even the gentlest piano can be distinctly heard in the very furthest corner. In consequence of the indisposition of Mlle. Therese Schneider, Mme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt undertook the whole of the soprano music. The other solo singers were Mme. Bettelheim, Herren Gunz and Stockhausen.

The second day's performance took place at 7 o'clock in the evening, in Sagebiel's handsome new room, or hall, which can contain with ease, down below, from 1,200 to 1,400 spectators. The galleries are arranged similar to those of the new Düsseldorf Tonhalle, and afford room for twelve or thirteen hundred more. The orchestra is arranged like that in Exeter Hall, London, that is, it rises pretty abruptly, so that the conductor, though standing below, can be conveniently seen by every one. Like St. Michael's church, this hall is distinguished for its excellent acoustic qualities.—The programme included the "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day;" the scene of the Furies from Gluck's Orpheus; and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Ode being conducted Herr Otto Goldschmidt, and the two other works by Herr Julius Stockhausen. The "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" was introduced to the Rhinelanders at the Düsseldorf Musical Festival of 1863, when, as on the present occasion, Mme. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt and Herr Gunz sang the vocal solos. One of the gems of the performance was the rendering of the soprano air, No. 4, in G minor. It was sung by Mme. Goldschmidt, accompanied on the organ by Herr Weber, and on the violoncello by Herr Lindner, of the Royal Band, Hanover, who proved himself a consummate artist. The organ is very small, but its tone is soft and agreeable. Herr Gunz gave the tenor music very well and characteristically. Of the solo instruments, the violin, flute, and trumpet merit especial mention. The execution of the Ninth Symphony was highly spirited. At the head of the violinists were Herren von Königsbaw, of Cologne, and Böie, of Altona; among the double-bassists were Herren Müller, of Darmstadt, and Breun, of Cologne. All the wood instruments were good; the horn and trumpet, admirable, as were, also, the kettle-drums. The vocal solos were entrusted to Mlle. Mandl, of Hamburg; Mlle. Bettelheim; Herren Gunz and Stägemann. Herr Stockhausen deserves commendation for the mode in which he conducted generally, but there were very many details which did not please everybody. The writer of these lines, for instance, was among those who were not contented, because he is no advocate for the individual conception of classical works, and believes that for any musical composition, no matter what, there is only one correct tempo, and only one correct mode of performance, even when it is not so easy at once to seize the true spirit of the composition from its form. Thus it struck many persons that the molto vivace, 3-4 time, in the Scherzo, was taken so quickly, that for the presto, 4-4 time, it was scarcely possible to increase the pace. Now and then, too, the pace wavered. The Adagio on the other hand, in consequence of the andante moderato, 3-4 time, being taken too slowly, failed to come out with sufficient prominence when compared with the Adagio molto e cantabile, 4-4 time. But what struck musicians more than anything else, was the tempo of the recitatives for the basses in the introduction to the finale. Stockhausen made them play presto, and, at the rehearsal, justified this galloping pace by the fact that he, as a singer, could read the recitative in no other way, etc. Many members of the orchestra thought a singer ought to know best what Recitativo meant, namely, a piece of elocution or declamation, that can be introduced as well into a presto as into an adagio, and yet hold its own. As however, freedom of speech is not yet introduced into orchestras, and as musicians have not got to such a pitch that every member of a band can follow his own notions concerning the way in which a solo should be played, as a leader of the most modern school once asserted he might do, the recitative was given presto.

On the third day, the concert took place at half-past six, p.m., in the same locality. Among the works performed were the overture to Der Freischütz; the Schöne Melusine overture; the second part of Schumann's Paradies und die Peri; and a Violin Concerto by Viotti. Weber's overture was enthusiastically encored and repeated. Viotti's Violin Concerto was executed by Herr Joachim in a style which, even for Herr Joachim, was marvellous. The Adagio especially was a wonderful strain of song, and the interpolated cadences were magnificent. The singers in Paradies und die Peri were Mme. Goldschmidt, Mlle. Mandl, Bettelheim, Herren Gunz, Stägemann, and Stockhausen. Despite the numerous repetitions at rehearsal, the wind-instrument players made several serious mistakes at the performance. On the art of rehearsing judiciously, without losing time; of pointing out an error instantly and clearly, and saying how it is to be remedied, without tiring the band, and thus causing neglect rather than increased attention, etc., on this art, so useful to every conductor, there ought to be a book written, and what is more, seriously studied by ninety-nine conductors of a hundred. Mendelssohn's Schöne Melusine overture was well played, but not redemanded. In the way of solo singing, Mme. Goldschmidt's rendering of the soprano air from Il Rè Pastore, by Mozart, was something to be remembered, as the reader will easily believe when he learns that the accompanist—for there is an obligato violin accompaniment—was no less a person than Herr Joachim himself. The concert was brought to a conclusion by a repetition of Handel's "Hallelujah." The whole proceedings wound up with a supper in the Victoria Hotel; and thus ended a festival, which, despite the threatening aspect of political affairs, proved a decided success.

STUTTGART.—A new three-act opera, entitled Astorga, words by Herr Pasque, music by Herr Abert, was produced at Stuttgart a short time since. The book is considered better than the general run of such productions. The following is the plot:—Astorga, the celebrated composer of the "Stabat Mater," is staying at the Court of the Duke of Parma, and between him and Eleonore, the Duke's niece, there exists the same kind of relation as existed between Tasso and his Princess Leonore. The Duke, however, compels his niece to marry Don Balbazes, the Spanish Governor of Sicily, who, some time previously, has caused Astorga's father, one of the first noblemen of the country, to be executed as a rebel, and forced Astorga, then a child, and his mother, to be present at the execution. The mother has died in consequence of this cruel act, which continually haunts the boy's brain and drives him to the verge of madness. When Astorga hears of Eleonore's union, he declares before the whole court that Balbazes is the murderer of his parents. Being challenged by Balbazes, Astorga flings his sword at the feet of the Governor, who is about to kill him, but a young girl, Angioletta, a pupil of Astorga, rushes between them. She loves Astorga, and conceals him for some months in her house. Messengers from the Emperor now arrive there to engage her as a singer. Among them is Balbazes, who suspects where Astorga is hidden, and wishes to gain Angioletta's heart. There is a third lover also, in the shape of Lauristan, one of the agents of the Emperor. This, together with the arrival of Eleonore, who has discovered Astorga's retreat, and, though the wife of Balbazes, still loves the musician, and wishes to save him, involves matters still more. At length, in the obscurity of night, the Gordian knot is severed by Astorga, who, though not recognizing him, but suspecting he is a rival, kills Balbazes in a duel. Angioletta now rescues the man she loves, by departing with Lauristan, who, on this account, spares Astorga. The latter is now free, but mad. At length, after the lapse of years, after all the efforts of Eleonore have proved in vain, he is restored to reason by hearing a performance of his "Stabat Mater," in which the voice of Angioletta is distinguished, above aught else; and he falls in her arms. The music was much applauded. After each act, and at the conclusion of the opera, the composer and the singers were twice called on. The day following the first performance the King sent for Herr Abert, and, after talking to him, in a most complimentary tone for half an hour, appointed him Royal Director of Music. (Königlicher Musik-director).

LEIPSIG.—The Klapperkasten Society here recently gave a grand entertainment to Herr Moscheles. The aristocracy of intellect and fashion were respectively and numerously represented by men celebrated in science and art, as well as by the highest government officials, and leading inhabitants of the town. There were some 250 ladies and 700 gentlemen present. The company were busily engaged admiring the decorations and pictures which graced the walls, and puzzling their brains to understand the gigantic inscription over the orchestra, and guess what was the object of a piano placed in the middle of the hall, and bearing the name, "Klapperkasten" (literally: Rattle-box); when the doors of the neighboring room were flung open, and a Herald, dressed in the richest costume and accompanied by eight trumpeters, and gorgeously habited, and blowing flourishes, made his appearance. He announced the object of the entertainment, and then alluding to the German name adopted by the society for the piano-forte, adduced reasons to show the right they had to such a commemoration. From out of the instrument, which is as much indebted to Moscheles for its present importance, as he is to it for his, there suddenly appeared Knauer's admirable bust of him. As the head of the evening, too, was born in the spring (30th May), and is still a true child of spring, the Herald called upon the representative of that season to appear, and consecrate the festivity. In obedience to the summons, Spring entered, drawn in a triumphal car. He recited some verses in honor of the life and labors of his favorite son, and then, as representing the Muse, crowned him, while melodies of his were gently played upon the organ. This "Scenic Prologue" was a great success. Now came the musical part of the proceedings. The programme was thus constituted. 1. "Les Contrastes" for two pianos, played by Herren Bernuth, Jadasohn, Rast, and Witte. 2. "Winternacht," song for mixed chorus, sung by amateurs. 3. "Alexandermarsch-Variationen."* In this, one of Moscheles' earliest works, Herr Derffel, from St. Petersburg, excited as much enthusiasm among his hearers as, fifty years previously, the composer himself used to do. 4. "Maienfeier," song for mixed chorus; and 5. "Hommage à Handel," admirably performed by the two gentlemen first named. Dr. Roderich Bonedix then delivered an address. Starting from a consideration of the meaning of the word "master," he referred to the great services rendered by Moscheles, and the lasting significance he would enjoy in history as the creator of the present system of pianoforte-playing, and as a virtuoso; as conductor of the London Philharmonic Concerts; as composer; and as Professor in the Leipzig Conservatory. The address was followed by three loud and ringing cheers from all present. Herr Moscheles, who was deeply moved, first expressed his thanks in words, and then clothed them in tune, by extemporizing upon the piano.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. (From the Times, June 20).—Mr. Mapleson has redeemed two of the most important pledges of his prospectus in again bringing forward Il Flauto Magico and Oberon. The revival of the first of these, which contains the last two pieces composed by Mozart for the theatre—the solemn Priestermarsch and wonderful overture, written two days before Die Zauberflöte was produced at Vienna (September 30, 1791, the year of his death)—is one of the incidents that have redounded most to the credit of Her Majesty's Theatre under its present management. Oberon, with Mr. Benedict's interpolations and masterly recitatives, which, all built upon Weber's themes, might have come from Weber himself, has been a stock-piece since the time when Mr. E. T. Smith took the fortunes of the establishment in hand. The repertory could hardly have been enriched with two works in their different styles more universally admired.

The cast of Il Flauto Magico, in almost all essential particulars the same as last year, is for the most part remarkably efficient. We may at once note the single very weak point of the performance. The music given to the three attendants on Astrifammante, Queen of Night ("drei Damen;" in the original text) is, with one exception, so ill supported that the two quintets ("Hm! perche' mentir" and "Dove, ohimè dove" are completely ruined. The exception is Madame Trebelli-Bettini, who is thus unfairly sacrificed to the incompetency of her companions. On the other hand, the music of the good "genii" ("drei Knaben") is extremely well sung by three young ladies of the company—Mlles. Bauermeister, Zandrina (niece of Mlle. Titiens), and Drasdi. All the other parts are adequately filled. A better representative of the character of Pamina than Mme. Harriers-Wippenn could not now be found. As an acting part Pamina is a mere abstraction; but Mozart has made her sing so melodiously that the ear is ravished by the strains that proceed from her lips. Mme. Wippenn, about whose powerful, sweet, and clear toned soprano there cannot be two opinions, is also a highly accomplished vocalist. In the concerted pieces her musical aptitude is of rare advantage, and she sings the duet with Papageno ("La dove prende amor ricetto") in a style that is simply faultless. Here she is lucky in being associated with a Papageno like Mr. Santley. A greater treat than this favorite melody—for it is all melody—thus phrased and articulated by two such thorough singers, could not be wished. Into her most important solo, the impassioned air, "Ah lo sò, più non m'avanza," Mme. Wippenn throws an expression as genuine as it is earnest. Her whole performance, in short, is unexceptionably satisfying. Nor can anything but praise be fairly bestowed on the Tamino of Signor Gardoni, whose delivery of the beautiful apostrophe to Pamina's portrait ("Ah! cara immagine") is in every way perfect. Indeed, if the singing of Mozart's music could be accepted as the ordeal, instead of that of passing through the fire and water, there can be little doubt that Sarastro would admit our Tamino and Pamina to the Temple of Isis and Osiris without an instant's hesitation. So musical a Papageno as Mr. Santley is, we are inclined to believe, unexampled.

In Mlle. Sinico he is matched with a Papageno worthy of him, and the comic duet of the last act ("Pa-Pa-Pagena! Pa-Pa-Pagena") is full of animation and spirit. Sarastro, high-priest of Isis, has been represented both by Signor Foli and Herr Rokitsansky. Both good. The possession of a deeper bass voice is to the advantage of the latter, and this more especially in the fine air with chorus, "Possenti Numi, Iside, Osiri" (with those marvellous trombones in the orchestra). But with regard to Sarastro's second air, the popular "Qui sdegno non s'accende" ("In diesen heil'gen Hallen"), we rather prefer the smooth singing of Signor Foli to the more sonorous delivery of his successor. Nevertheless, as we have hinted, both are excellent. Last, not least, the Queen of Night of Mlle. Ilma de Murka is what it was last year—a performance in its way unique. In the slow movement of Astrifammante's first air the Hungarian lady is singularly happy. The still more trying bravura, "Gli angeli d'inferno," is transposed for her a note lower—and wisely, when it is remembered that owing to the elevation of the diapason, between what in Mozart's time was "F," and what in our time is "E flat," there can scarcely be any perceptible gradation. The transposition, at any rate, allows Mlle. de Murka to put forth all her energy without physical inconvenience; and thus her execution of this great air, which used to be comparatively imperfect, is now distinguished no less for vigorous certainty than for the right musical feeling. Nor does it fail to make an extraordinary impression.

Oberon is even more strongly represented, inasmuch as all the characters, big and small, even to Babekan (Signor Gassier), who has little to do but fight with and be killed by Sir Huon, in the first scene of the second act, are in practised hands. A better Oberon we do not remember than Signor Bettini, who gives the air allotted (in Mr. Benedict's version)* to the King of the Fairies, and which contains in the second movement a reference to the cantabile theme of the overture, as correctly and as effectively as could be imagined; while to the music of Puck is rendered full justice by Mme. Demeric-Lablache; the song of the Mermaid is prettily warbled by Mlle. Bauermeister; and the little that devolves upon Scheramin, Sir Huon's squire, is done in perfection by Mr. Santley, whose duet with Mme. Trebelli-Bettini (Fatima), "Vida in riva alla Garonna," becomes one of the "hits" of the opera. To improve the cast of the three chief characters would be hardly possible. None can have forgotten the Reiza of Mlle. Titiens, upon whose irreproachably fine performance it is unnecessary again to dwell. A more splendid piece of musical declamation than her great scena, "Vaste tremendo mare," from one end to the other, has not been heard in our day.

Signor Mongini's Sir Huon will also be remembered, although it is four years since he played the character. That the music of Weber is now as much to the taste as it is essentially well suited to the voice of the Italian tenor was shown not long since, when he took the place of Signor Stagno as Max, in Der Freischütz, and gave unanimous satisfaction. His Sir Huon has vastly improved. Some parts of the music are calculated to display the magnificent power and quality of his voice as effectively as anything in his own sphere of Italian opera.

Bearing the Fatima of Mme. Alboni still in mind, we must eulogize without reserve the Fatima of Mlle. Trebelli, Mme. Alboni's legitimate successor. To sing the two characteristic and charming airs with which Weber has adorned the part ("A lonely Arab maid," and "Oh, Araby, dear Araby!") more sweetly and unaffectedly—more musically, in short, than Mme. Trebelli sings them, would be impossible. These three artists, joined by Mr. Santley, in the admirable quartet at the end of the second-act ("Over the dark blue waters") create an effect only to be produced by four genuine voices—soprano, tenor, contralto and barytone-bass—in the throats of four thorough adepts in the vocal art. The quartet alone, thus delivered, would give clat to the performance of Oberon at Her Majesty's Theatre, leaving out the noble execution of the overture and grandly imagined storm (Act III.), by Signor Ardit's orchestra, and the fine singing of the chorus throughout the opera.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Fra Diavolo was recently revived at this theatre. The Times says:

The attraction of the revival is, we need hardly say, the Zerlina of Mlle. Paulina Lucca, which was expected to be and has turned out a genuine success.

* This air originally belonged to Sir Huon; but, Brahman wanting something more vociferous, Weber composed for him "Oh! 'tis a glorious sight," the slow movement of which might almost have been written by Brahman himself.

* The well-known and once popular variations on the so-called "Fall of Paris."

Mlle. Lucca, not attempting to confer a higher musical importance upon the character than was contemplated by Auber, dispenses with the grand air from Le Serment, which, at the beginning of the scene in the bedroom, Mme. Bosio used to sing with such dazzling brilliancy, but which was, nevertheless, entirely out of keeping. In atonement, however, Mlle. Lucca (who retains Zerlina's original and more characteristic air) acts the part of the inn-keeper's daughter as we have never seen it acted before by any singer of any nation. Her delivery of the romance about Fra Diavolo, which Zerlina sings to "the Marquis" (the formidable brigand in disguise), is in itself, though a thought over-acted, a little drama. But best of all—and here, indeed, the character of Zerlina stands revealed—is the scene where, on the night before her wedding with Lorenzo, the innocent girl, in the solitude of her chamber, gives full vent to the emotions engendered by her expectant happiness. The whole of this is carried out in the true spirit of comedy, with a liveliness as naturally expressed as it is happily conceived. Nothing more easy and impulsive, nothing more unobtrusive in its unconscious absence of reserve, could well be imagined. In short, as a piece of comedy, we repeat, no Zerlina we can call to mind has equalled the Zerlina of Mlle. Lucca.

Next comes Milord Roeburg—a "milord impayable," as opera-goers for the last ten years are well persuaded. This impersonation is a specimen of grotesque comedy for which it would be vain to seek a parallel. Only the prince of buffo actors could have conceived it, only the prince of buffo actors could have embodied the conception. But that Ronconi is the prince of buffo actors is as true as an axiom. His performance boggles description. It is as racy as it is singular, as full of life as it is full of humor. That at the same time it bears very little resemblance to a live "milord," travelling at ease for his recreation, is more than probable. It is unfortunately too good to be true. But though absolutely like nothing in existence that we know of, it is not the less inimitable; and we should prize it the more for the certainty that it must die with its inventor. To imagine a Lord Roeburg after the Lord Roeburg of Signor Ronconi is difficult. To imitate it would be an ungrateful task, to equal it impossible. No doubt there are people who will insist that it is a caricature; but, caricature or not, in sober truth it is a creation. Mlle. Morensi, judged from a dramatic point of view, is a very good Lady Roeburg; and the pity is that she cannot sing the music as well as she plays the part. Much vocalizing of an unimpeachable sort is not expected of "Milord," either on the French or on the Italian stage; but it is the contrary with "Miladi." Signor Naudin under the circumstances, is perhaps as good a Fra Diavolo as could be obtained just now. French by parentage, if not by birth, he is eminently French in his manner of singing, and supereminently French in his manner of acting. He makes neither a very seductive Marquis, nor a very dashing brigand, and his attitudes while delivering the serenade of the imaginary Agnes ("Agnes la Zitella") (Act II.) are preposterous; but, take him for all in all—with his two distinct voices, his chest voice and his head voice, his loud voice and his soft voice—he masters the whole of the music with ease and, after a fashion of his own, sings it effectively enough. The two thieves, Beppo and Giacomo (Signors Tagliafico and Ciampi) are as good as could be wished. Signor Tagliafico's Beppo, indeed, is in its way a remarkable performance, as grotesque as anything well can be, but exquisitely humorous.

L'Elisir d'Amore, that most piquant and delightful of lyric pastorals, has re-appeared with Mlle. Adelina Patti as Adina, Signor Mario as Nemorino, and Signor Ronconi as Dulcamara. With such an Adina, such a Nemorino, and such a Dulcamara—such a coquette, such a lover, and such a charlatan—this best of Donizetti's comic operas must always be welcome. There is nothing more absolutely perfect to be witnessed on the stage. But we have described it over and over again.

ORCHESTRAL SOCIETIES. The seventh concert of the Philharmonic Society (Hanover Square Rooms) again included but one symphony. This time, however, the reason to loyal amateurs was imperative. The Prince and Princess of Wales honored the performance with their presence, and it is notorious that one of those illustrious personages decidedly objects to long programmes. Then the symphony was old Haydn's cheerful and masterly "Letter V"—his second best in the key of G. So who could have the heart to complain? The overtures were Herold's flashy Zampa and Beethoven's splendid Lemora (Fidelio, No. 3), both, like the symphony, well played, and one at least right welcome. The solo was for violin—Spohr's Scena Cantante, the player, M. Wieniawski, who plays Spohr as he plays every other master, in the genuine, dashing Wien-iawski style. An unusual number of vocal pieces, contributed by Mesdames Harriers-Wippner and Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Bettini, Bossi, and Foli (from Her Majesty's Theatre), and the Wedding March of Mendelssohn (introduced with a purpose), completed a programme which, on the whole, could hardly have satisfied subscribers. Professor Stern-dale Bennett conducted.

At the eighth and last concert of the season (on Monday evening), Mozart's symphony in C (No. 1), the Eroica of Beethoven, Professor Bennett's overture, Die Waldenympe, the Jubilee of Weber, Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor (pianist Herr Jaell), and vocal music by Mlle. Titens and Dr. Gunz, were given.

Dr. Wyld's fifth and last New Philharmonic Concert (St. James's Hall) was the most brilliant and most brilliantly attended of a season which has been more than usually prosperous. The symphony was Beethoven's "C minor;" the overtures were Der Alchymist, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and the Ruler of the Spirits. How these grand specimens of the four most distinguished instrumental composers of modern times were performed by the fine orchestra which the Gresham Musical Professor delights in conducting we need not stop to describe. Beethoven's piano-forte concerto in G (No. 4), his last but one and best but one, was as great a treat as the symphony itself. The solo-player was Mr. John Francis Barnett, whose annual appearance at the New Philharmonic Concerts is invariably looked forward to with interest. This admirable young musician has never played better than on the occasion under notice, and was never greeted with more cordial marks of approval. It is worth recalling that the concerto in G was the piece performed by Mr. Barnett when, years ago, he made his public debut, as a pupil of Dr. Wyld's, at the New Philharmonic. His progress since, both as pianist and composer, has been steady and sure. The vocal music at this concert, except the "Last Rose of Summer," and even of that Madame Grisi chose the Italian version, consisted exclusively of excerpts from Italian operas. The other singers were Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mlle. Sinico, Signor Bettini, and M. Gassier.

At the fourth and last concert of the Musical Society of London (St. James's Hall), Schumann's fourth symphony (in E flat), though very finely played by the orchestra, under Mr. Alfred Mellon's vigilant control, was even more coldly received than some time previously at one of the New Philharmonic Concerts. This is, we are inclined to think, the least masterly and the least happy in ideas of Schumann's orchestral works. The overtures—Spohr's Jessonda, Professor Bennett's Die Naiaden and Weber's Jubilee—seemed much more to the liking of the audience, who bestowed most applause upon the graceful and highly-finished composition of the Englishman. M. Wieniawski created an extraordinary sensation by his vigorous, striking and original performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

PARIS. At the Grand Opera, during the last week or two of June, Meyerbeer reigned almost exclusively. M. Dumestre was successful in the Africaine as Nelusko. Next came the Prophète before Gueymard's vacation; then Robert le Diable, L'Africaine again, and so on.

The first performance of M. Flotow's opera Zilda, which has been in rehearsal several weeks at the Opera Comique, was given on Monday the 20th ult.—M. Bagier, the director of the Italiens, has determined to suppress the ballet next season, and to reduce the number of representations to three weekly.—Nicolai's Joyeuses Commères de Windsor was produced at the Theatre-Lyrique, on Wednesday, the 22nd ult.—M. Victorien Sardou, it is said, has written the libretto of a comic opera, entitled Venilo, for which M. M. Gavaert is to compose the music. The number of concerts given in Paris the past season has amounted to two hundred and sixty nine, distributed in the following manner:—thirty-seven at the Conservatoire and at the Cirque-Napoleon; seventy-two at the Salle Herz; eighty-five at the Salle Pleyel; fifty one at the Salle Erard; and the remainder in second-rate concert-rooms.

Gounod's "La Colombe" and Flotow's Zilda were played several times in the following week. The next novelty at the Opera Comique will be the new work by Ambrose Thomas, "Mignon," which is promised in September.—Don Juan still draws good receipts at the Lyrique, where Ristori has been playing Medea and Maria Stuart. A new opera, Sardanapale, by Victorien Joncières, is announced for September.—It is rumored that M. Carvalho means to bring out Wagner's Lohengrin next winter, with the Swedish-singer, Mlle. Hobbe, in one of the principal parts.—The Grand Opera proposes to mount Gluck's Alceste for M. Gueymard, with Villaret as Admète and David as the Priest.

The Paris art-papers deplore the loss which French literature has suffered in the death of Méry, poet, novelist, dramatist, wit and profound scholar. As a poet he has left his mark in "The Nemesis," as a novelist many surviving works speak to his ability—"La Guerre du Nizam," "Les Damnés de Java," "La Floride," "Le Bonnet Vert," and others. His dramatic works are known to frequenters of the Theatre Francais and Odéon: to the Opera he gave "Semiramis," "Hercule" and "Jeanne d'Arc;" an opera comique of his saw light at the Lyrique, named "Maitre Wolfiam," and two volumes of comedies and proverbs constitute his published works in this direction. His latest achievement was the poem of "Don Carlos," to which he had put the last touch when death seized him. His scholarship was profound and extended: Greek, Latin and Italian with their literature were as familiar to him as French. Maria Escudier writes of him, "He was by turns a Florentine contemporary of the Medici, an Athenian of the age of Pericles, a Roman under Augustus; and not to him could the old Athenian have said, as to the philosopher Anacharsis, 'Thou art a stranger.' Méry would have spoken Ionian at Lesbos, Æolian to Sappho's compatriots, Dorian to the colonial subjects of great Greece or to the fellow citizens of Theocritus." With deference to M. Escudier we think he knows very little of what dialects Méry would have spoken—very little in fact of his subject at all, thus to fix down Greek dialects to a French measuring post in the nineteenth century. Nevertheless, extravagant eulogium, though it may cast ridicule on the writer, does not impair Méry's attainments, which were notably great. The Revue et Gazette Musicale says of him "We cannot fix Méry's rank in the future: we are too near the hour when he sparkled in brilliant talk and witty paradoxes, and when he won general love for his easy and amiable character. If he was no volcano of a great and equal flame, he he was at least a brazier whence escaped millions of sparks." The Evénement says, "Properly described he was not so much a poet, a novelist, a dramatist, or a journalist, as an improvisatore."—Orchestra.

MUNICH. Hans von Bülow, worried by incessant attacks, has resigned his office of Court pianist to the King of Bavaria, and left Munich with his wife. The unfortunate monarch, deserted now by both Wagner and Bülow, has written the latter a letter begging him to reconsider his determination.

VIENNA. Both German and Italian operas are closed, and of course, by the latest war news from Bohemia, the old Austrian empire must be singing from the other side of its mouth. The last operatic event of interest was the performance of Weber's Preciosa, with Walter for tenor, Boch for baritone, and Mmes. Prauze, Dustmann and Tollheim.

Berlin journals complain of the falling off of receipts at the theatres, consequent upon political troubles. The same cause renders musical and theatrical news from all parts of Germany of the scantiest description.

The musical world is anxiously expecting the appearance of Mr. Thayer's Biography of Beethoven. Part of the MS. is translated into German, and it will appear in both countries simultaneously. Mr. Thayer is American Consul at Trieste.

The mobilization of the Prussian army has ruined the theatre at Karlsruhe. The tenor Stolzenberg has been drafted into the Rhenish Contingent, and another singer—Roberstein—has also been compelled to take military service.

The war now waging in Italy and Germany is destructive of the progress of art and the prospects of artists. The revolution of 1848 drove to England a host of musicians of every degree of talent—amongst others, Molique, from Stuttgart, and Halle from Paris.

The large organ built for the magnificent cathedral at Geneva, St. Peter's, was to be inaugurated by a musical festival on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of June. Organists not only from all parts of Switzerland, but from Paris and Cologne, have been invited to test the instrument. Three inauguration concerts were to be given, for which many celebrated artists had promised their services.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 21, 1866.

Prof. Adolf Bernhard Marx.

This well-known musical writer, the author of "The Theory of Music" (Musiklehre), "The Theory of Composition" (Compositionslehre), "The Music of the Nineteenth Century" (Die Musik des 19ten Jahrhunderts), "Beethoven's Life and Productions" (Beethovens Leben und Schaffen), "Gluck and Opera" (Gluck und die Oper) "Hints for the Performance of Beethoven's Works" (Anweisung zum Vortrage Beethovenscher Werke) and "Reminiscences" (Erinnerungen), died at Berlin, after a long and painful illness, on the 17th of May. His claims to be considered a composer consisted in his having written an oratorio entitled Moses. But in spite of many isolated beauties, the oratorio achieved no permanent success. Several of his literary works were, however, very highly esteemed, especially his "Theory of Composition" (the large work in four octavo volumes), of which numerous editions have been published. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung says:

"Though we did not always agree with his æsthetical views; though we attached no artistic value to the Biographies, and the opinions advanced in them, but looked upon them rather as tending to promote the cause of bels-esprits and dilettanti, than aught else; and though we considered the "Reminiscences" as nothing better, at most, than mere feuilleton work, we must direct attention to the fact that, in his theoretical books, Marx published much that was suggestive and new.

"In private, Marx was a most worthy man, of varied knowledge, full of youthful, eager zeal for the Beautiful, and possessed of an independence of character that cannot be sufficiently praised. His ambition and his vanity were far removed from aught connected with petty interests, and his heart was filled with idealistic hopes and wishes. Honor to his memory!"

This is but a tempestuous tribute to a rare and valuable character in the history of musical progress; but we must think it comes far nearer to the truth than such disparaging and even harsh allusions to him as we find in recent English musical journals. Thus the London Orchestra makes no mention of his death but this flippant sentence: "A theorist of some eminence, A. Bernhard Marx, Professor of the University of Berlin, has died in that town after long suffering. He was the author of a Life of Beethoven and of an oratorio on the subject of Moses." And the Athenæum, while acknowledging some merit in his works on Composition, dwells mainly on the bitterness of some of his criticisms in his later years, his prejudices against his superiors, like Mendelssohn, &c., and even hints that he pushed his theories to an extreme that made them useless.

Marx doubtless had his faults, some of which—personal prejudices, acrimonious criticism—grew upon him in his later years. He wrote perhaps too readily and too much, and with a certain egotism, claiming a very large part of the public conversation, so to speak, upon all musical topics. In spite of the failure of his compositions, he frequently in his essays draws illustrations and examples from "my Moses." His style is intricate, crooked, metaphysical, and, as we have often had painful occasion to know in introducing some of his ideas to our readers, most ungrateful to translators. Worst of all, he seems to have become possessed with a mania for book-making, which led him finally into haste and carelessness, a neglect of thorough, conscientious critical examination of material, as has been pointed out in the case of his Life of Beethoven so convincingly, that perhaps the thought, the appreciation of Beethoven as an artist and a creator which that work contains has been by some underrated in view of its carelessness as to historical detail. But making all these allowances, Marx has done a noble work for Art and Music, for the large, liberal, ideal culture of man. His "Theory of Composition" has always seemed to us the most philosophical and vital presentation of the subject yet made to the world. It unfolds the whole, as by a natural growth, surprisingly beautiful, from a simple central principle or germ. It is a pity that only one of its four volumes has yet been translated and published in America. But most that has been quickening and useful in shorter theoretic treatises for years past really owes its inspiration and its method to the great work of Marx. His "Music of the Nineteenth Century" takes a large and intelligent survey of the whole field, and affords many paragraphs and whole chapters of permanent criticism and suggestion; we have drawn somewhat largely from this work in our efforts to lay before our readers the best thought of the German mind upon themes of musical art and science. On the whole, we think the following appreciation of Marx in the National Zeitung of Berlin is not too highly colored.

"Through a long life indefatigably active as teacher and as writer, Marx leaves us not only the grateful memory of what he has done, but the best part of his being has become an enduring possession to us, a continually operative mental inheritance for all who approach it with an earnest and receptive spirit. To him it was given to fulfil the most genuine calling of man, name to render back to the world and to mankind what they have given him in impressions, experiences and incitements. The germs which nature had placed in him, bore fruit a thousand-fold; the task he found appointed to him he, like a faithful laborer, has carried through to the end. Marx possessed in rare combination the collective peculiarities required for the successful exercise of the teacher's office. To broad, extensive knowledge, in every part transparent with the reflection of a high pervading idea, he united sound reflection, enthusiastic abandon to the subject in hand, sturdy industry, and finally a wonderful power of always giving to the matter which he had to teach the precise form, which the end in view, the more or less advanced culture of the pupil, and his more near or remote relation to the Art demanded. We have often witnessed in our own experience how convincingly the words of the writer have fallen upon the youthful mind and what an echo they have there awakened. Partly by natural endowment, partly in consequence of his many years' experience as a teacher, he commanded in a high degree that eloquence which opens the way of understanding to one who does not fully trust his own power and insight. The constant mediation between the particular and the universal, the moral pathos, the subjective warmth penetrating all, the richly picturesque, we might say—full-chord execution of the fundamental thoughts—these and other like excellencies, which were united in Marx, must have knit the firmest tie between him and young pupils who were eager to learn.

"Marx was born in Halle in the lap of the Israelite community. According to his father, who was a physician and a zealous admirer of Voltaire, the year of his birth was 1799; but according to the register of the synagogue, it was 1795. From his youth up he sang, played and composed. Nevertheless, after embracing Christianity and receiving his early education at the gymnasium of his native city, he chose the law for a profession. While he attended the university in Halle, he continued to devote every hour which he could spare from the Institutes and the Pandects to the sweet friend of his childhood, Music. For a short time only he received systematic instruction in Thorough Bass from Türk; even then he could not fail to see, that the old set way of teaching, with its mechanical apparatus of form and rules, with its jejune schematism and stubborn faith in authority, was no spring of artistic life. After passing the first two examinations, he was assigned as Referendarius to the court in Naumburg, and afterwards to the Kammergericht in Berlin. The intellectual atmosphere that here surrounded him, the rich musical activity of the capital, and personal contact with its most prominent representatives strengthened his artistic tendencies to an earnestness and a power, which no longer left it possible for him to idly look on and enjoy. He founded the Berlin Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, which he conducted for seven years; he gave instruction in the theory of music, in piano-playing and singing; he composed industriously and laid, in silent, unremitted labor, the foundations of that system, which ensures his name a lasting place in the history of Art.

"In spite of enticing prospects, which opened before him in his juristical calling, he renounced the service of the State, to give himself up wholly and entirely to the activity for which he felt an inward impulse. In 1830 he was appointed teacher and academic musical director at the Berlin University, and the philosophical faculty at Marburg gave him the doctor's diploma.

"His compositions which acquired publicity, besides a succession of secular and sacred songs and choruses, were: a musical farce, called "Jery and Bätely," which had a succes d'estime upon the royal stage, several melodramas, which were performed in the Königsstädtischer Theatre, and finally the Oratorio "Moses," which, in spite of the recognition which it won in several North German cities, was never able to establish a firm foothold in our public Art life. Persons well acquainted with the score speak of its fine treatment of character, of the intimate accord of words and tones, of the concise energy of expression breaking away from sweetish conventionality and routine. With this work, whose success did not answer to the expectations of its author, his career as a composer reached its close.

"Since then, Marx has given his whole time and strength to the office of teaching, restlessly and with that fiery zeal that is kindled by an inward revelation of experience, by speech and writing, in the smaller circle of younger brethren of his calling, as well as before the mass of music-lovers and amateurs, testifying of that which he believed to be right and true. Among his immediate pupils we meet more than one noted name; George Vierling (founder and for some time head of the Bach Society in Berlin, and one of the more sterling composers of the day) and Carl Reinthaler owe to him their artistic education.

"There is scarcely a field of musical science in which his inexhaustible pen has not been active; Marx's writings form a small library by themselves. Among those exclusively dedicated to pedagogical ends, the great Theory of Composition, in four volumes, already in the fifth edition, holds the first place; it aims to prepare learners for their calling in an artistic and not, as hitherto, in a mechanical manner, inasmuch as it conceives of music as a sonorous reflection of the soul and thus as a harmonious link in the representation of human nature. In the old method the main attention was given to technical rules and processes; here the scholar's sense was to be awakened and developed to true inward perception and understanding. The net gain contained in the great period from Bach to Beethoven is booked for the first time in this work; especially has it won the highest merit by the scientific manner in which it gives the reasons for the various musical forms, which it regards as the living expression of the idea.

"Of late years Marx has more and more frequently stepped out of the narrower circle of a professional audience with his literary labors; his Music of the Nineteenth Century, the Biographies of Beethoven and Gluck, finally the Recollections (Memorabilia) from his own life are addressed to the whole Art-loving public. As these books one after another lay before us for review, we had always to point out anew how truly their author, by the width of his intellectual horizon, by his singular freshness, individuality and definiteness of conception, and not less by his brilliant talent for presenting his ideas, was called to be a mediator between the masters of German music and their people. Even in the last of these writings, the Recollections, the fidelity of memory, the all-sided susceptibility, so energetically grasping every subject, as well as the blooming color of expression, are astonishing. Yet for its composer it had an old man of nearly seventy years, who by the advice of his physicians was to renounce all efforts of thought and investigation, and who sketched these memoirs for recreation and comfort in severe bodily sufferings."

Music in the Open Air.—Need of a Civic Band, a School for Instruments, &c.

These headings are but hints of old ideas which we have many times suggested, and which now naturally come up again in these midsummer days, when music on the Common by municipal provision, musical exhibitions of the common schools, music at Commencement, &c., remind us how more and more clearly certain wants are felt, how something already is beginning to be realized, especially in the Schools, and how much yet remains to be done. The points which we propose to discuss (not to-day with the thermometer at 100°) are: first, the desirableness of what we have before called a Civic band, as distinguished from a merely military and brass band, to be organized under the patronage of the City, to include the gentler instruments as well as brass, and to number say some 60 instruments, this to be ready for public civic festivals and processions, for music for the people on the Common and in halls, for Academic festivals, &c.; secondly, as a nursery and source of supplies for such a band, a free public school for instruments, where boys showing talent may be taught to play all kinds of instruments. This would form a complement to the teaching of vocal music in the public schools; and it would raise up the material for our nobler orchestras on which we shall rely for Symphonies and all the higher music.

But for the present we merely hint again the want. And in the matter of bands and open-air music (now that the City Fathers have again set bands to playing twice a week upon the Common) it will illustrate our meaning to show how precisely what we remarked of similar doings in the summer of 1853 applies to such music as may now be heard upon the Common. Here are extracts from what we then wrote:

From a staging, a small military band, of sixteen instruments, all brass, except the drums and cymbals, were discoursing just such marches, opera choruses arranged as marches, and so forth, as are daily ringing through the streets of all our cities in the frequent military parades. It was a good band enough for its size, and for its kind, which happens just now unfortunately to be the only kind,—cornets and saxtubas being the reigning fashion, with quite as tyrannizing an exclusiveness, as prevails ever in the fashion of our hats and coats.

This musical providence on the part of the municipal powers is, it is well known, far from a bountiful and overflowing one. The measure was a bare triumph of the pressure of popular opinion, (well represented on the part of the majority of the fathers) against the tenacious, higgling resistance of the Philistines. Of course therefore, the idea, which was originally generous and ideal, came through the fight only alive, and plucked and curtailed of a great part of its beauty and its fair proportions. It was a very cautious, stinted, half-way sort of provision that was at last reluctantly adopted. A band too small, at hours too ridiculously and Puritanically early to partake of the charm and stillness of the evening, or even to admit of the attendance of the laboring classes, for whom the benefit was principally intended! Thus saith the law: One evening in each week there shall be music on the Common from seven until nine; and again on Saturday evening, from six till eight o'clock! There is an ingenious irony in this considering that long days (to the million) simply and practically mean long days of work. It is as much as to say to them; Work while day-light lasts; go to bed when the sun sets, or to prayer in preparation for the Sabbath; and be refreshed with all the music you can get between whiles. That it is morally dangerous and profane to be out under the trees of a midsummer night, after eight o'clock, listening to carnal music, we are not distinctly taught in the aforesaid ordinance; but this would seem the natural inference.

This, to be sure, is a local matter, and it perhaps requires apology for discoursing to our readers of an affair so purely and intensely Boston. But we apprehend the case is a fair type of the position, with regard to public outlays for the artistic culture and amusement of the people, of nearly every municipality in our republic. Democracy is not yet wise in these important considerations of its true self-culture,—we might almost say self-preservation. Art has flourished chiefly among princes, and has been lavished on the amusements of the people as a sort of paternal favor by the arbitrary powers, to offset somewhat their oppressions. But Democracy, more than all social systems, needs the harmonizing, humanizing, liberalizing and refining influence of Art. There is nothing which it can so well afford to pay for, if it took a far-seeing view of its own interest.

Democracy has yet to learn to value and to enter into this its rightful and most beautiful possession, without which liberty is only negative, and wealth a means without an end. So far Democracy has evinced a niggardly, utilitarian economy with regard to all propositions for making the externals of its life beautiful and inspiring; it has seemed constitutionally afraid of public luxury and refinement; while by a natural reaction it has squandered and wasted without stint upon coarse and idle modes of celebration in the name of patriotism. Our patriotic rejoicings, our occasions for the overflow of national and public feeling, have all been in the most noisy, rowdy, pop-gun and cracker-firing style of free expensiveness. More money is burnt out in guns and fire-works in a single hour, (think of Portland!) than it would cost to keep a permanent supply of excellent music throughout all the summer nights. It would seem as if our patriotic rejoicing was the joy only of the lower and more animal faculties that enter into the composition of a man. The sounds we hear upon those proud occasions are all borrowed from the enginery of destructiveness; they all smack of war and of the demons of the nether world let loose. Call you this economy, O legislators and city fathers? Is money puffed away in gun-powder a better cement of society, than public gardens filled with statues, and public music filling the air, and making the very senses willing captives to lessons of rhythm and refinement, and spontaneously inclined to all things gentle and harmonious? We pay much for "Union" and for "Union-saving;" consider whether the sentiment of Art, inspired throughout the people, might not become a quite important guaranty of union, harmonizing the very nerves and fibres of each sensitive member of the whole social body, like so many strings of a vast instrument,—to speak figuratively.

We will be thankful, as we have said, for this beginning. But we could not listen without thinking how much more might, and we trust will another year, be made of it. In the first place, such bands are much too small, to be entirely efficacious; the music should be clearly audible to those who are promenading freely in the pleasant paths and avenues in all parts of the common; the harmony should come in full, rich, copious strains, with nothing thin and meagre in its rendering. Music for the million, in the open air, should be on a large scale.

In the next place it was entirely a brass band, and as such incapable of giving due expression to the finer kinds of music. Like all the street bands, it is conformed wholly to the military standard. We apprehend that something more than military music is desirable on these occasions;—something quite different and remote from that, in fact. Martial music is as familiar to the public ear, as the rattle of carriage wheels, day after day, the summer long. On that score we have opportunities enough. But opportunity for something better was the thing demanded. Brass bands are not only coarse and noisy; but the component instruments, being all of one family, mere cousins to each other, produce a monotonous aggregation of tones, instead of a rich blending of tones, of well contrasted qualities.

We want to raise the taste, as well as minister to the amusement, of the people; and although any kind of music is better than nothing, as a recreation to the weary sons and daughters of continual toil; yet it would be much better, and by no means impracticable, to have music that is artistically good and elevating, and have such well loved and appreciated. We see not why even the most perfect of all instrumental combinations, the orchestra, with strings as well as wind instruments, may not be available for out-of-door refreshment in the still and pleasant summer nights. Then should we hear not aggravating arrangements, but bond fide productions of fine compositions in their original and only worthy shape. Fancy the hearing of Mendelssohn's dream overture, under the trees, some fine midsummer night! We do not anticipate this speedily; but the hint may be worth considering for the future.

OLD HARVARD. Music is at last becoming a topic in our Universities. Two years ago we noted among the well chosen subjects of Commencement "parts" two which related to music; one young man discoursed of "Musical Form," another of "Felix Mendelssohn." This week we find upon the list: Thesis: "Conditions of an Appreciation of the Music of Sebastian Bach," by George L. Osgood. We apprehend that the piece was written but not spoken, for on that very Commencement morning, the young graduate (who is the fine tenor singer of whom we have recently spoken) was to embark with his friend and teacher, Mr. John K. Paine, for Europe. May the war not interfere with the musical tour which they have promised themselves! Mr. Paine has leave of absence from his duties as instructor at the College until March.

At a meeting of the Arion Society of New York, on the 3d inst., Carl Zerrahn was elected an honorary member of the Society.

The Board of Music Trade, lately in session at Newport, R. I., voted $200, in aid of the sufferers by the fire at Portland.

MR. A. W. THAYER, that nobly enthusiastic American, to whom the lovers of Beethoven's music are so deeply indebted, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung:

"I have just heard that a new lithographed portrait of Beethoven, by Kriehuber, after an old painting in the possession of Beethoven's family, has recently been published by Artaria, Vienna. The original is the knee-piece of which Schindler speaks (vol. 1, p. 287, 1st edition), though he knows nothing about its pedigree. As I was fortunate enough to become acquainted with the painter some weeks before his death, and as I spoke to him on the subject, I am in a position to furnish you with certain particulars. The late Herr Mähler, a native of Coblenz, went to Vienna in the autumn of 1803, and was introduced at Beethoven's, as a Rhinelander, by Stephan von Breuning. The young man was, in his leisure hours, a poet, a musician, a composer, and a painter. The public is indebted to him for a great many portraits of Viennese composers, which are now in the possession of the 'Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde' in Vienna. The portrait in question was painted not earlier than 1805, nor later than 1807. After the lapse of so long a period, Herr Mähler was no longer able to give the exact date. I possess several copies of letters of Beethoven to Mähler, and in one of these this portrait is mentioned. Beethoven was painted once more by the same gentleman in 1817; this picture was purchased, after Mähler's decease, by Professor Karajans, of Vienna, in whose possession it still is."

Thinking the readers of the Musical World would not object to see a letter from A. W. Thayer even about a portrait of Beethoven, I was at pains to toss it into English. By the way, the mention of the Musical World reminds me of the fact that Volume I of Mr. Thayer's long-promised "Life of Beethoven" has at length come to pass—a fact welcome not only to the Musical World in particular, but to the world of music in general.—Lond. Mus. World.

ROCHESTER, N.Y. On the 10th inst. Mr. JAMES M. TRACY completed his six musical soirées, with a programme composed purely of four piano-forte Sonatas of Beethoven; viz: those in F and D, op. 10; that in B flat, op. 22; and the "Moonlight" one, so called. The two preceding programmes, which lie before us, are also mainly of the same high classical character. That of May 6 includes the Beethoven Sonata in C, op. 2, No. 3, and the "Moonlight"; Thalberg's Tarantelle in C minor, and Chopin's B-flat minor Scherzo; besides German songs by Mr. Keiser and an English ballad by Miss Jennie Ball. On June 16th, Mr. Tracy played Beethoven's Sonatas in E flat, op. 7, and in D (Pastorale), op. 23, and a Sonata by Weber, in C, op. 24; Miss Bull sang "With verdure clad," and a pupil of Mr. T.'s played that famous "Op. 2" of Chopin's (Variations on La ci darem). Such programmes show a high and earnest purpose, in which we understand Mr. Tracy has persevered in spite of indifferent patronage and even narrow opposition. Let him not be discouraged; if his power of rendering Beethoven be half as great as a local journal claims for him, he will certainly succeed in the end.

SAN FRANCISCO. Music-lovers and fashionables in the Golden Gate city, blindly taking it for granted that Italian Opera is the height and sum of all musical felicity, are anxious to make it a permanent institution among them, and to this end have lately organized an Association on the following basis:

The undersigned, desirous of securing the permanent establishment of the Italian Opera in the city of San Francisco, and being satisfied that an adequate support to secure that result can be obtained from the music-loving portion of its citizens, do hereby recommend the organization of an association to be called the "San Francisco Italian Opera Association," that shall have for its object:

First. To secure, by the support and influence of its members, the permanent establishment of the Opera in the city of San Francisco.

Second. To enlist and concentrate the support of those favorable to the purpose of the Association, by becoming members thereof.

The affairs of the Association to be regulated by a Board of Officers, to be selected at the first meeting, who shall be governed by such rules and regulations as may then, or from time to time, be adopted.

It is expressly understood that no power shall exist in the rules and regulations of the organization to contract any debt or liability; nor shall any assessment, except the monthly sum of one dollar, be levied at any time, without the unanimous consent of the members present at the meeting when such assessment is proposed.

After several preliminary meetings, the following officers have been chosen, to serve until the first annual meeting in January next:

President, R. C. Rogers; Vice-President, Daniel Knight; Honorary Vice-Presidents, Ogden Hoffman, Hall McAllister, F. H. Grain, A. Caselli, I. Friedlander, N. Larco, Camillo Martin, L. Seligman, W. C. Walker; Directors, John Benson, S. M. Dettelbach, Raphael Weill, George A. Parker, T. F. Cronise, J. C. Ford, Henry G. Langley, H. C. Logan, William Willis; Treasurer, M. Gray; Secretary, David Wilder.

Either of the above named directors will receive subscriptions from those who wish to join the Association. The fund arising from the monthly contributions of members will be used in accordance with the wishes of the Association; but it is suggested that if in the future any Eastern operatic manager should express a desire to come here with a first-class troupe, this fund may be depended upon to guarantee him against actual loss. The formation of a musical library has also been suggested as a worthy object for the Association. All persons except professional musicians are eligible to membership, and the Association will be entirely independent of managerial influences.

It seems that arrangements are already made for a season to begin this very month. Judging by the following list presented to the Directors by Sig. Bianchi, the season will be stunningly Verdi-ish:

Verdi—Il Trovatore, La Traviata, Ernani, Rigoletto, Attila, Macbeth, I Masnadieri, I due Foscari, I Lombardi, Un Ballo in Maschera.

Donizetti—Lucia di Lammermoor, Belisario, Lucrezia Borgia, Il Polauto, Linda di Chamounix, La Favorita.

Bellini—Norma, La Sonnambula.

Mozart—Don Giovanni.

Meyerbeer—L' Africaine.

Gounod—Faust.

Halévy—La Juive.

Ricci—Crispino e la Comare, Chi dura vince.

Petrella—Ione.

Pacini—Saffo.

Signor Marra, baritone, and Signor Milleri, basso profondo, are already on their way from New York, to be joined here by Signorina Brambilla, Signora and Signor Bianchi, and the best resident talent, with a chorus of 18 voices and an orchestra of 16 instruments, under the direction of Mr. Herold. It is understood that if a sufficient number of subscribers can be obtained for the season, the orchestra will be enlarged, and that an engagement may possibly be effected with the celebrated soprano, Noël-Guidi, now in New York.

CINCINNATI. The Commercial of June 27, has the following history of what is now one of the most important musical societies of that city:

The Harmonic Society was originated by Dr. O. D. Norton, who, with S. S. Foster, Henry Appleton and Alfred Squires, met weekly at the house of the last named gentleman, on Fourth street, west of Race, to sing the beautiful quartets of Mendelssohn. Dr. Norton suggested a musical organization on a large scale, and for this purpose consulted with Victor Williams, Mr. Locke, the music teacher, and other professionals in the city. The work looked very discouraging, and proved to be so for a length of time. In the fall of 1860, in October, a public meeting was called at the Wesleyan Female College to organize a musical society. The meeting was largely attended, and resulted in the election of the following gentlemen as officers for the society: Robert Barnett, President; W. K. Coolidge, (deceased) Vice-President; Henry Appleton, Secretary, and Dr. Norton, Treasurer. Victor Williams labored faithfully to carry out the object of the association, and assisted materially in placing it on a firm basis. Forty ladies and gentlemen were enrolled as members; the Boston Academy chorus books were procured, and some funds were raised for the purchase of music, &c. The first oratorio the Society tried its ability on was "Judas Macchæus," but it was never given in public.

The enterprise dragged along during the war, but the organization was maintained until the fall of 1863, when a re-organization took place, the basement of Dr. Boynton's church, on Vine street, above Eighth, being kindly offered and accepted for that meeting.

At that time, Mr. L. C. Hopkins was chosen President; Mr. Garlich, Vice President; Jacob Burnett, Secretary; the Treasurer's name we forget. Trustees were appointed, and Prof. Charles Barus made Musical Director, with Mr. Henry J. Smith as Assistant. Dr. Norton turned over $130 to the new Treasurer together with a clean set of books, not a single debt remaining unpaid, and out of this small beginning has grown our present Harmonic Society, which, under the wise and liberal management of Mr. Hopkins, has been able to subscribe $3,000 to the new Opera-house and has won great credit and some renown as a musical association.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

What is Love? Song. Elizabeth Philp. 30

An elegant little song; words and music of classic goodness, and in somewhat antique style.

Paddy Blake's Echo. Comic Song. S. Lover. 30

A remarkable Irish echo, surely. To the question, "How do you do, Paddy Blake?" it politely answered, "Very well, I thank you, sir!" For the skilful use Teddy Keogh made of the echo, see song. First-rate comic song.

That shalt thou see. (Le Vedrai). "Crispino." 40

Contains the scene in which the cobbler receives his commission as M.D. from the Comare, who bestows it, in spite of his assertion that he is "the chief of the asses." Sprightly music.

Anita, or The Chieftain's wife. B. Richards. 40

Founded on an incident in the life of Garibaldi, whose wife is said to have died from exhaustion, during one of his hazardous retreats. Quite a touching and beautiful song.

Singing through the Forests.

A popular song or glee, here arranged so as to be sung either as a solo and chorus, or as a quartet throughout.

Maids of the Greenwood. Duet. Glover. 60

It is to be presumed that other people beside Glover write duets, but perhaps no one has written more really good ones than he. This will rank among the best.

Hilda. Song. (Melody of Hilda Waltz). Godfrey. 30

A bright, cheerful affair, arranged from a waltz which has become popular.

Instrumental.

Piano piece. No. 4. Bargiel. 35

Minor, and somewhat dreamy and sad in character, with a little tinge of Chopinism. Not difficult, especially, and quite original.

Pré aux Clercs quickstep. (Dewdrop, No. 24).

Bellak. 20

Pretty and easy.

Fantasia Brillante on Norma. G. Leybach. 90

A splendid exhibition or concert-piece: among the very best that have been made from the great opera. Somewhat difficult, but not beyond the reach of a player of average ability.

Quartet in Fidelio. For Brass Band. Burditt. 1.00

The well-known and admired piece, sung by Fidelio, the prison-keeper and his daughter, and the daughter's lover. Brilliant enough to please anybody, and a good classic piece for practice.

Vivienne waltz. L. M. Miller. 30

Books.

GEMS OF SCOTISH SONG. A collection of the most beautiful Scotch Ballads, set to music. Arranged and compiled from the very best sources, and latest revisions of the author's works.

Boards, $2.50

Cloth, 3.00

Full gilt, 4.00

It would be difficult to name a book containing more genuine melody than is included in the above named volume, which is uniform in appearance with the Home Circle series, has 200 pages of excellent music, and, one would think, must contain all the good Scotch songs. There are doubtless others, however, but the hundred and sixty titles in the table of contents indicate a very large collection, and one which may be safely presented to a musical friend, with the certainty it will please.

Germania.

BY G. C. SWAYNE.

On her Rhine-rock stands Germania, stands on guard with ardent glances.
In her right the pointed broadsword, frowning back the threats of France;
On her shield the coal-black eagle, double-headed, lies displayed,
Locks and vesture boldly floating, stands the mythologic maid.
Blame we not the patriot-painter, if a dream his fancy caught,
If the high hope of his bosom was the mother of his thought.
Blame we not the patriot-sculptor, if beneath his plastic might Soon Arminius mounts colossal on the Teutoburger height—
Stout Arminius, Northern Ares, who the Roman Mars withstood, Sweeping clear of Cæsar's legions all the dusk Herosynian wood.
Painted thus the mail-clad virgin peace and glory doth forecast,
While that helmet 'mid the lightnings telleth of a glorious past.
Other were the tale, Arminius, could Thorvaldsen's spirit bright
Spring to life, or Danish limner paint thee to the life aright;
Thou wouldst lie a helpless giant, tangled in a maze of chains,
Pestered by a host of pigmies, bleeding from a hundred veins;
Men as over prostrate Ares, in the old Homeric lay,
Otus stood with Ephialtes, shutting out Olympian day,
Overhead two monstrous warders brooding make thy sleep afraid,
Curdling up the heart within thee with a dank, ill-favor'd shade,
Sworn alike to guard thy durance, sworn to thy eternal woe,
Though in hate to thee as brothers, each the other's bitter foe;
Never stir the arm, Arminius, never raise upon the knee,
Hapsburg leagued with Hohenzollern still forbids thee to be free.
Thou art great in soul, Germania, boundless is thy wealth of thought—
Great in Art, and great in Science—wonders hath thy spirit wrought,
Since the Friar found the powder that the towers in ruin hurld,
Since the printing-engine's father made the lever of the world.
Schiller taught how Tell and Orange broke an alien despot's rod;
Goethe sang and walked in beauty, noble as a Phidian god;
Music thundered with Beethoven, laugh'd and languish'd with Mozart.
Till Italia owned thee sister—heiress of her realm of Art.
Then, the subtle Greek surpassing, Hegel, sage of wintry skies, Stripped the fateful tree of knowledge of the fruit that never dies.
Gazing into Truth's bright essence till his mortal eyes grew blind, Melting Time and Space and Being in the crucible of Mind;
Him hath Nature's patient searcher in the race of Fame outdone,
Reading off in flames prismatic half the secrets of the sun.
Freedom hath a life, Germania, higher than the life of Mind—
Freedom changes men to brothers, gives them eyes to see their kind;
Freedom thou wouldst have—a glimmer, just to light thy lamp at home,
Not a sun to gild with glory distant Poland, Venice, Rome;
So in life-long trance thou liest, daring naught, yet knowing all,
Laughing-stock of all the tyrants, Europe's longest-suffering thrall;
Still on broken reeds relying, trusting in a Hapsburg's word,
Hailing as the glave of Justice Hohenzollern's falcon sword;
Never, never thorns of Hapsburg grapes of Faith and Freedom bore, Figs from Hohenzollern's thistles thou shalt gather nevermore.

Beethoven's Letters.

(From The Nation).

To his interesting collection of the letters of Mozart, Dr. Nohl has now added another of the letters of Beethoven, by no means, however, so interesting; for they not only add very little to what we know of Beethoven from the life of him by Schindler, but are in themselves for the most part merely tedious details of business or pitiable exhibitions of temper. And for one so much given to writing as Beethoven was, it is rather surprising indeed that letters of a more attractive sort have not been found, especially as Dr. Nohl conjectures that twice as many as he has been able, after infinite labor, to present in this collection, may exist scattered over Europe. Yet, meagre as the work is, it will not fail to find many readers; for it introduces us once more to the presence of the great master, whose personality it is so necessary to comprehend in all its originality in order fully to understand his works.

Of Beethoven, the man, therefore, we propose now to say a word as explanatory of his letters, as, indeed, the best criticism upon them; for, unlike the letters of Mozart, or the still more charming letters of Mendelssohn, they do not in themselves present his whole character. The strange, weird outlines they suggest must be filled up from other sources.

Born in Bonn, in 1771, the life of Beethoven was contemporaneous with that great intellectual development in Germany, which has made it such a power in the present century. While Herder and Lessing and Goethe breathed a new spirit into criticism and philosophy, Gluck and Bach and Mozart and Handel led the way to that eminence in music which Germany has ever since maintained; and Beethoven carried on the work they began. Like a being who has descended from an ideal world to redeem this, he was in perpetual struggle with the past; and his early days in Bonn, before he had attained a full consciousness of his task in life, were his only happy ones. They were to him, as has been well said, what the sweetly fanciful larghetto of his second symphony has been to the world, an undisturbed because unconscious happiness. His father and grandfather were musicians before him, and he showed early great musical genius. At the age of fifteen he was made organist of the court chapel at Bonn, and at the age of twenty-two went to Vienna to study under Haydn. Mozart had died a year before, and it was only once, on a flying tour to Vienna in the winter of 1786-7, that Beethoven met him; and how Mozart recognized his genius is illustrated by a curious anecdote. Beethoven had acquired much reputation for his improvisations upon the piano, an exercise in the genuineness of which Mozart had no real belief, fancying that the pieces to be played were secretly agreed upon beforehand. He resolved, therefore, to test Beethoven, and gave him as a subject a chromatic fugue, the motive of which contained the opposite subject of a double fugue. Beethoven instantly detected the deception, and, reversing the motive, improvised a regular double fugue, and the lively Mozart slipped away into an adjoining room to say to those he found there that here was a youth the world would hear of.

The placid mind of Haydn, however, could less understand the soaring genius of Beethoven, and they soon separated. The immediate cause of the rupture, indeed, is said to have been the fact, which Beethoven one day accidentally discovered, that Haydn neglected to correct his errors. That was, in Beethoven's eyes, a crimen læsæ artis, and he broke from him at once; and when, notwithstanding, it was suggested to him afterwards, at Haydn's instance, that in the compositions which he was publishing he should call himself Haydn's pupil, his proud, curt reply was that he had indeed taken lessons of Haydn, but had learned nothing from him. And that answer is the key to the history of his subsequent career, with its ceaseless effort to ascend up out of the present and out of the past to dwell in newer regions and among sublimer thoughts.

Shortly afterwards, the Prince Lichnowski took him into his palace, and the princess watched over him with the care of a mother; his whims, and they were many, were consulted; he enjoyed the best society, and he had fully, as yet, his sense of hearing. There was nothing to disturb his repose, as it finds expression in his first and second symphonies, in his first quartets, in the septet and first twelve piano sonatas. But beneath this apparent calm there was a turbulent, restless spirit at work in him, which drove him presently out into the dreary world to battle with its routine and to vivify it anew. Kind as his patrons had been, he felt it better to hunger and be misunderstood than not to be himself, supreme in his own sphere. And he gained what he sought, but he gained it with that strain of discord in his finer nature, which is to the soul of the artist what the shadow of a cloud is to a landscape. The desire not to improve, but to recreate the world, to make it different from what it was in kind as well in degree, was the error which ruined his earthly peace, for he persisted in judging all relations of life by the unattainable ideals which drew him on in music. Yet it was out of this opposition to the reality, out of this dualism of his life, which was to him a sorrow and bitterness known to but few beside him, that there came, after long struggle, the final victory of his later creations.

It is not, however, to his compositions that we wish now to advert, but to that moral superiority which, in spite of his infirmities of temper and his eccentric habits, marks the career of Beethoven from the first day we have any knowledge of him to the last. For to appreciate these letters, sterile as most of them are, one must understand the real elevation and the unquestioned purity of Beethoven's life. In the midst of a corrupt city and a still more corrupt court, in an age of license, exposed to all sorts of seductions which beset genius of an order like his, he preserved ever a lofty virtue and a hatred of whatever was impure or even equivocal. Thrown, as he was, into every-day contact with the proudest and richest nobility in Europe, rank and wealth remained to him ever matters of absolute indifference, mere accidents of this temporal material life. Hence, in his political sentiments he was practically a republican. A devout reader of Plato, he longed to see all institutions modelled upon the plan prescribed in the "Republic," "Plato's Republic," says Schindler, "was transfused into his flesh and blood." It was his firm belief that it was Napoleon's real intention to republicanize France upon similar principles; and it was not till the news came that Napoleon had caused himself to be proclaimed Emperor of the French that he was undeceived; when, tearing off the title-page of his "Sinfonia Eroica," containing the dedication of that work to Napoleon, which he was just on the point of despatching to Paris, he flung it upon the floor with a torrent of execrations. The tragic end of the great conqueror, however, is said to have reconciled Beethoven to him, for, as he remarked, he had predicted it himself in the "Dead March" of this symphony.

At Toplitz, in 1812, he was walking one day with Goethe, when they saw at a distance the whole Imperial family. With his usual stately deference, Goethe stepped aside and stood with his hat off, bending low, until they had passed him. Beethoven, on the contrary, pressed his hat yet more firmly on his head, and walked, with folded arms, through the thickest of the throng. Princes and pages made a path for him, the Archduke Rudolph took off his hat, and the Empress bowed. There may be a difference of opinion on the question of manners, but there can be none as to the honesty of Beethoven's convictions. It was Goethe's remembrance, it may be, of this uncourtly freedom that led him to take no notice of Beethoven's letter, eleven years afterwards, soliciting a favor which he could easily have granted to the poor composer wasting away under the burden of his task. To be sure, as Mr. Lewes says, there is no evidence that Goethe received the letter, but also none that he did not receive it, and posterity will no doubt dwell a good deal on the latter fact.

But the worst trials of Beethoven's life, it must be confessed, were chiefly of his own creation. His "evil principle" was in the shape of his two brothers; one of them an apothecary, who would send his card to him on a New Year's Day inscribed "Johann van Beethoven, Landowner" (Gutsbesitzer), and Beethoven would return it inscribed "Ludwig van Beethoven, Brainowner" (Hirnbesitzer),—a harmless pleasantry, certainly, but it indicates the bearing of the apothecary, bursting with pride at his success, when we remember that he refused to his face the slightest aid to the brother who had helped him to it, while he plundered him behind his back. The other was a banking officer, whose chief injury to Beethoven was in dying and leaving a son for him to take charge of. The mother was an immoral woman, and Beethoven was forthwith plunged into lawsuits, while the youth plunged as soon as he could into dissipation. An incident in one of the lawsuits affords a singular instance—alas, how bitter to Beethoven!—of what one may call his splendid simplicity. It was intimated to the court that the word van, being of Dutch origin, and not ennobling a family in Holland, could not ennoble one in Germany, and Beethoven was accordingly asked to produce proofs of his nobility. "My nobility," he exclaimed, "is here and here," and he pointed to his head and put his hand on his heart. But that sort of nobility it was impossible for the court to understand, and they ordered his case to be transferred to the court for commoners, where he lost it, though he gained it in the end.

Helpless and awkward in every movement, spilling inkstands over his piano, breaking furniture when it came in his way; so tempestuous in his anger that if a waiter brought him the wrong dish of meat he would throw it, gravy and all, in his face, or if his cook gave him musty eggs for his soup would spatter her with them from head to foot, dashing the water over himself in his rooms in such floods that scarcely any one would have him for a lodger; sending a lady who had asked for a lock of his hair a tuft of goat's hair, and then apologizing when she discovered the deception, and never afterward speaking to the person who had suggested it to him; suddenly quitting a summer retreat, where he was supremely happy, because his host persisted in making him profound bows whenever he met him in his walks; constantly changing his abode from the north side of the city in May to the south side in August, and often having three lodgings at a time; this small, thin man, with his great head covered with bushy grey hair, and little brown eyes flashing bright, or fixed and motionless, as his thought possessed him, with long furrows in his chin, laughing like an ape in the midst of the wildest disorder, books and music and half-eaten luncheons and half-emptied bottles, sketches for quartets and Stracchino cheese all mixed up together, deaf, and cheated and slandered—this great man, who they said never loved, though he never lived an hour without loving; who they said was parsimonious, though if he saved any money at all, it was for a dissolute nephew who would have left him to die alone,—this abused Beethoven, who looked upon Handel as the greatest composer that ever lived, who silenced bores with a sarcasm and forgot his pupils for weeks together, and in his philosophical discussions would never permit the mention of thorough-bass or religion, which he declared were exhausted subjects—this man, so full of contradictions and absurdities and genius, was one of the kindest and purest of human beings. He who can comprehend his noble heart will not fail, as Schindler well says, to rank the man as high as the artist.

Of the divinity of his art no man ever had a purer conception. "Music is like wine," he says, "inflaming men's minds to new achievements, and I am the Bacchus who serves it out to them, and when they grow sober they shall find themselves possessed forever of a spiritual draught." Solitary and poor, with so many infirmities that he was often tempted to curse his existence and to learn resignation from Plutarch, it was virtue alone, with its inspiring ideal, which upheld him in his misery and kept him from suicide. Shut out in great part from the world, tortured by suspicions, betrayed by those he loved, restless, anxious, wasted in body and mind, communion with God was his solace and his great strength. "I must live alone," he says: "yet I know that God is nearer to me than to my brothers in the art. I hold converse with him and fear not, for I have always known and understood him." Music, like her sister arts, was to him based upon morality, which was the fountain-head of all genuine inspiration. "Speak of me to Goethe," he says, "and tell him to hear my symphonies, and he will agree with me that music alone ushers man into the portals of an intellectual world ready to encompass him, but which he may never encompass." Goethe was spoken to, but Goethe understood not.

Sorrow illumined by the reconciling light from above, the martyrdom of earth glorified—that was Beethoven, says one of his critics. And the sorrow of earth, how it followed him to the end! In the summer of 1826, his nephew, driven desperate by his bad courses, attempted suicide, a crime which the law of Austria ascribes to a defect in religious education. The case was investigated, and the unfortunate youth committed to the charge of his uncle, with the injunction to leave Vienna in twenty-four hours. Returning home in the autumn, Beethoven caught cold, and his last sickness came upon him. He kept his bed, and his nephew went off to the billiard rooms, and told the marker at one of them to send a physician to his uncle; but the marker was himself taken sick before he could do so, and, being carried to the hospital, remembered his commission, and the attending surgeon set off instantly to visit Beethoven. But it was too late; several days had elapsed, and the hand of death was heavy upon him. Yet his eccentricity never left him. When the landlady brought him an almanac to prove that the week was up and his rent was due, he sang the interrogatory motive of the quartet in F, op. 135, "Must it be?" and the woman, entering into his humor, stamped with her foot and said, "It must be!" and these words now stand in the super-scription of the work.

The last thing he did was to make his nephew, who had so infamously abandoned him, his sole heir, and then musing said: "Do you hear the bell? The scene is shifting;" and it shifted indeed, for the next act opened in another world, whence we still seem to hear the echo of his words: "For my works I fear not. No evil can befall them. Whosoever shall understand them shall be freed from the misery that burdens mankind."

Mozart's "Seraglio" at Her Majesty's Theatre, London.

The second performance of Il Seraglio was thoroughly enjoyed by such an audience of genuine amateurs as seldom fails to be attracted by an opera of Mozart's. Stingy and mean as was the Emperor Joseph II., the art of music is considerably in his debt. He at any rate provoked the man of genius to show what much better things could be done than by those who stood higher in Court favor, and were honored and recompensed, while he, a victim of cabal and intrigue, on account of his known and dreaded superiority, was left neglected in the shade. To Joseph II. we owe the German Entführung aus dem

Serail (Il Seraglio), and, still more directly, the Italian Figaro; and these facts would atone for a multitude of sins. After the death of Gluck, and when Don Giovanni had been produced (not in Vienna but in Prague), the Emperor, at length, fully understanding the worth of the musician of whose services he might at the outset have exclusively disposed, appointed Mozart his chief "Kammermusikus," at the splendid annual salary of 800 florins (!); but it was too late. The opera of Così fan Tutte was ordered, composed without delay, and produced in January, 1790. Joseph II., however, did not live to hear it; nor at his death had any provision been made for the newest and most illustrious of his civil servants—who, by the way, did not survive his Imperial master a couple of years.

The book of Il Seraglio, which was concocted out of a German Lustspiel, or comedy (with music) by one Bretzner, has been terribly abused, much more so than we think it deserves. Mozart found it good enough, and was even delighted with it. It afforded him that for which he always bargained—variety of character in the dramatis personæ. Indeed, it is doubtful whether he had not as large a hand in preparing the "scenario" as his associate, the Court-poet, Stephanie himself. And, after all, where is the harm of it? A young Spanish lady on her way to Sicily, to be married, is taken by a corsair, sold to a Pasha, and carried with her maid and the servant of her future spouse (her escort) to the harem. The Pasha falls in love with his captive, and would make her queen of his household, wooing her with amiable gallantry in spite of her declaration that she is devoted to another. Meanwhile the lover has found out where his Dulcinea is imprisoned, and contriving to obtain an interview with his own servant, who enjoys the Pasha's favor, they plan together the means of escape, with the lady and her companion, to a vessel lying off the coast to receive them. Their plot, however, is frustrated by a suspicious old steward, who, enamored of the maid, is treated by her with contempt. The Pasha, informed of what has been going on, and at first exasperated, threatens the lovers with the torture, but ultimately relenting, grants them their liberty, to the mortification of his steward, who would have had master and man put to death, and detained lady and maid in the seraglio. Voilà tout. Here, at best, are the materials for a farce; but Mozart saw further, and infused such life into his music that every one of the six personages becomes a marked individuality. It is not, in fact, the piece that has prevented Il Seraglio from being heard as often and in as many places as other operas, too numerous to mention, and which can in no way be compared with it. The real cause lies elsewhere. When Mozart composed his opera there were certain singers in the theatre with voices of unexceptional capability.

There were a soprano, a tenor, and a bass able to execute almost anything that could be written, and to display whose talents in a prominent manner was absolutely imperative. Hence the two airs written for Constanze ("Ach ich liebe" and "Märtern aller Arten") with which only such modern sopranos as Mlle. Titiens can grapple; hence, the (to nine singers out of ten) almost impracticable airs for Osmin ("Soleho hergelaufne Laffen" and "O! wie will ich triumphieren"), written both inconveniently high and inconveniently low; and hence the airs for Belmont, which lie for the most part too high for ordinary tenor voices. Nor is the music of Blonde by any means unexceptionally accommodating—witness her first air, ("Durch Zärtlichkeit und Schmeichelein"), written in A, in one passage going up as high as E, a note higher than either of the airs of Constanze, but which Mlle. Sinico transposes to G. This transposition, indeed, as well as that of the first air, sung by Mlle. Titiens, is in the present time not merely allowable, but advisable. And if Herr Rokitsky transposes his air, so familiar in our concert-rooms as "Questi avventurieri infami," from F to E, it is by no means to show off to greater advantage the depth and quality of his bass tones, but because in many places the passages are written so high that it is questionable whether he could master them with half the same ease in the original key. Pedrillo has none of these difficulties to encounter; but on the other hand the music assigned to him is of material consequence; and if Signor Stagno would take the quaint romance in the last scene ("In un castello d'Aragona") with the pizzicato accompaniment, just half as quickly as he takes it now, he would produce twice the effect. Herr Rokitsky, on the fig tree (Act I), exposes himself to criticism in another way. The melody with which, heedless of the anxious importunities of Belmont, Osmin solaces his labor ("Qui trovo una bella amante")—as quaint as the romance of Pedrillo, and in character something like our old English "Jolly Miller"—is marked "tempo giusto" in the score, which nowhere gives authority for those pseudo-sentimental slackenings of the time indulged in, to the detriment of the music by this clever gentleman, whose Osmin, as a whole, both in a musical and dramatic sense, is extremely spirited and good.

But criticism apart—and there is but little to criticize in the performance of Il Seraglio at Her Majesty's Theatre—the opera is played with hearty good will by all engaged in it. Mlle. Titiens sings the heroic and the impassioned music of Constanze so nobly, Mlle. Sinico the tender and the lively music of Blonde so uniformly well; Herr Rokitsansky gives the music of Osmin, which has more of the vis comica than that of any other character drawn by Mozart (Papageno excepted), with such vigor and fluency; Dr. Gunz throws so much warmth into the music of the amorous and perpetually sighing Belmont—love-music such as only Mozart has written; Signor Stagno is so generally (if not invariably) correct in the music of Pedrillo; the little that Selim, the by no means ill-natured Pasha, has to sing is so well sung by Signor Foli; all act together with such unmistakable unanimity; the concerted pieces are so satisfactory; the choruses of the Janissaries are delivered with such appropriate animation; and the orchestra, from the characteristically colored overture to the end, performs its task with such efficiency, that we forgive the zealous conductor, Signor Arditi, for almost every curtailment he has made, saving alone the thirty-seven bars he has omitted from the last finale. This omission frustrates the design of the composer, who expressly intended the enchanting melody with which the finale opens to be uttered successively by Belmont, Constanze, Pedrillo, and Blonde, each time answered by the refrain (for the five principal characters) which so exquisitely rounds it off. We have little doubt that Il Seraglio will remain a stock piece in the repertory, and that between this and next season Mr. Telbin will have enriched it with one or two of those Oriental tableaux he so well knows how to paint. It is honorable to Mr. Mapleson to have revived such a work; and the more pains he bestows on giving it every chance of being appreciated, the more it will redound to his credit.—Musical World July 14.

MOZART'S LETTERS TO HIS FATHER, DESCRIBING HIS "SERAGLIO."

Vienna, Sept. 26, 1781.

The opera began with my monologue, so I asked Herr-Stephanie to write an arietta for it, and then, after Osmin's little song, when the two talk together, to substitute a duet. We intend the part of Osmin for Herr Fischer, who certainly has a grand bass voice, (although the Archbishop once assured me that he sang too low for a bass, and I in return promised that he should sing higher next time,) so we must take advantage of this, especially as he has the whole public in his favor here. In the original libretto Osmin has only one song, and nothing else to sing except in the terzetto and finale; so now he has an aria in the first act, and also one in the second. I have already indicated to Stephanie the words that I require for that air, the chief part of the music being finished before Stephanie heard a word on the subject. There is only a beginning and an end, which must have a good effect, and Osmin's rage is made comical by the accompaniment of the Turkish music. In working out the aria, I have given full scope to Fischer's fine deep tones to vibrate. The "D'rum beim Barte des Propheten" is indeed in the same time, but with quick notes, and as his wrath gradually increases, (when the aria appears to be at an end,) the allegro assai follows in quite another measure and key, which must insure the best effect; for as a man in such a violent fit of passion transgresses all the bounds of order and propriety, and forgets himself in his fury, the same must be the case with the music too. But as the passions, whether violent or not, must never be expressed so as to become revolting, and the music even in the most appalling situations never offend the ear, but continue to please and be melodious, I did not go from F, in which the air is written, into a remote key, but into an analogous one, not however into its nearest relative D minor, but into the more remote A minor. Do you know how I have expressed Belmont's aria in A major, "O wie ängstlich, o wie feurig," and the "throbbing heart"?—by octaves on the violins.* This is the favorite aria of all those who have heard it, and mine also, and written expressly to suit Adamberger's voice. You hear the trembling, throbbing, swelling breast expressed by a crescendo; while the whispers and sighs are rendered by the first violins with sordini, and a flute in unison. The Janissary chorus is, as such, all that can be desired—short and lively, and written entirely to please the Viennese. I have rather sacrificed Constanze's aria to the flexible throat of Mlle. Cavalieri,—"Trennung war mein banges Loos" I have endeavored to express so far as an Italian bravura air will admit of it. I have changed the Hui into schnell, so it now stands thus,—"Doch wie schnell schwand meine Freude!" I don't know what our German poets think; even if they do not understand the theatre, or at all events operas, still they should not make their personages talk as if they were addressing a herd of swine.

Now about the terzetto at the close of the first act. Pedrillo has passed off his master as an architect, to give him an opportunity to meet his Constanze in the garden. The Pasha has taken him into his service. Osmin, the superintendent, knows nothing of this, and being a rude churl and a sworn foe to all strangers, he is insolent, and refuses to let them enter the garden. This beginning is very short, and as the words admitted of it, I wrote it very passably for the three voices; then comes the major at once pianissimo; it must go very quick, and wind up noisily at the close, which is always appropriate at the conclusion of an act; the more noise the better, the shorter the better, so that the people may not have time to cool in their applause. The overture is quite short, with alternate pianos and fortes, the Turkish music always coming in at the fortes. It is modulated through different keys, and I think no one can well go to sleep over it, even if his previous night has been a sleepless one.

Now comes the rub! The first act has been ready for three weeks past, and likewise an aria in the second act, and the drunken duet, which in fact consists entirely of my Turkish tattoo, but I cannot go on with it just now, as the whole story is being altered, and by my own desire. At the beginning of the third act there is a charming quintet, or rather finale, but I should prefer having it at the end of the second act. In order to make this practicable, great changes must be made, and in fact an entirely new plot introduced; but Stephanie is already over head and ears in other work.

Oct. 13, 1781.

Now as to the libretto of the opera. So far as regards Stephanie's work, you are quite right; still the poetry is strictly in keeping with the character of the stupid, surly, malicious Osmin. I am well aware that this species of verse is not the best, but it chimed in so admirably with my musical ideas (previously rambling about in my head) that it could not fail to please me, and I would lay a wager that when it is performed no deficiencies will be found. As for the poetry in the piece itself, I really do not consider it at all despicable. The aria of Belmonte, "O wie ängstlich!" could not possibly be better written for the music. The "Hui" and "Kammer ruht in meinem Schooss" excepted, (as grief and repose are incompatible,) the air is not badly written, particularly the first part, and I should say that in an opera the poetry must necessarily be the obedient daughter of the music. Why do the Italian comic operas everywhere please,—with all their wretched poetry,—even in Paris, where I myself witnessed the fact? Because music rules there supreme, and all else is forgotten. An opera is certain to become popular when the plot is well worked out, the verse written expressly for the music, and not merely to suit some miserable rhyme, (which never enhances the value of any theatrical performance, be it what it may, but rather detracts from it), bringing in words, or even entire verses, which completely ruin the whole ideas of the composer. Versification is, indeed, indispensable for music, but rhyme, solely for rhyming's sake, most pernicious. Those gentlemen who set to work in this pedantic fashion will always insure the failure both of their book and of the music. It would be well if a good composer could be found who understood the stage, with talent enough to make suggestions, and combined with that true Phoenix—an intellectual poet; then no misgivings would be entertained about the applause of the unlearned. Poets seems to me somewhat like trumpeters with their mechanical tricks! If we musical composers were to adhere as faithfully to our rules, (which were very good at a time when no one knew any better,) we should compose music as worthless as their libretti.

Saenger-Fest at Louisville.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL FESTIVAL OF THE NORTH AMERICAN SAENGERBUND.

A Louisville, Kentucky, letter dated July 24th, says: Louisville is redolent of Fatherland to-day. The Ohio seems to be transformed into the classic Rhine, and the yellow, red and black flag are sandwiched between the Stars and Stripes. The particular and numerous other banners are waving in every street. The musical congress of the fourteenth annual Saengerbund commences its first grand festival in the West, and from the mammoth Fest Hall on Broadway rolls out the grand old music of the German masters on the voices of a thousand burly Teutons. For the last few days the various committees have been assiduously at work completing the arrangements for the festival, and it is a gratifying proof of the success and popularity of music in America that all nationalities warmly participate in it.

THE FEST HALL,

specially erected at an immense cost for the occasion, is quite an imposing structure. It is fifty feet high, one hundred and seventy-eight long, and eighty-two broad, and is constructed on excellent acoustic principles. The stage is semi-circular, and can accommodate with ease the immense chorus and orchestra designed for it. The building will hold four thousand people, the gallery alone being capable of holding fifteen hundred. It is decorated with red, white and blue devices, and on the steps of the stage appear the busts of BEETHOVEN, MENDELSSOHN, MOZART, SCHUMANN and SCHUBERT. Each society participating in the festival has its own place in the hall designated by an appropriate shield. At the back of the stage APOLLO and his lyre appear, surrounded by effulgent rays.

THE HEADQUARTERS AND COMMITTEES.

The head quarters of the Saengerbund are Beck's Hall. Messrs. Hallman, Stien, Hahn, Wolf, Faulds and Eller are the principal members of the numerous committees. The Fest Director is Mr. Sobolewski, of St. Louis, and Mayor Lithgow and General J. C. Davis take an active part in the proceedings.

THE SOCIETIES PRESENT.

No less than forty societies from different cities in the East and West, including the New York Liederkranz, under the direction of Mr. Stein, had arrived, and will take part in the festival.

THE PROCESSION.

At two o'clock this afternoon a procession was formed at Beck's Hall and started for the Fest Hall in the following order:

- Band of Music.
- Flag of the Saengerbund.
- Central Committee of Columbus, O.
- Central Committee of Louisville, Ky.
- Maennerchor of Columbus, O.
- Band of Music from Chicago, Ill.
- Concordia of Chicago, Ill.
- Germania of Chicago, Ill.
- Freier Maennerchor of Chicago, Ill.
- Germania of St. Louis, Mo.
- Arion Des Westens, St. Louis, Mo.
- Delegations of the Musical Societies of St. Louis, Mo.
- Turner Maennerchor, of Nashville, Tenn.
- Liederchor, of Evansville, Indiana.
- Maennerchor, of Indianapolis.
- Maennerchor, Tell City, Ind.
- Maennerchor of Terre Haute, Indiana.
- Liederkranz, of Richmond, Indiana.
- Band of Music.
- Maennerchor, of New Albany, Indiana.
- Liedertafel, of Lafayette, Indiana.
- Saengerbund, of Aurora, Indiana.
- Maennerchor, of Laporte, Indiana.
- Liederkranz of New York city.
- Liedertafel, of Buffalo, New York.
- Liederkranz, of Syracuse, New York.
- Maennerchor, of Wheeling, West Va.
- Harmonie, of Wheeling, West Va.
- Frohsinn, of Pittsburgh, Pa.
- Band of music from Cincinnati, O.
- Maennerchor, of Cincinnati, Ohio.
- Saengerbund, of Cincinnati, Ohio.
- Junger Maennerchor, of Cincinnati, O.
- Harmonie, of Cincinnati, O.
- Druiden Saengerchor, of Cincinnati, O.
- Saengerbund, of Toledo, O.
- Gesangverein, of Cleveland, O.
- Maennerchor, of Cleveland, O.
- Liederkranz, of Cleveland, O.
- Liederkranz, of Sidney, O.
- Wyandotte Saengerbund, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio.
- Harmonia, of Chillicothe, O.
- Liedertafel, of Akron, O.
- Bruderbund, of Tiffin, O.
- Orpheus, of Louisville.
- Frohsinn, of Louisville.
- Liederkranz, of Louisville.
- Concordia, of Louisville.

THE RECEPTION CONCERT.

Arrived at the Fest Hall the Saengerbund was opened by Rossini's soul-stirring (!) overture to La Gazza Ladra. In this overture there is a movement in triple time, which is one of the most graceful and vivid parts of that great representative of this (!) Italian school. The other orchestral parts were the march from "The Prophet," a divertissement by Wallerstein, and Weber's ever welcome overture to Euryanthe. The march from "The Prophet" was marred by being taken too slow and by the absence of that massive grandeur which should be its distinguishing feature. The other orchestral pieces were given with a warmth and expression that fully upheld the high reputation of the orchestra. Those delicious woodland warblings in the "Euryanthe" were given with freshness and delicacy, and the baton of Mr. Sobelowsky held the orchestra of seventy performers in admirable order throughout. "The Singers' Greeting," sung by the Louisville societies, was the only vocal piece on the programme.

The old Central Committee of the Saengerbund presented the society's flags, through Mr. Dresel, to the new committee. Mr. A. Stein, the President, responded. The formal reception of the guests by Mayor Lithgow, of Louisville, then took place, and Professor Heilmann responded in fitting terms. At the close of his address the latter clasped the Mayor's hand, and turning to the audience, uttered the memorable words which have been adopted as the motto of Kentucky, "United we stand, divided we fall," thereby expressing the complete harmony which prevails between the Germans and other nationalities on the present occasion.

In spite of the heat about two thousand people were assembled in the hall.

THE EVENING CONCERT.

During the concert in the evening, Woodland Garden, a handsome and well shaded German resort, in the suburbs of the city, was crowded with the members of the Saengerbund. The garden was brilliantly illuminated, and the vast crowd seemed to abandon themselves completely to the magnetic influence of music, Rhine wine and lager beer. In many of the streets festoons and arches of evergreens are stretched across, and beaming countenances of unmistakable Teutonic origin are to be met at every corner. Austrians and Prussians meet on the neutral ground of music and harmony, forgetful that their brethren across the Atlantic are engaged in deadly strife. Even the juvenile portion of the community have become Teutonified, and march in impromptu procession, with paired tow paper for flags, screaming out phrases belonging to no language in particular.

To-morrow night the first grand vocal and instrumental concert will take place at the Fest Hall. The Saengerfest will finish up on Sunday with one of the grandest concerts ever given in America—namely, the best classical selections, interpreted by the full chorus and orchestra in the Mammoth Cave.

SECOND DAY—PRIZE CONCERT.

To-night the prize concert came off, and the immense Fest Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity; the coup d'œil from the spacious gallery was grand in the extreme. The eye ran along the mass of human heads beneath the brilliant illuminated stage, with its crowded tiers of singers, waving flags and banners. The "Willkommen," inscribed in letters of fire above, and the flutter of a thousand fans and the numerous (!) storms, calm and grandeur of the Tell overture, mingled with the scarcely suppressed hum of four thousand people. The orchestra, increased to day to one hundred pieces, was led by Messrs. SOBOLLEWAKI, HART and ZOELLER, and is by far the best feature of the festival. So far, the Tell overture, now a necessary feature on every (!) musical programme in America, was given with electrical effect, and had the good fortune of interesting the sweating audience sufficiently to bear up against one hundred degrees Fahrenheit in the hall. The following was the programme of the prize concert:

Overture, "William Tell," Rossini; Orchestra. "Nightly Wanderings," Fr. Abt; Cincinnati Maennerchor. "The Court of Justice," Zöller; Cincinnati Saengerbund. "The Beautiful Month of May," Zimmermann; St. Louis Ariop des Westens. "Stille," C. A. Weber; Wheeling Harmonia. "Waldabendschein," (dedicated to the Liederkrantz,) Fr. Abt; New York Liederkrantz. "Morning Dawn," H. Weyd; Sidney Liederkrantz. "Fruehlingslandschaft," Jul. Otto; Chicago Concordia. "Saenger Gruss," Fr. Abt; Cincinnati Harmonia. "O Sasz ich auf der Heide dort," F. Abt; Akron Liederkrantz. "Den Schoenen," A. Reinhart; West Cleveland Maennerchor. "Morgenlied," Fr. Abt; Indianapolis Maennerchor. "Staendeehen," Julius Otto; Nashville Turnerchor. "Well habe Ich Sie Geliebt," Evansville Liederkrantz. "Nachtlang Sehnsucht," Kreutzer; Wheeling Maennerchor. "Des Schiffers Traum," Fr. Abt; Columbus (Ohio) Maennerchor. "Der Frohe Wandersmann," Mendelssohn; Cincinnati Junger Maennerchor. Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

The judges of the prizes were Messrs. SOBOLLEWAKI, of St. Louis; BALATKA, of Chicago; WOLFSOHN and IRLICH of New York, and ZOELLER and HART, of Louisville. Of all the societies which took part in the above programme there were three particularly good. These were the New York Liederkrantz, A. PAUR, Director; the Cincinnati Maennerchor, CARL BARUS, Director, and the Chicago Concordia, OTTO LON, Director. The magnificent bass voice of Mr. STEIN contributed largely towards the success of the Fest. The tenor voices in the three societies are free from that nasal twang and metallic or harsh tone that spoils some of the best trained musical organizations. In OTTO's trifling piece, sung by the Chicago Concordia, there is a beautiful imitation of an organ accompaniment to the theme given by the chorus. It was sung with delicacy, and the harmony was exquisite. The applause which followed the efforts of the above named societies was deafening. The other societies showed remarkable training and proficiency, and in some instances an excellent quality of tenor and bass voices.

To-morrow night the remainder of the societies will compete for the handsome prizes which have been presented to the committee of the Saengerfest. The New York Liederkrantz, so far, bears away the palm in singing.

A grand torchlight procession followed the concert; and the societies, with music, banners, torches, &c., are passing through the principal streets. The singers and musicians taking part in the Saengerfest number over one thousand.

THIRD DAY—GRAND CONCERT OF SIX HUNDRED SINGERS IN FEST HALL.

LOUISVILLE, July 26.—At a business meeting held this morning in the Fest Hall on the affairs of the Saengerfest, it was resolved that the next annual festival of the North American Saengerbund be held at Indianapolis. The great event of the present festival took place at the hall this evening. A great concert with six hundred singers, supported by an orchestra of one hundred performers, led by Edward Sobolewski, and consisting of the choicest gems of the classic school, drew together a densely packed audience. The heat was oppressive, but the programme, and the rendering of it, more than compensated for all.

The Overture to Egmont, though not rendered with that warmth and thorough precision it received at THOMAS' last symphony soirée, showed enough of the heroic element to make it acceptable. MENDELSSOHN's address to the artists was sung with little fire or soul, but in MOHR's glorious Lied the immense chorus warmed up to the spirit of the composer. At one time, like the distant hum of the whirlwind, instruments and voices obeyed the baton of the director.

One of the most beautiful passages we have ever heard occurs in this piece. CARL WOLFSOHN did full justice to the Concerto of Beethoven. In the Isabel (?) overture the oboe were again prominent, and the finale, consisting of the English national anthem, was massive and grand. The second (what?), being by Mendelssohn, introduces us to that wonderful masterpiece of nature on the Island of Staffa. In the opening we approach cautiously and hear mysterious sounds from the Basaltic (?) billows, between which the waves dash into the recesses of the cavern; then the various instruments of the orchestra repeat the echoes of little themes which spring up like bubbling rills. As we advance, dream-like melodies, strange and eccentric figures and sudden bursts of discord greet the explorer on his journey, while underneath, far down in the depths of the orchestra, there is a tremulous motion alternately swelling and diminishing like the ceaseless rise and fall of the ocean. The succeeding vocal piece, "The Battle of Spirits," was happily chosen and placed. One part of this extraordinary composition contains as much Walpurgisnacht devilry in it as come from the hands of the composers of the Freischütz, Robert le Diable, or Harold. The execution—orchestral and choral—was all that could be desired. The brilliant and showy overture to Robespierre, which is a perfect photograph (!) of the days of the barricades, was received with an outburst of genuine enthusiasm. The magic wand of the director causes to pass before us the gloomy Bastille, the mutterings of the Revolution, and the outbreak and the attack, with its rattling of mitraille, pas de charge, shouts of triumph and defiance, cries for mercy, groans of the dying, the Place de Greve and its hideous paraphernalia of death; and lastly, the soul-stirring Marseilles Hymn, crowned with fantastic wreaths of violin, viola and flute passages.

The other pieces were splendidly sung, and the concert was one of which the West may well feel proud. The numerous visitors from the East were surprised to find such an incontestible evidence of the progress of music on this side of the Alleghenies.

[We find the above in a Pittsburg (Pa.) paper, and copy it as the only report of the Fest which has yet come to hand. We must confess, some of it, particularly what is said of those "choicest gems of the classic school" in the account of the third day, is slightly bewildering.]

A German View of Musical Histories.

No field of history has been so sparingly cultivated up to the present time as the history of music. The most voluminous works we Germans possess on the subject (such as those by Brendel, Reissmann, Schlüter, &c.) although written in an independent spirit, are either so sketchy, or so little indebted to due research, that the desire for an exhaustive and satisfactory treatment of the matter has never been gratified. In the last century, Forkel commenced a comprehensive history of music, but, unfortunately, did not bring it to a conclusion, discontinuing it on the threshold of modern times, that is, exactly at the point it began to be interesting. A recent undertaking, the History of Music, by Ambros, has only reached the second volume. The progress of this book, which affords evidence of great diligence, of laudable profundity, and of rare acquisitions, is far too slow, considering the impatience with which its completion is awaited. Foreign countries can certainly boast of valuable historical works on music, but these works are generally on special subjects. The Italians (Pater Martini, for instance) have written the musical history of Italy; the English (Hawkins, Burney, Jones, and Busby) that of England, &c. Some authors, moreover, have tried their hand at the history of church music and of oratorio, of opera and of musical pieces, of songs and national melodies, in separate monographies, and modern musical literature is rich in admirable biographical works. Still all these preliminary labors are not yet sufficient to give us a picture, in all respects exhaustive, of the history of music, especially the music of Germany. While for France the matter for a history of music is concentrated in Paris, and for England in London, in Germany it is dispersed through hundreds of channels. All the large, small, and petty capitals, all the Imperial and commercial cities, have their separate musical histories. The arrangements, the customs, the progress of all these cities great and small, display an infinite variety. In one, there is no concentration; in another, everything hurries forward by independent paths of its own. The musical history of the villages of Germany is endlessly diversified, and contains a large store of experience and interesting observation. Up to the present moment but little has been done for Germany in the way of such special musical histories. We have the history of the theatres of Ham-burgh, Lübeck, Berlin, Brunswick, Leipzig, Gotha, Dresden, Vienna, Nuremberg, Würzburg, Manich, Mannheim, Darmstadt, &c.; and an attempt has been made to write a history of music and the drama in Prussia. The various musical papers, as well as Chrysander's Jahrbücher, have, in their particular way, contributed by no means an unimportant amount of information. But all this does not suffice. Before it is possible to write an exhaustive history of music in Germany it will be necessary to have the special musical history of the more considerable capitals and Imperial cities (let the reader think for a moment of Nuremberg and Augsburg.) As far as Bavaria is concerned, a happy beginning has been made. In obedience to commands from a high quarter, Dr. Mettenleiter, of Regensburg, has, for years past, been collecting materials for a musical history of Bavarian towns, and the first fruits of his labors, The History of Music in Regensburg,* are now before us. Any one casting merely a cursory glance over such a work has no conception what courage, what devotion, what patient self-denial such an undertaking requires; what preparatory studies and wearisome research it demands. The work just mentioned gives us, in four parts or divisions, the musical history of the celebrated old town. The first two parts contain the theoretical works treating of music generally, and those treating of liturgical music especially; the two others, the practical application of the theoretical principles to sacred and mundane purposes. We are supplied with detailed information of all musical works originated in Regensburg, and still to be found there; of all composers who were born, and who worked, there; of the arrangements regarding church-music; of the practice of music in the schools; of dramatic and of concert music; of the town musicians, and, in a word, of everything relating to music. In addition to this, a mass of false and doubtful facts are set right; deficiencies made good; and unknown matter brought to light. The author, who himself possesses an invaluable musical library, has taken advantage of all the means within his reach, including archives, public and private collections, and even hawkers' stalls. He gives us, and desires to give us, only materials and authentic documents, as contributions for future works. For this reason, he refrains as much as possible from opinions and additions of his own. Many readers might, probably, have preferred a continuous narrative, but, even in its present shape, the book is not without some highly attractive portions. Among these I would more especially include the warm and enthusiastic description of the life, the travels, and the labors, of that most meritorious investigator, Dr. X. Proske. One thing that is somewhat objectionable in the earlier parts is a certain prominent employment of Latin. A great many readers, especially musicians, will not understand it, and, consequently, be unable to benefit by the interesting information it contains. However desirable it may be to retain old codices in the original language, it is an indisputable fact, that, if the book is to find its way among, and be understood by, a large circle of readers, there should always be a faithful translation, and great caution in the use of Latin flourishes. What I most especially miss in the book is a catalogue of the German Roman Catholic and Protestant Hymn Books printed and used in Regensburg. As church music constitutes a material part of the musical history of a town, and as, moreover, it is impossible to obtain a clear notion of the subject as long as we are not acquainted with its literature, it appears urgently desirable that, at some future time, a separate chapter should be devoted to it.—London Musical World.

Music Abroad.

London.

The musical season is over. The principal events of interest in the latter weeks of it were the revival of Mozart's exquisite opera (written on the eve of his marriage to his Constance), called originally "Cos-tanza e Belmonte," but now known as "The Seraglio," or Die Entführung aus dem Serail, of which we give an account on a preceding page; new triumphs of Adeline Patti, in a new character for her, the Catharine of Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord;—Mr. Benedict's annual monster concert, with all the famous singers and players that London can muster, and "47 pieces" in the programme (!);—and young Arthur Sullivan's concert with the distinguished aid of Mme. Goldschmidt and her husband. Of this last the Musical World of July 14 says:

Mr. Santley sang pieces by Gounod and Sullivan, and sang as he always sings—in other words, superbly, receiving and accepting a loud and unanimous encore for the latter's quaint and charming "Mistress mine;" but the extraordinary attraction was not Mr. Santley. Mlle. Mehlig played J. S. Bach's concerto in C minor, for two pianofortes, with that solid English pianist, Mr. Franklin Taylor, and the Recollections of Ireland, by Moscheles, as a solo; but although she played brilliantly, and though, at the end of her second performance there was a loud call for the venerable composer, who was known to be in the room, and who responded to the call with all the alacrity of years gone by, the extraordinary attraction was neither Mlle. Mehlig nor Herr Moscheles. Nor was it Mr. Cummings and Miss Edith Wynne, who gave the lovely duet, "In such a night as this," from Mr. Sullivan's Kenilworth, and joined Mr. Santley in a trio. Nor was it even the new symphony in E of Mr. Sullivan, of the performances of which, at the Crystal Palace and St. James's Hall (by the Musical Society of London), we spoke at the time, and which, though hardly so well played as at the Crystal Palace, under Herr Manns, was admired more than ever, and found more than ever Mendelssohnian. The extraordinary attraction was neither more nor less than Madame Lind-Goldschmidt—"Jenny Lind." Not only is there magic still in that name, but there is magic still in that voice; and the occasions, few and far between, which the lovers of music have enjoyed of hearing this most accomplished artist—"greatest of singers in all styles," as Mendelssohn used to say of her—since she formally took leave of the public, are seized upon with avidity. Mme. Lind-

Goldschmidt sang four pieces on Wednesday night, and the audience, enchanted, would have listened with satisfaction to each of the four pieces twice. Madame Goldschmidt, however, received the tribute to her genius with the dignified affability of one who, knowing her own worth, is at the same time pleased at the recognition of it; but she was content to give each piece set down for her in the programme once, wherein she set an example which others might imitate with advantage. Her first songs were two by Mr. Sullivan; "Sweet day," a new setting of some verses "altered from George Herbert," and the Shakspeare song, "Orpheus with his lute made trees," which it has been several times our agreeable task to praise. Mr. Sullivan accompanied these himself on the pianoforte, and thus enjoyed a special opportunity of judging what effect could be made out of his music by the most perfect singing, perfect alike in expression and in vocalization. But great as she was in Sullivan, Madame Goldschmidt was still greater in Handel. How she can sing the music of Il Penseroso in general, and the recitativo and air, "Sweet bird," in particular, amateurs were made aware, not very long since, at St. James's Hall. Nothing more engaging, nothing more earnest, nothing more dramatic can be imagined. On Wednesday night, if possible, her delivery of this picturesque scena (in which the flute obligato part was admirably sustained by Mr. A. Wells, of the Crystal Palace orchestra) exhibited more poetical feeling and more consummate technical skill than when last we heard it. The shakes, in one or two instances, were prolonged almost out of measure, but then they were so faultless, so close, so "pearly," and so exquisitely rounded off, that to complain would have been hypercritical. Almost equal in interest to her "recital" of Handel's scena was Madame Goldschmidt's unaffected, and touchingly expressive reading of the "old English ditty," called "The Three Ravens," of which the Russian poet, Puschkin, has published a translation in the form of an original. Such ballad-singing, so studiously simple and, at the same time, so finished, is rare; and the applause that followed was as hearty, spontaneous and general as that awarded to the more marvellous execution of the great air from Il Penseroso.

The concert opened with Professor Sterndale Bennett's beautiful and always welcome overture, Die Naiaden; the first part ended with an overture to a MS. opera (The Sapphire Necklace) by Mr. Sullivan; and the whole terminated with the "brisk dance" from his Kenilworth, all of which pieces were extremely well played by the very fine orchestra under the direction of the concert giver.

Herr Otto Goldschmidt played a pianoforte-part, composed by himself, to the air from Il Penseroso.

NATIONAL MUSICAL EDUCATION.—The Musical Education Committee of the Society of Arts, which was appointed to consider the state of musical education in the United Kingdom, have agreed to their first report. They have obtained full information of the constitution, present state, and working of the Royal Academy of Music; and have obtained evidence on the National College of Music, the London Academy of Music, and the London Vocal Academy. They have received a report, also, on the military school of music, Kneller Hall. On the subject of Church music the committee have been in correspondence with the deans and chapters of the several cathedral churches; and through the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, reports have been obtained of the regulations of the several academies at Paris, Munich, Vienna, Prague, Leipzig, Milan, Naples and Berlin. The Secretary of the Society of Arts was dispatched to Brussels and Liège, in order to report on the musical institutions there, and in respect of the Royal Academy of Music, Sir George Clerk, Bart., Chairman of the Committee of Management, and Mr. Lucas, principal of the Academy, have given evidence. The views of the musical profession have been stated by the following gentlemen, who have kindly responded to the invitation of the committee, and have either appeared personally before the committee or favored them with written observations:—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Benedict, Mr. Costa, M. Garcia, Mr. A. F. Godfrey, Mr. J. Hullab, Mr. Henry Leslie, Mr. C. Lucas, Mr. G. A. McFarren, Sir F. Gore Ouseley, Mr. Ernst Pauer, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, Mr. Turle, and Dr. Wyldo. The committee also acknowledge valuable evidence and suggestions which they have received from Sir George Clerk, Messrs. Capes, Harry Chester, H. F. Chorley, Cole, C. B., P. Le Neve Foster, and B. St. John Joule. The committee have not considered it within their province to enter upon the subject of the various systems of teaching music. Their inquiries have rather been directed to ascertaining the principles and the nature of the administration by which the general musical education of the people of this country may be systematically conducted on a scale and with results at least equal to those of the academies which flourish on the continent. They first turned their attention to the Royal Academy of Music as being the institution best calculated to serve as the basis for any enlarged national institution for promoting musical education, and had the satisfaction of finding the utmost willingness on the part of the Royal Academy to adopt whatever course might be necessary to improve its organization and render it thoroughly efficient. The committee consider that adequate parliamentary funds, with ministerial responsibility for their expenditure, are essential to the establishment and maintenance of a national academy of music worthy of its object. A national academy should afford gratuitous education to a limited number of persons having great musical gifts, who, after proper training at the public expense, would engage to devote their talents to the service of the public as professors of the art of music, and the form in which parliamentary assistance could be best afforded, it is thought, would be by scholarships, which should be held by candidates who, in open competition, had proved that they are endowed with the gift of musical ability. Besides the training of free scholars the academy should also be open to the public at large on the payment of adequate fees. As soon as the institution shall have obtained public confidence, it is hoped that the cathedrals and various other corporations will provide the means of sending, from their respective localities to the academy, young persons of musical genius, and the committee recommend that the Society of Arts should itself set the example of such endowments by establishing a limited number of scholarships. The committee consider, however, that before Parliament can be asked to increase its present vote to the Royal Academy of Music, the academy should provide, through the voluntary aid of the public, permanent and suitable premises, possessing all requisite facilities for practice and study. It is suggested that application should be made for a site on the Kensington Gore estate. Probably three years must elapse before convenient and ample premises can be built even after the funds are obtained, and as, in the meantime, the academy is obliged to vacate its present premises in Tenterden-street, and is seeking to obtain temporary shelter elsewhere, the committee consider that every effort should be made in the meantime by the Academy to enlarge its basis of action and to establish an effective system of responsible administration. This can be secured only by the appointment of a director, of proved administrative ability, entrusted with full authority. When the public are satisfied with the promise of an efficient academy, it may be expected that they will contribute towards the erection of suitable premises.

The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says of our London concert season. "The most brilliant, that is to say, the most profitable concerts are not given by the most important artists but by the best patronized teachers. The former only enter into the concerts given by the Societies or by single entrepreneurs; for this they are paid, and according to the measure of their reputation earn their money. This reputation grows with the years, not with the abilities of the artists: on the contrary an artist in England is often most celebrated when he has been known for the last twenty years, and his abilities are waning." Of a lately given benefit concert the correspondent thus writes: "If patience be genius Benedict is the greatest genius of the century. I heard him years ago in a great lord's house conduct an amateur society composed of live duchesses, marchionesses, and other inheritors of the best blood. The ladies sang in inverse proportion to their rank: the more nobility the more wrong notes; and there sat Benedict with a delighted face. Nay more—he had studied all the pieces; and he, the man who has lived in England for the last 30 years and there won his reputation and fortune, had the heavenly patience to sit with enraptured countenance teaching these high-born ladies septets, accompanying them, and never for one moment thinking, 'Perdition take them all! I will rather live on a couple of groschen a day in Germany and enjoy good music in my old age than perform such Sisyphean-work!' But Benedict doubtless rose next morning much fresher than I, and bowed down to Brighton, there to teach in a boarding school; and whereas my ears still quivered with the recollection of these false 'highborn' notes of the evening before, he would be taking in so many more as to forget aristocratic in middle-class torments; and in the evening he would sit down to compose a cantata with the most tranquil mind, as of a man who only listened to perpetual harmonics."

The Royal Operahouse closed its doors on the 17th of June for the season, with Cherubini's Deux Journées, or Wasserträger, as it is here denominated. Mlle. Dillner, a young lady with a pleasing, albeit somewhat harsh voice, sang the part of Marcelline; Mlle. Horina, that of the Countess; and Herr Krause that of Micheli.

One of the most interesting events of the past season, as far as true art is concerned, was the revival of Antigone, with Mendelssohn's magnificent music. If the late king had never done aught else to preserve his memory from oblivion, the fact that it was he who suggested Sophocles' work to Mendelssohn, would be sufficient to prevent his name from being so soon forgotten by those who have a feeling for what is great and beautiful. All honor to him for the part, though simply suggestive, which he had in the work. The piece was performed and sung "excellently well." Herr Taubert conducted the choruses and the orchestra admirably. The only person I did not like was Madame Jachmann, but truth compels me to add that the rest of the spectators were not of my opinion, for they applauded her vehemently.

I wish I could chronicle the production of a few new operas. But unfortunately for Germany, and the world too, Mendelssohn's, and Meyerbeers, and Webers, and Beethovens, and a host of such like giants, are not to be found every day. Musical productivity, as the Germans themselves term it, appears temporarily to have become extinct, or at any rate to be slumbering, for I do not take into account the lucubrations of Herr Richard Wagner, Herr Hans von Bülow, et hoc genus omne.

Among the débutantes, I may mention Mlle. Lina Frieh, the daughter of Madame Frieh-Blumauer, a very favorite actress at the Theatre-Royal. She made her first appearance as Aennchen in Der Freyschütz. Her second character was that of Henriette in Le Macon; her third, that of Zerlina in Fra Diavolo; her fourth, that of Marzeline in Fidelio. She possesses a pleasing voice, which has evidently been well-trained. Her acting, as was to be expected, is very amateurish. Still she evidently has talent and will prove, I should say, a valuable acquisition, when practice shall have given her confidence, softened down certain asperities, and supplied certain shortcomings. Another fair aspirant for operatic honors was Mlle. Börner, who sustained the parts of Agatha, Elizabeth, and Bertha, in Der Freyschütz, Tannhäuser, and Le Prophète respectively. Yet another was Mlle. Bähr, who appeared in the last named opera as Fides, and a remarkably cold and impassive Fides she made. And now, having mentioned some of the débutantes, I must inform you that two very popular ladies have left us. These are Mlle. Leontine Gericke and Mlle. Santer. Mlle. Gericke has married a Berlin tradesman or merchant—render the word Kaufmann which way you choose—and retires altogether from the stage. She selected for her last performance the first act of Les Huguenots, the third act of Der Freyschütz. She was greatly applauded, and overwhelmed with bouquets in the course of the evening, and, after the fall of the curtain, the stage-manager, Herr Hein, presented her with a silver fruit dish or salver, from the members of the company. The King, too, made her a present of a magnificent bracelet. Mlle. Santer does not leave the stage, but has accepted an engagement at the Royal Operahouse Dresden. Her husband is a Herr Blume, formerly an officer in the army, but now a music-master.

Music on the Common.

We were just calling our thoughts to order to resume the discussion of this summer topic, when we were much pleased to meet the following good suggestion in the Daily Advertiser of last Wednesday morning, which for the present turns us aside a little from the main question: What would be the best kind of music for the people in the open air, and how may it best be organized and administered at public cost? But the special point here raised may throw some light upon the general problem. Thus saith the Advertiser:

It has been proposed in the Board of Aldermen, that one of the performances of music on the Common should be a performance of sacred music on the afternoons of Sunday, through the summer. The motion was lost, for what reason we do not know and cannot guess. A city which permits the performance of sacred music for money on Sunday, has in that permission recognized it as a work of mercy or necessity. It is quite too late then, to pretend that such a performance breaks in on the proper observances of the day. The only questions are, whether poor people who do not choose to go into music halls, shall have the same advantage in this direction as rich people who do choose; and whether in those months when churches and music halls are uncomfortable from heat, the community may not profit by sacred music in the open air.

We suppose, therefore, that the defeat of the proposed Sunday performance was a measure of economy. What was proposed was that one of the two weekly performances of the band, paid for by the city, should take place on that day when ten times as many people can profit by it as on any other day,—when they would come to it not fatigued, but in a condition to enjoy it,—and that instead of polkas, waltzes, and quick-steps, the performance should consist of sacred music, to be selected by the highest authorities. It seems that the majority of the Board of Aldermen have that fondness for the more frivolous music of the bands, and that dread of those grave compositions which for near two thousand years have been united with worship in almost all Christian communions, that they have decided to have twice as many dancing tunes as was proposed, and, at the city charge, no sacred music at all. So far have we fallen back from the standard of Puritanism.

The decision of the aldermen may be considered final, as far as they are concerned. It is well known that they do not readily abandon a decision respecting the public grounds. We would suggest, however, to those gentlemen who are interested in this plan for simple and general worship in the open air, that it will be easy to carry it out without an appropriation from the city.

No subscription paper would be so easily filled as one for an hour's sacred music on the Common before sunset on Sundays. There can be no conceivable objection made by anybody. Military bands play what they choose on Sunday, where they choose, without asking leave of any one. A band has only to choose to play some passages from Handel, Beethoven and Bach on the Common. Again, there is no ordinance yet to prevent a gentleman from whistling on the Common or from playing the flute there, or the trombone or the bass drum. And if a number of gentlemen happen to play these instruments together and in harmony, on Sunday afternoon, we apprehend that no objection will be made by anybody.

We trust we may have the pleasure of announcing the arrangements for such a sacred concert.

The idea is in the main good, if somewhat crude and undeveloped. We may consider the question whether such concerts are compatible with the proper observance of the Sabbath as sufficiently disposed of. Music there will be, in some form or other, in public or in private, in concert halls and theatres or out of doors, on that day, as on all days. If not sacred music, then profane (not scrupling to take the name of "sacred"); if not serious, inspiring, edifying music, then frivolous, dissipating music; if not the music of Art and Feeling and Religion, then that of trade and money-making, catering to lower tastes, to paying audiences and fashions. It is much better to assume the fact, that music, outside of formal public worship, there will and must be upon Sundays, and to study how to have it good—part of the soul's life which we try to realize upon that day of rest from trade and selfishness.

To the great mass of toil-worn mortals, seeking air and freedom, the evening hours of Sunday are the one opportunity: how shall it be improved? By giving them music of the right kind, rightly executed. All will depend, first on the selection of the pieces, the making up of programmes, and then on the efficiency of the band or orchestra.

1. It is a great thing in favor of this plan that the very name and day suggested are in themselves some pledge that the music performed shall at least not be frivolous, not of a mere ad captandum, clap-trap, dissipating character. Something better than noisy, startling effect, which soon gets to be tame and humdrum from the very frequency as well as intrinsic shallowness thereof; something more serious and more elevating than dance tunes, more wholesome and refreshing than sentimental airs and arranged scenes or medleys from sensational Italian operas, with cornets and tubas caricaturing (as if that were not superfluous) the languishing strains or would-be passionate bursts of Messieurs Tenore, Baritone, &c., might be expected in such concerts and on such a day. And yet the term "sacred concerts" has been so abused that we own to a strong prejudice against it; one may well be sceptical about any entertainment which offers itself under that name. Concerts are called sacred simply to save appearances and to conciliate the letter of the law—an old, and as we shall doubtless learn when we become more civilized and enough more truly religious not to be afraid to act naturally and honestly and dare to be genial and happy on the Lord's day, an absurd law. They are called sacred, but the music, much of it, is anything but sacred, spiritual, or even such as interests the higher feelings or the holier imagination. Judging by the custom of the times, we have not much assurance that the term "sacred" would be used with more sincerity in Sunday concerts on the Common than in those whose singular programmes in theatres and halls have long since ceased to be singular.

Practically, artistically, it would be almost impossible to make up a programme of band music out of sacred music in the most exclusive sense, that is to say, of such pieces as were composed for the church and have no associations save with some religious service. The varieties and contrasts, the progressive interest of an oratorio, a mass, a sacred cantata, or even an anthem—how are these possible with a mere brass band! A whole hour or two of only chorales or psalm-tunes, one grave Adagio after another, would certainly be wearisome and provoke comments in a mood not particularly religious—only heartier perhaps than affected, feigned religion. There would need to be, of course there would be, a wider range in the selections. Pieces not written for religious uses, serious, inspiring, elevating music not made for Sunday more than any other day, extracts from symphonies, operas, &c., would have to come in. Better, therefore, drop a name which has become so conventional and insincere, and only see to it that we secure the real thing; call them simply Concerts on the Common—Sunday concerts, if you please—but do not call them "Sacred;" for if you do, the chances are that they will be very far from sacred. Let the selections be made with taste and judgment, on the principle of intrinsic fitness, with a view to what is elevating, pure, quickening to the higher and the holier sentiments, as well as refreshing and captivating to the sense, and it will be no matter about the name. But in all things we endanger sincerity, and therefore sacredness, by profession. The Advertiser's plan, however, meets this difficulty by the suggestion that the selections be controlled by the best authorities—if these could only be with any unanimity or sure discretion pointed out, and then won to the ungrateful task!

2. As to the means of performance. The brass band seems to be our fatality. Thin, monochromatic, noisy, coarse little energetic fuss and feathery band of sixteen brass instruments, all of the Sax family, brazen throats made to cut through and overbear the confused din of the streets, and yet by the emasculate contrivance of valves taught to sing as it were a poor kind of falsetto, caricaturing softer instruments and human voices in a sentimental, vulgar and affected way! This seems to be all that Municipal economy affords the people in the way of bands; and, in fact, nearly every other form of band has disappeared. But it has its uses, for which it is very good. It is good for military parades in streets. It is good for certain kinds of music, good when it does not strain itself to do too much,—for instance, ape Italian Opera on the Common. And fortunately for this Sunday plan, there is nothing for which a choir of brass instruments is better fitted than for plain, solid harmonized Chorales. Even the bands of sixteen can render these effectively. It would be much better, of course, out in the open air, if the number could be quadrupled,—preference being given to the honest, manly, native brass sound over nondescript valve tones. Good old Lutheran Chorales, well arranged, might form a considerable part, in fact the staple of the programmes. And even the Advertiser's suggestion of the name of Bach will not seem so wide of the mark, when we consider that Bach's arrangements of the Chorales are the most perfect models of four-part harmony that exist, and that no one has so brought out the beauty, the grandeur, the soul's depth, the tenderness and piety of those old tunes as he has in these masterly arrangements. They are difficult for voices, but they would not be so for instruments—would our bands only consent to resolve themselves for the time being into four parts, like a chorus of mixed voices! We are sure, such pure, sincere music, once grown a little familiar, would win upon the popular heart.

Chorales and psalm-tunes would not be enough alone. There is plenty of other music, kindred or compatible in spirit, very various in form and momentary mood and tempo, to be drawn from both so-called sacred and secular sources, which would be available. Even the Opera—such operas at least as Mozart, Gluck, Beethoven wrote—affords some of the holiest moments in the whole history of musical creation. Some of the priest's music in the "Magic Flute," for instance, is quite as spiritual and sacred as that of the Requiem, and was the product of the same months and the same state of mind in which Mozart wrote the latter. Some of this, and some of the solemn, stately harmonies of Gluck, are practicable enough for brass bands.

The range could be profitably extended, could there only be brought together for these occasions a much larger band, with proper blending of softer instruments, clarinets, oboes, flutes, bassoons, French horns, &c., with quant. suff., and no more, of those of brass and of percussion.

Then even the Chorale might be illustrated, varied, made picturesque, in the way that we have witnessed on the Organ in those so-called "Choral Vorspiele" of Bach. With the reeds and flutes for flowing accompaniment, and the brass for the chorale proper, the effect might be fine. Then of course larger compositions of various kinds, movements from Oratorios and Masses, serious Overtures, edifying parts of Symphonies, &c., &c. might be reproduced with some truth and delicacy, not offensively caricatured as such things are by mere brass bands. But this brings us back to our old idea of a "Civic Band," under municipal patronage, of which we shall have more to say. Meanwhile think of such a band as a correspondent tells us of below.

Music in the Public Schools.

Most of the music in our city, since our last, has been made by the boys and girls in the public schools. Musical exercises entered more or less into the annual examinations and exhibitions of the separate schools during the last month. In each school, besides the exercises in reading, grammar, geography, &c., a part of the time was occupied by an exemplification of Mr. Mason's admirable method of training children, both in the Primary and Grammar Schools, to sing and read and understand simple written music; or by a most convincing specimen of the "Vocal Gymnastics" as administered by Mr. Munroe in person, or through the teachers he has taught; or by pleasing results of both, shown in numerous choruses, trios and songs sung at refreshing intervals under the direction of Mr. Sharland, who has been following up the good work of Mr. Mason in the Grammar Schools, and, by a well-chosen collection of pieces, which has grown together from the fresh needs of this very practice, together with his own skill in piano accompaniment and tact as a teacher, has produced in many of the schools very satisfactory part-singing, in which hundreds of children partake with good ensemble. We have no doubt, one result of the exhibitions this year,—while they have shown a vast improvement generally in our public school education, and a fine cheerful spirit of coöperation between teachers and pupils, all happy in their work and full of beautiful enthusiasm, and while taste, imagination, something like æsthetic culture is more and more insinuating itself into the dry methods, making school attractive—has been to convince crowds of intelligent spectators of the practicability and the blessing of music taught as a regular branch in all our schools.

If further confirmation were needed, it was found in the annual School Festival at the Music Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, July 24.

This was a musical festival on essentially the same plan which has worked so satisfactorily for some years past, and for which the whole community is so much indebted to the wisdom, ingenuity and perseverance of the musical portion of the School Committee, who have gradually leavened nearly the whole lump. This time it was even better than before; practice makes perfect, and the organization of the singing by twelve hundred girls and boys, with their stage arrangements, their entrances and their exits, has now grown into an easy working habit. We need not describe the beautiful spectacle again; it can never fail to be inspiring; what little we have room to say must relate to the exercises. The order thereof was improved by making the musical selections more varied, reducing the proportion of grave choral-singing, and by allotting less space to addresses; only three were made, and these were all appropriate and brief: the opening one by the chairman of the festival committee, Mr. Story, another by Hon. Richard Warren of

New York, and finally a few words by his Honor Mayor Lincoln, after the presentation of the bouquets to the medal scholars.

After an organ prelude by Mr. SHARLAND and an invocation by the Chaplain of the day, Mr. ZERRAHN raised his baton, calling the twelve hundred upon their feet, and one of the Chorales used by Mendelssohn in "St. Paul" was sung in unison, the Organ alone supplying harmony. The unison between voices and organ was not quite perfect, but the mass of vocal tone was full, clear, well-sustained. The discrepancy of pitch vanished when the orchestra accompanied in the National Hymn of Holland, which was interesting but not so imposing as the Russian or the English hymn.

Probably no piece gave so much pleasure as the Trio, or three-part Chorus, by Rossini, sung by the pupil of the Girls' High and Normal School (who are under Mr. Zerrahn's special instruction), and sung with beautiful blending and shading of fresh, pure, sweet voices, with one of those finely figurative orchestral accompaniments with which the inexhaustible fancy of that genial Italian blossoms out so readily. We may suggest more choruses from Rossini, especially some in the first act of "Tell"; for instance that delicious and yet serious, tender wedding chorus—The "Image of the Rose," a more extended piece, Cantata-like, by Reichardt, pleased by its smooth melodious quality. "Over the Billows," from Mr. Kielblock's "Miles Standish," a ringing, buoyant sailor chorus, with a prayerful choral episode, and quite ingenious orchestration, made a very good effect.

Then came an intermission of a few minutes, during which the babble (Babel) of young voices, suddenly set loose, was multitudinous as the sea, and had a strangely mingled, fascinating music of its own, of which the outline would be hard to seize. A friend asked us if that sound could not be translated or reproduced in actual musical composition; for rhythmical it surely was. And lo! the other day we chanced to open on a piano-forte piece—only in two parts too—the flickering rapid figure of which palpably recalled to us that infinite babblement of young mountain brook-like voices. Turn to Cramer's Etudes, the one numbered 26 in Köhler's "Classical High School for Pianists," and there you have the phenomenon mirrored to the life, if you can only play the piece clear and fast enough!

"The Heavens are telling," from the Creation, was the great piece—of course the orchestra and organ supplied the lower parts of the harmony. It was sung in a manner to show that music is not taught for nothing in our schools. All that remained, after the presentation and the Mayor's Address, was "Old Hundred," in the last verse of which the audience joined. The singing on the whole was superior to that of past years; and both in the style of rendering the music and in voice delivery, in average power and quality of voices, the teachings of Messrs. Mason, Sharland and Munroe already show good fruits.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Brass Band Question.

MR. EDITOR:—In your paper of the 21st, I read an article containing some very pleasant suggestions in regard to the music on the Common. Every lover of good music must concur with your idea, that a coarse brass band of the street pattern is entirely inadequate to render the better kind of music effectively. On a visit to Germany last year, I had the satisfaction of listening to some superior performances of regimental bands there. I was several weeks in the city of Hesse-Cassel, and the performances of the band of the Guards there were something truly admirable. I took a memorandum at the time, of what instruments it was composed; the original having been mislaid, however, I must try to supply the information from memory. As well as I can recollect, the combination of instruments ran thus:

Bass Saxhorns.....	4
Bass Trombones.....	2 of the good old slide pattern.
Tenor Trombones.....	3

French Horns.....	4
Cornets à piston.....	4
Bassoons.....	4
Soprano and Alto Clarinets.....	10
Oboes.....	4
Flutes.....	3
Piccolo.....	1
	39
Bass Drum.....	1
Small Drums.....	2
Cymbals (pairs).....	2
Triangle.....	1
Total.....	45

The combination of such a variety of instruments indeed seems admirable. The light and shade and instrumental effects are almost orchestral. As a proof of what such a band is capable, allow me to mention some compositions which I heard those artists perform. Overtures to "Der Freyschütz," "Jes-sonda," "Egmont," "Siege of Corinth," "Tannhäuser" (!); also an entire act from Lohengrin, the fourth act from the Huguenots, and many other excellent compositions which I noted down in my diary. It would indeed be a pleasure to hear such music performed on the Common by a full Reed Band. If people had opportunity to listen to bands of that kind, they would most probably lose their love for the noisy and coarse brass bands now so generally in vogue.

Boston, July 26.

E. H.

NEW HAVEN. The Mendelssohn Society (writes a correspondent) gave Haydn's "Creation," entire, on the 11th ult., with the assistance of Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mr. J. Whitney, tenor, Mr. M. W. Whitney, bass, and an efficient orchestra, mostly from New York. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. W. D. Anderson. The solo singers (well known in Boston) gave universal delight; the chorus never did better, and the audience were aroused to a degree of enthusiasm seldom seen in New Haven.

MR. A. W. THAYER, who is Consul at Trieste, writes from that place: "I have had the first part of my manuscript Life of Beethoven translated into German, and it is in the hands of the printer. I have already had good reason to be pleased at having adopted this course, since my translator, who resides in Bonn, has been able to follow up my researches there, and discovered some valuable additions to my own materials, which my removal to this place, and confinement here by official duties, would have prevented me from doing myself. I have had two applications from England for leave to translate my Beethoven work. I reply that, as English is my native tongue, I prefer to send my own manuscript in my own style to press! As I read over the proof-sheets I am delighted with my translator, and, at the same time, astonished at the fine result of my long continued researches. Should you find any kind of allusions to Beethoven down as late as 1800 or 1805, please to note them for me. My official duties take up so much of my time as to prevent me from going on as I could wish with my literary labors, but 'hope on, hope ever.' The time must come when I can use all this material."

Mr. Santley, the English Baritone.

There is not much to be told of the career of Mr. Santley (writes an "esteemed correspondent" of the London Orchestra) beyond the fact that he is a Lancashire man, a native, I believe, of Liverpool—that he was first educated into music at home—that he formed part of the chorus of the Philharmonic Society there, if not of the orchestra; and that in the course of such training he got that general insight into music which is not always found—as our profession unhappily attests—among those educated in academies. From the first he was as remarkable for his manly and generous uprightness of character, and its probity, as for his beautiful voice and extraordinary musical intelligence. Means were found to send him to Italy for the cultivation of his voice. He placed himself at Milan under Signor Nava; and during his residence there as a student (a position which, morally as well as musically, has ruined many an Englishman and woman) gained the universal esteem of every one. His intention was to remain in Italy for awhile, and attempt his career on the stage of that country; but home-counsels from those who knew his solid musical acquirements and had tested his great vocal capabilities, decided him on returning to England at a very critical moment. Had he bound himself for a term of years to sing the rubbishing music of the modern Italian theatre, Europe might have lost its best singer of his class, and he might have fallen into those false habits of taste which the applause of bad things cannot fail to encourage. He decided on immediately returning to London, totally unknown there save to one person—Mr. Hullah (to whom the credit is due of always listening for novelty and doing his best to produce the same at his concerts at St. Martin's Hall), invited him to sing in the third act of "The Creation." It may be told that so little expectation had been excited on his behalf that the lady who had been "cast" for Eve to his Adam threw up the part. The singing of that one act decided Mr. Santley's future. There could be no mistake about it. Engagements of the first class, such as those of the Sacred Harmonic Society's oratorios, and at the concerts conducted at Manchester by Mr. Halle, followed rapidly as a necessary consequence to these engagements;—and at the provincial musical festivals. There is no keeping back one so richly endowed, so thoroughly prepared, and withal so simply superior to everything like back stairs work, as Mr. Santley from first to last has shown himself. As illustrating this thorough preparation, two facts may be put on record. Having been engaged to sing in "The Seasons" at Manchester, and having carefully studied the work—the Cantata was, of necessity, at the tenth hour changed for the Oratorio "St. Paul"—and in this he was able to appear with perfect honor to himself. At a late Norwich Festival—owing to a caprice it is not worth while to enter into—he had literally to appear in the orchestra in Spohr's "Last Judgment" at an hour's notice; never having sung that most ungracious of parts, and almost, it may be said, reading it at sight. Here are lessons for the lazy, and for those who are always prating of "their style." When it became time for him to attempt the stage in England, this was done, by Meyerbeer's express desire, in the English version of "Dinorah." There could be no doubt as to the manner in which he executed that most harassing music, but our critics sagely decreed that because he was then awkward, spiritless, and ill at ease as an actor, on his first appearance, and in so trying a part, he would never act. They have since known better; and if critics could feel shame (vide M. Gounod), must now look back on the past with blushes. Now, small credit to them, they cannot chorus too loudly a success with which their discrimination had nothing to do.

The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung continues its satirical comments on the London season. "Now we have a concurrence of German, French and English singers (who, except the week or two they have been here have never worked together in their lives), singing German and French operas in the Italian tongue. Funnily sounds this in their mouths, but often more funny is the music they sing. An Italian tenor who has never got beyond Bellini's sentimentality, or Verdi's noisiness, is called on suddenly to sing Tamino or Florestan—music which is wholly opposed to his capacities, and for which he has a thorough aversion. But he must sing it: it is so in the bond. He tries to manufacture a couple of effects, and Italianizes his part in such a way as to send a German musician's heart into his mouth. Next him perhaps is a melancholy German basso bursting himself in the effort to ape an Italian buffo. A German sentimental songstress is entrusted with the role which demands the warmest glow of southern passion; to-morrow, the Italian woman near her has to sing the Countess in 'Le Nozze di Figaro.' Here is an example:—In Her Majesty's Theatre, out of ten successive operas, one is pure Italian, say 'Norma;' while the rest, such as the 'Zauberflöte' and 'Freischütz,' are sung by Italians pur sang. In Covent Garden this week are announced 'Faust,' 'Don Juan,' 'L'Africaine,' 'L'Etoile du Nord,' and 'Lucrezia Borgia.' Where is ensemble to come out of all this? Where the proper execution of a role? Very far is the operatic public from answering the question. The beau monde demands not good music, but celebrated names; it only wants for its money the consciousness of looking at the same time on artists from every sphere. The 'swell' and the 'snob' are proud of London alone paying for those artists whom Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg and Vienna are only able to support in conjunction. And it is not to be denied that the names which one can read in a Covent Garden prospectus can be shown by no other programme in the world."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Give, oh, give. (Pietà, pietà.) from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer.

An intensely plaintive song, being that sung by poor Fides, while begging, partly for herself, and partly to gain the means to purchase a mass for the repose of the soul of her son, whom she supposed to be dead, although he was, just then, on the point of being crowned in the neighboring palace. It is for a Messo-Soprano or Alto voice. If you wish to sing something to make the tears start, try this.

A. most there. Ballad with Chorus. J. C. J. 30

A simple and touching song, containing the words of a dying child. The chorus is a farewell, with mention of the father, mother and brother, who are waiting on "the lily decked shore" of the River of Life. Easy.

Earth beneath your feet. Ballad. Dolores. 30

Dolores must sometimes compose de la-ro-se, and this is a sad song, but still a sweet one.

Sunrise. "Harmoniennes." Concone. 40

At the foot of Vesuvius. (An pied du Vésuve).

"Harmoniennes." Concone 40

For three female voices. Very melodious and useful pieces.

Sweet Nightingale. Boscowitch. 40

A very sweet song about the nightingale.

I love him, I dream of him. Song. Dolores. 30

Instrumental.

Forest Flower Waltz. Coote. 40

One of the author's characteristic productions; very easy, brilliant and pretty, and a valuable piece for teachers.

Romeo et Julie. (Moison d'or.) Alberti, Op. 28. 20

La Favorite. " " " " 20

Very pretty and easy, and give the taking parts of these opera melodies, just as well as longer and harder pieces.

Silver Wave Barcarolle. Geo. N. Allen. 30

Very pretty, and quite easy.

Mabel waltzes, for 4 hands. D. Godfrey. 1.00

These waltzes are already favorites, and this 4 hand arrangement adds something to the power and brilliancy, while it makes the music somewhat easier.

Amusement schottisch. E. W. Parker. 30

Very pretty, and easy, with triplets, short runs, and arpeggios.

Ye pretty birds. Transcription. W. Kuhe. 50

The famous song, which makes a very melodious piece, and is arranged with a great deal of taste. Moderately difficult.

Leland's opera waltz. L. Vese. 30

The familiar air of "Alleen aroon" will be recognized in this, which is, otherwise, quite pretty.

Juanita. "Sparkling diamonds." Arini. 30

Guard's waltz. "Rustic pictures." Baumbach. 30

Tyrolese march. (Swiss bell ringers). 35

Mc'Eicker's redowa waltz. 30

THE JUBILATE. By L. O. EMERSON, $1.38

A book which will stand along side of "The Harp of Judah" in internal worth, and may, very likely, equal it in circulation, since the music is in the same pleasing style, while it is almost entirely fresh and new. The multitudes who have used the former book, will need no great persuasion to try the new one.

Songs from the German.

[Translated for the recent Singer-Fest at Providence, by J. S. D.]

I.

THE SINGER'S GREETING.

O, still the strong old oaks are standing,
All sound at heart, and rooted fast;
Hark! with the rustling branches blending,
A greeting from th' heroic Past!
Ye leafy aisles, high arching o'er us,
Give answer back, in ringing chorus!

In storm and gloom

Lo! here a home;

Here Freedom's hearth, high blazing yet,
By Hermann's quenchless valor lit;
Here Faith's firm rock, and Love's retreat;
Here Song's perpetual abode!
Thy sacred dome with songs we greet:
O flourish long, thou green old wood!

Thee, too, starry-eyed young Maiden,
In the cottage small and neat,
Maiden modest, chaste, and sweet,
Pure as diamond, thee we greet!

Ev'ry wave of song is laden
With some lustrous pearls for thee;
Crowned with honor shalt thou be;
Love's divinest minstrelsy

Here at thy dear feet be laid!

And God bless thee, lovely maid!

Where, hand in hand, true men are meeting
For brothers' weal, for law, for right;
Where joyfully all hearts are beating,
As through the clouds out breaks the light;
Where strength and courage, bravely fighting,
A bleeding country's wrongs are righting;

Where, battle's done,

And victory won,—

There roars the German sea of song
In surging billows, deep and strong.
—Then, singers, sing with all your power.

Long live the Union of the Free!

And long remembered be the hour!

God bless thee, heart of Liberty!

II.

SONG OF UNION.

Why meet all the singers in gladsome array?
What means the high pledge of alliance?
For Fatherland's weal hold we council to-day,
Or in arms breathe to tyrants defiance?
Shall Germany now in her majesty rise,
The freest and happiest land 'neath the skies?

The word of To-day in our hearts cherish we:
Free Fatherland—be our endeavor!

But here we've a land that is already free,

A joy fairly won and forever;
And all who their voices and hearts here unite
Are peers of the realm and are equal in right.

So jubilant songs we together will sing,
And homage to Love duly render;
For she is the rosy-lipp'd Queen of the Spring,
And her's be the feast, full of splendor,
Who thrills with true fire this terrestrial ball
And sheds a bright halo of youth over all!

Soft strains full of yearning resound thro' the hall,
And heavenly harmonies ravish;
But 'tis not on Love's sweet enchantment that all

The wealth of our song we may lavish:—

A manlier Love, like the ocean, the air,

In mighty embrace clasps the good and the fair.

Hail, Ocean of Song! roll in might on the shore,

All nations in unity binding;

Thy sound never dies, to the stars shall it soar,

O'er the clouds true Elysium finding;

Lightly on thro' all time the sweet melody floats,

And joy borrows beauty and sense from its notes.

Mozart's "Il Seraglio."

When Mozart gave his first German opera to the world—on the 12th of July, 1782—he had scarcely completed the first half of his twenty-seventh year. Beethoven was a boy of twelve; sixteen years were to elapse before Haydn produced his Creation, and ten before the birth of Rossini. Gluck had relinquished active life, and was spending the remainder of his days in honored leisure at Vienna. The Emperor Joseph II., whom history has loved to represent as the pater et princeps, the præsidium et dulce decus, at once the Augustus and Mærenas of the arts, and especially of music—though in truth he could only appreciate and was only liberal to Italians—was the reigning potentate; and under his rule music flourished if musicians starved. Mozart had but just escaped the ignominious thralldom of the Erzbischof Sigismund Schrattenbach, to seek for what he obtained seven years later, a place at Court with modest appointments, serving the Kaiser in the interval as a cheap wonder-show, to be exhibited according to Imperial caprice, for such entertainment of such Imperial guests as might happen to care for music. That—as the late Alexander Oulibicheff, Mozart's Russian biographer and enthusiastic panegyrist, asserts—we owe Die Entführung to a strong desire on the part of Joseph II. that Germany as well as Italy should possess an independent lyric drama, and to the steps taken in consequence, is most likely true. The Letters, however, by no means warrant the positive assertion of Oulibicheff, that it was the Emperor himself who submitted to Mozart the operetta by Bretzner which Stephanie and the composer together moulded into the shape it ultimately assumed. In a letter from Mannheim (Jan. 10, 1778) we first read of Joseph's scheme for establishing a German Opera, and it was not till four years later that Mozart succeeded in gaining an interview with His Majesty. But without inquiring curiously into this matter, we may safely assume that to Joseph II. Germany and music are indebted more or less directly for the earliest German opera worthy the name.

"My opera was given again yesterday (and indeed at Gluck's request)"—writes Mozart to his father at Salzburg, Aug. 7, 1782. "Gluck paid me many compliments upon it. I dine with him to-morrow." The opera upon which the composer of Orfeo, Alceste, Armide, and the Iphigénies, two years after quitting Paris for ever, and five after the production of his greatest work, thus complimented the man who had already equalled, and in some respects surpassed him, was Die Entführung aus dem Serail, produced at Vienna about a month before the letter was written from which the above passages are * "Bei ihm ist nichts als Salieri"—writes Mozart, in his disappointment at not getting the Princess of Würtemberg for a pupil (Dec. 15, 1781).

† It was not till after the death of Hofcapellmeister Gluck (Nov. 15, 1787), that Mozart was appointed chamber musician (Kammermusiker), at an annual salary of 800 gulden. And yet Don Giovanni had been produced!

taken. Despite the Italian cabal which so insidiously and perseveringly intrigued against the far too promising young German, Die Entführung had obtained a genuine success with the public, and Gluck seems to have acquiesced in the public verdict. Whether the invitation to dinner may be accepted as a criterion of sincerity is hardly worth discussing, though it would be interesting to know much more than can be gathered from the Letters about the personal relations between the old king of lyric drama ("Der grosse Reformator der dramatischen Musik") and the rival destined to wear his crown before he had virtually abdicated. We should like, too, to be made acquainted with Mozart's own private opinion about Gluck's music, a point on which the composer of Don Giovanni is vexatiously reticent. In a letter dated March 12, 1783, however, we hear of more praises and another invitation to dinner. This was at a concert given by Madame Lange, the composer's sister-in-law, at which he played a concerto, Madame Lange sang an aria, and, adds Mozart, "Ich gab auch meine Sinfonie vom Concert Spirituel dazu"—or, as Lady Wallace translates it, "I also played the symphony I wrote for the Concert Spirituel" (vol. ii., page 183). Gluck, it appears, who was in a box near the one occupied by Mozart's wife and the Langes, could not praise the symphony and aria enough, and straightway invited the two couples to dine with him on the Sunday following. These manifestations of sympathy at least go far to prove that the two musicians were socially on pleasant terms with each other, and that the setting luminary was not in hostile antagonism to the rising one. It is a matter of surprise, indeed, to many that Gluck did not confide to Mozart, rather than to Salieri, the task of composing the grand opera called Les Danaïdes, which he had pledged himself to write for Paris, but which he abandoned at the last moment, as an undertaking beyond his powers. Perhaps some cynics may think that Mozart would have been too brilliant a deputy for the conqueror of Piccini; and perhaps they are not far wrong. It was easier to outshine Piccini than not to be eclipsed by Mozart. On the other hand, Salieri had taken lessons from Gluck, while Mozart had received lessons from no one of any account except his money-seeking father, who, by dragging him over the world in his childhood and showing him about from place to place as a phenomenon, in all likelihood planted those seeds in his constitution which at the end brought about his lamentably early death.

The published letters of Mozart contain nothing more interesting than the account he gives of how he set to work on, and how he advanced with, the composition of Die Entführung. The subject, which, after considerable difficulty, was selected for him by Stephanie, at that time "Inspicient," afterwards "Regisseur" of the German Opera in Vienna, pleased him exceedingly. The name of the little comedy with music, by Bretzner, upon which they founded the libretto was Belmont und Konstanze, oder Die Verführung aus dem Serail. Mozart was satisfied with it for several reasons. It gave him, in Belmont and Konstanze, a pair of lovers of the genuine sort—a cavalier, amator amicæ mancipium after his own heart, and a lady fit to put on the chains her inamorato is but too content to wear. Mozart generally treated love from the point of view of the tenderest sentiment. Amore nihil mollius—only half the apophthegm of St.

‡ Mozart himself speaks about its seventeenth performance. § Symphony in D. written for and performed at the Concerts Spirituels, in Paris—July, 1778.

† "Er konnte die Sinfonie und die Arie nicht genug loben." Lady Wallace says—"he was vehement in his praise," &c. Why "vehement"?

Bernard—was his motto; he ignored the nihil violentius. And what songs he found for Belmont! There is nothing in music more expressively melodious than the air in which the amorous swain, all sighs, describes the passion that consumes him ("O wie ängstlich, o wie feurig!") Mozart himself, not given, except under provocation to self-praise, speaks rapturously about this air, in a letter to his father (September 26, 1781). It was designed expressly to show off to advantage the voice and style of the famous tenor, Adamberger, and, as the composer tells us, was the favorite with all who had heard it, as well as himself. Even the bravura songs for Constanze, which Mozart was compelled to write in order to flatter the self-esteem of a certain Mlle. Cavalieri (German in spite of her name), are full of the same tender grace; and it is a pity that the most beautiful of them, the recitative and air in G minor, "Traurigkeit ward mir zum Lese" (Act II.), should be precisely the one which is omitted in the performance at Her Majesty's Theatre. Then Blonde and Pedrillo afforded the fertile genius of our composer an opportunity of exhibiting itself in another light. The servants of Constanze and Belmont are, as a matter of course, in love; but how different is their love from the impassioned utterances of their betters! As Shakspeare could make each type of humanity speak, so could Mozart make each type of humanity sing after its kind. The airs assigned to Blonde, charming as they are—one of them indeed ("Durch Zärtlichkeit und Schmeicheln"), perhaps, a thought high-flown for "my lady's lady"—would never have been given by Mozart to Constanze; still less would he have dreamed of allotting any of the music of Pedrillo to Belmont. He has treated them both lovingly, nevertheless. If Pedrillo had nothing else to sing than the deliciously quaint romance in the last act, "Im Mohrenland gefangen war ein Müll hübsch und fein," he would be precious to musicians. This has been called "the song in many keys," and not inappropriately. In each verse it touches upon no less than seven—B minor, D, A, C, G, F sharp minor, F sharp major, and again B minor, finishing, by an unexpected transition, in D—and all in the most natural way possible. But Pedrillo has also a share of that wonderfully comic duet, "Vivat Bacchus!" in the situation where he makes the watchful gardener drunk—the "Sauf-Duett"—"welches in Nichts als in meinem türkischen Zapfenstreich besteht" ("which consists of nothing but my Turkish tattoo"), as it is described in the letter already cited, one of the longest and most interesting in the collection. Osmin was another cause of satisfaction to Mozart. Not only could he now contrast the two pairs of lovers with each other, but introduce a fresh element in his music opposed alike to either. That keen sense of humor, the possession of which has been unjustly denied to him, found the happiest expression in his musical treatment of Osmin. Of the songs composed for that functionary, the first (the well-known "Questi avventurieri infami"), where the irritable old servant works himself up into an ebullition of rage, and the last (the no less familiar "O, wie will ich triumphiren"), where he exults in the discomfiture and gloats on the anticipated punishment of the lovers, are of course the most important, both from a musical and dramatic point of view. Our favorite, nevertheless, is the ballad in three verses, with a different accompaniment to each verse ("Ihr ein Liebchen hat gefunden"—Act I.), which grows into a duet with Belmont, whose importunate questionings exasperate Osmin more and more, till he explodes in one of his constitutional fits. The turn of this melody is such that we wonder the omnivorous Mr. William Chappell should not have claimed it long ago, as genuine "old English," and put it in his book.

His favorite quintet of dramatic personages thus completed, the way in which, after endowing each with a strong individuality, Mozart blends them together in his concerted music, may easily be understood by those who are aware that he is the greatest master of combination whom the art has known. Though the texture of Il Seraglio is much less elaborately interwoven than that of Le Nozze di Figaro, it still displays the unequalled ingenuity of its author: and while the most salient characteristics of the opera are its wealth of melody, its dramatic verve, and its discrimination of character, it contains some concerted pieces—three duets (besides the notable "Zapfenstreiche"), a trio, a quartet, and a finale—which are indelibly stamped with the genius of Mozart. A sixth personage—Selim, the good-natured Pasha, who, after a little show of wrath, pardons the violation of his harem's sanctity, and lets the lovers go, to the surprise and indignation of the jealous Osmin—does not help the composer much; but Selim is necessary to the dramatic action, and without him we should not have had the spirited and truly characteristic "türkische Musik"—the overture, "ganz kurz," but deliciously fresh, and the choruses of Janissaries, just as short and just as good. It was this union of various incentives to musical expression which directly took the fancy of Mozart, who, in a letter in which he tells his father, with boyish delight, that Stephanie has at last found a subject for his opera, says—"Das Buch ist ganz gut." Those who differ from the great musician will readily forgive him, for never was want of judgment, if want of judgment must be laid to his charge, more gracefully redeemed.—London Musical World.

An Academy of Music.

(From the Evening Post, New York.)

That they are to have a new Opera House is certain; but this will not give us, except in name, an Academy of Music. Nevertheless, if any city in the world ought to have a real Academy of Music, it is certainly New York. It has more available material than any other. It has a larger constituency—that is to say, its metropolitan influence extends over a vaster territory and a more numerous population. Except London and Paris, there is no other city in the civilized world that has so many millions of people placed under contribution to its wealth, power and influence.

Some years may pass before we have an Academy of Music which shall do the service to be expected from such an institution; but the day cannot be far off. The public spirit and culture which created our Central Park will yet achieve for the city some other things in the same line—a Zoological Garden, for instance, public baths, and, though last named by us here, the first in importance, a properly endowed and organized Academy of Music.

The dominant idea of such an Academy should, we suppose, be that of a normal school of music, in which not only music should be taught, but also and especially the art of teaching music. At the same time it should be a national University of Music, the graduates of which should receive degrees—so conferred as to constitute a decisive evidence of real merit, proportionate to the rank conferred. In its character of normal school the Academy should develop the best methods of teaching music in all its branches and departments, not overlooking, of course, what has already been accomplished in this direction, notably, by the Conservatoire of Paris. Instead of making itself in any sense or degree a crib for a few idle professors and masters to fatten in, it should vigorously aim at the widest possible diffusion of musical taste and musical culture. It should seek, therefore, to popularize music, by developing the most economical as well as the best methods of instruction.

It is rarely, indeed, that these two qualifications do not more or less coincide. Whenever, for example, the method of teaching in classes can be made applicable at all, it soon becomes as superior in excellence as it is in economy. This is especially so in regard to the art of singing at sight. Few ever acquire this art by the costly methods of personal and individual instruction; partly, perhaps, because it is not well understood by the professors themselves. Yet it is one which, by a method elaborated upon sound principles, might, at very moderate expense, be made as universal as reading common print.

A true Academy of Music ought not only to elaborate such a system, making use, of course, of all that has been already done in that direction by Wilhelm, Mainzer, Hullah, Hickson and others, but also educate teachers expressly to introduce this art into our common school system. Much of the excellence of the system of public school education in Germany is due to its universal adoption of Music, and especially of vocal music, in its curriculum. Instrumental music may also, to a certain extent, be thus popularized, greatly to the advantage of the public taste and morals. But it is of secondary importance; the art of reading vocal music at sight it is most urgently important to popularize.

While deriving a portion of its income, possibly a considerable part, from the fees of pupils who could afford to pay for the instruction received, an Academy of Music really worthy of New York should have a large number of free scholarships, the right to compete for which would furnish an important, and, indeed, an indispensable stimulus to the pupils in the public schools. Our musical education ought to be so systematized that no talent of any importance should ever be debarred the chance of rising, by the want either of instruction or of opportunities. Our Academy should therefore institute from the first a system of free instruction, and free and ample opportunities for performance. The performances themselves should be regarded, also, as an integral element in the general system of public education. At all events, a refined and classic taste should preside over the whole Academy in all its departments.

The same spirit would naturally regulate the smallest details, even to the publication of correct, well-edited libretti of the operas. These might easily be made really useful incentives and aids to the study of Italian, essentially the language of music and of song. Those now sold are ridiculous, and ought to offend the intelligence and culture of our operatic audiences. Quite as strong condemnation will apply to the great bulk of the instruction books for the different branches of music, now published. It would have been a real boon to the American public if nineteenth-twentieths of them had perished with the Opera House.

Of course, the public performances of such an institution as we have tried to sketch would culminate in Grand Opera. But then they ought to include also every other branch of music. The symphony and the oratorio ought to be produced upon a scale worthy of this great city and the vast continent of which it is the commercial, and in many respects the social, though scarcely, as things now are, the musical metropolis, and made fairly accessible to the people. Even the madrigal and the glee, adapted specially to social gatherings and the domestic circle, ought to be appropriately presented in the performances, as well as taught in the lessons of a true Academy of Music, which should illustrate all its teachings by performances, of the highest style of excellence. Instrumental chamber music, therefore, the classical quartets, &c., ought also to have a place. In every branch of music performances of the highest excellence ought to be made accessible to the people, thus only can a taste for the pure classical, intellectual music be created and developed.

The Louisville Singing Festival.

[Editorial Correspondence of the N. Y. Weekly Review.]

Whatever may be said against these musical gatherings, from a strictly artistic point of view, it cannot be denied that socially they are of vast importance. The very fact that every year thousands come together, often travelling great distances and sacrificing money and time, in order to shake hands, to sing together, to drink a social cup, and to foster the sentiment of brotherhood, is in itself a sufficient proof of the highly humanizing and beneficial character of such assemblies. The festival just concluded at Louisville illustrated this truth in the most substantial manner. Perhaps for the first time there was such a true and enthusiastic mingling of the two elements forming the society of that lively city. The old antagonistic feeling of foreigner and native received, in this first festival, a heavier shock than from all the political and other attacks which have been directed against it. This seemed to be admitted on both sides, and even found an echo in the two important speeches, which were made on the occasion, the one by Prof. Heilmann, a German gentleman of culture and refinement, who responded to the welcome of the Mayor, and the other by the Rev. Mr. Heywood, a Kentuckian and an eminent resident of Louisville. The German veteran, General Willich, spoke to the same effect, as also did Dr. Wicsner, from Chicago, and General Jefferson C. Davis, the military commander of the department of Kentucky. All these men of distinction gave utterance to the one prevailing feeling—a disposition to look upon this festival as the basis of a new era of social and political unity. It was in view of this feeling that the American as well as foreign portion of the residents of Louisville vied with each other to give their guests the heartiest welcome.

Musically the festival offered about the same features which are common to all these gatherings. There were the customary processions, the display of banners and silver-cups, the torchlight promenade, the serenades, the usual amount of good, bad, and indifferent impromptu speeches, the great Pic Nic, &c. There was also the prize-singing, the source of much trouble, envy and jealousy among the societies, the cause of a great deal of unnecessary excitement, and yet perhaps the chief attraction for most of the singers. If there must be prize-singing, it ought to be modified. As it is, it will never do true justice to the really deserving singers. The true test would be to let every club sing the same song; but as this would become after all highly tedious even to the most enthusiastic admirers of German part-singing, a committee ought to select four songs, of various degrees of difficulty, and these should be entrusted to three societies which have really the necessary culture to do justice to them. This is, of course, only a suggestion upon a theme which will bear a great deal of remark, and we hope our German friends will give it their full consideration. The following is the programme of the first concert, conducted by Mr. Hart, of Louisville.

- 1 Overture—William Tell.....Rossini
- 2 Night Wanderings.....Fr. Abt
Cincinnati Maennerchor.
- 3 The Court of Justice.....Zollner
Cincinnati Saengerbund.
- 4 In the Beautiful Month of May.....Zimmerman
St. Louis Arion des Westens.
- 5 Stille, Stille.....C. A. Weber
Wheeling Harmonia.
- 6 E-Flat Concerto, piano with orchestra.....Beethoven
Mr. Charles Wolfsohn, of New York.
- 7 Waldbendechen—Dedicated to the Liederkrans
by.....Fr. Abt
New York Liederkrans.
- 8 Morning Dawn.....H. Weyd
Sidney Liederkrans.
- 9 Frühlings Landschaft.....Jul. Otto
Chicago Concordia.
- 10 Sönger Gruss.....Fr. Abt
Cincinnati Harmonia.
- 11 Oh, sah ich außer Heide dort.....F. Knecker Cincinnati Druiden-chor.

PART II.

- 12 Larghetto—Out of D Major Symphony.....Beethoven
- 13 Young Love.....L. Groech
Tiffin Bruderbund.
- 14 Still ist die Nacht.....Fr. Abt
Akron Liedertafel.
- 15 Den Schönen.....A. Reinhardt
West Cleveland Maennerchor.
- 16 Morgenlied.....Fr. Abt
Indianapolis Maennerchor.
- 17 Ständchen.....Jul. Otto Nashville Turnerchor.
- 18 Wie hab ich dich geliebt.....Möhring Evansville Liederkrans.
- 19 Nachklang und Sehnsucht.....Krentzer
Wheeling Maennerchor.
- 20 Des Schiffers Traum.....Fr. Abt
Columbus, Ohio, Maennerchor.
- 21 Der frohe Wandersmann.....Mendelssohn
Cincinnati Junger Maennerchor.
- 22 Overture—Tannhäuser.....R. Wagner

Abt was more frequently represented than might be called desirable in the cause of true art. Mendelssohn was represented in but one song, performed by the Cincinnati Junger Maennerchor, under the direction of Mr. Elsner. Most of the singing could be called satisfactory, with the exception of that of two or three societies, which might as well have been absent. The East had sent but one society, the New York Liederkrans, whose singing produced an immense effect and was made a theme of general comment by the audience. As to accentuation, intonation and precision, light and shade, and musical understanding, their singing was undoubtedly the best offered of the evening. Yet they did not receive the first prize, which, we understand, was given to a society of St. Louis—out of deference to the wish of the conductor, Mr. Sobolewsky, who holds a prominent position in that city.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn did not play in the first concert, owing to some difficulty in the orchestra, but he succeeded in performing in the second, or so-called prize vocal concert, and in spite of the difficulties which an orchestra brought together from a great many cities must have offered him, he produced a deep impression with the great work—probably never before heard in this part of the country. All those, who have the interests of true musical art at heart, must thank him for the firmness with which he withstood the suggestion of some musical people in Louisville to perform rather a brilliant modern piece than a concerto, whose merits at the moment at least would not be appreciated by most of the audience. Mr. Wolfsohn had nevertheless a genuine success with his task, which he performed in a true artistic style.

Here is the programme of the second concert, conducted by Mr. Sobolewsky:

PART I.

- 1 Overture—Egmont.....Beethoven
- 2 Festive Song (To the Artists—An die Künstler).....Mendelssohn
- 3 E-Flat Concerto—by Karl Wolfsohn.....Beethoven
- 4 Jubel Overture.....Weber
- 5 Jauchzend erhebt sich die Sonne.....Möhr

PART II.

- 6 Overture to Fingalhöhle.....Mendelssohn
- 7 Die Gelaterschlacht (Battle of Spirits).....Kretschmar
- 8 Overture to Robespierre.....Liloff
- 9 Das deutsche Schwert (German Sword).....C. Schubert
- 10 Das Sönger's Parole (Singer's Parole).....Beethoven

The vocal part of the performance was fairly performed and seemed to give most satisfaction.

The following days were devoted to the distribution of the prizes, excursion to the celebrated Mammoth Cave, and meetings of the delegates of the "Saengerbund" in order to adopt measures for the arrangements of the next festival, which will take place in Indianapolis. A resolution was adopted that in future no prizes should be awarded to the contending societies, as these awards generally, nay always, create dissatisfaction among the singers and thus mar the pleasures of the festivals.

The New Organ at Plymouth Church.

(From the New York Tribune, July 30.)

The new organ in Plymouth Church is, we believe, the second largest in the country, containing, besides the mechanical arrangements, over 50 speaking stops. (The schedule we have already given.)

The capacity of this organ is in every way admirable. Its mechanical arrangements embrace every useful novelty in use either in this country or in Europe. The water arrangements for supplying the wind are absolutely perfect. The pressure can be graduated by the organist in an instant, and the supply is uniform and unailing. The swell pedal being placed in the centre, instead of at the side, is a great improvement in facilitating its use.

The private exhibition on Friday evening enabled us to judge of many of the specialties of the organ, and also of its general power. It was exhibited by Mr. John H. Willcox of Boston, an organist of brilliant powers, and also a practical organ builder. Mr. Willcox, we understand, drew the entire scheme of the Plymouth Church organ, and has supervised its construction and its erection. The task undertaken by Mr. Willcox was not a light one, for he had to display the organ and not himself, though in so doing he gave proof of the versatility of his imagination, and of his control over all the resources of the instrument. The first burst of the full organ, with that wonderful stop, the Tuba Mirabilis, was startling and exciting, more, perhaps, from its extreme brilliancy than from its deep and rolling grandeur of sound. Its brilliancy exceeds, we think, anything we have ever heard. A hundred silver trumpets seemed flooding the church with their bright, piercing tones. Immediately succeeding this magnificent burst of power, the volume of tone fell to a mere whisper, displaying a purity of quality that could not be exceeded. Then as his fancy suggested, Mr. Willcox exhibited the various solo stops, introducing them through themes suggested by their characteristic timbres, separated by interludes, in which he displayed the qualities of the several manuals in their simple integrity, without coupling, and introduced, with fine effect, the crescendo and diminuendo pedal—a power, in the hands of a competent organist, exceeding that of any orchestra, for no increase of that power can be so finely graduated by human power of lips, as is now achieved by mechanism. The performance closed with a bold subject, in which strongly contrasted effects of the full, medium and minimum power of the instrument in alternation were finely brought out by the performer. When we consider the length of the extemporaneous performance, its well-maintained continuity, and the constant demand on the manual dexterity by the rapid changes of stops and combinations, we must award to Mr. Willcox the highest praise. In set pieces the changes and combinations are arranged in advance, but in this case all the solo resources of the organ were exhausted, and numerous combinations prepared on the spur of the moment. With so much to do, in so short a space of time comparatively, it could hardly be expected that Mr. Willcox could carry out or elaborate his subject, but he displayed a fertile fancy, and his modulations, in which he never wavered or halted, proved him to be a thorough and accomplished harmonist. As we have said, he varied his subjects in accordance with the character of the instrument; he also varied the style of music, skillfully contrasting the severe church style with the florid and romantic.

The building of this organ is a masterpiece of workmanship; in some respects it can nowhere be excelled. As in the organ of the Immaculate Conception, Boston, the vox humana is wonderfully beautiful, and certainly surpasses that in the organ in the Boston Music Hall. It has all the effect of a choir of well-trained voices, and the illusion is so complete, that we fancy we hear the sacred words breathed to the exquisite music. The Oboe, the Euphone, the Viol di Gamba, the Vox Angelica, the Philomela, the Clarinette, &c., are all characteristically beautiful. The diapasons are rich and sonorous, and singularly pure and fine in quality. We are, however, inclined to think that the character of the organ is rather brilliant than choral; that the foundation is scarcely sufficient for the superstructure, more especially when in conjunction with the Tuba Mirabilis, which we think is a little too brilliantly voiced. The size of the church is not favorable for the development of the graver power of the organ, while the brighter stops strike the ear at once. With the ample space at the command of the congregation, it would have been easy to extend the church twenty or thirty feet in the rear, which would have afforded fair space for the development of the powers of this magnificent organ. As it is, it is manifestly too large for the building.

(From the Tribune, Aug. 2.)

The official opening of the large organ built by the Hooks of Boston for the Plymouth Church, took place on Tuesday evening. The church was crowded in every part, as might have been expected, as beside the congregation who were naturally anxious to hear their organ displayed by master hands, a large number of invitations were issued to outside parties. The desire that the services of Mr. George W. Morgan should be secured was so generally expressed, that Mr. Beecher yielded to the pressure, and engaged him at his own expense for the occasion. The other performers were Mr. J. Willcox and Mr. Muller, the organist of the church.

In our previous notice we stated that "the foundation of the organ was not of sufficient strength to sustain the brilliant superstructure," but we did not press this point, because the style of Mr. Willcox is essentially brilliant, and we thought that the latent strength, if any, might yet be developed by other organists of a different school. Such was not the case. On the contrary, the more dramatic and powerfully contrasted the playing, the more evident it became that our first judgment was correct. When we read the scheme we were half satisfied that the choral parts of the organ, the Diapasons and the pedal manual were insufficient to balance the superstructure, fancy stops, &c. The Hooks in their scheme here sacrificed solid grandeur of power to show and brilliancy. In the brilliant points, as we have said before, the organ is truly beautiful. The voicing of the solo stops cannot be surpassed; each stop is a separate and distinguishing excellence. But this alone does not make a great organ. Brilliancy will do well enough for mere solo exhibition, but for the true and noble in art, and for the just support of a large choir more weight is wanted in the middle and lower portions of the organ. More diapason power is wanted to the great organ, and at least three or four more powerful stops in the pedals. The 32-foot pipes, which should be felt, are not, probably for want of sufficient pressure, while the "tuba mirabilis," a magnificent stop, from over-pressure speaks so peremptorily that it is impossible to introduce it harmoniously or blendingly, as it stands out immediately alone. It is not only bright and brilliant, but somewhat blatant. If this were moderated and the necessary strength added, Hooks' Plymouth Church organ would stand the test of the severest criticism, and might challenge the whole country to match it. These changes and additions which we consider necessary would cost some money, and this the builders could not afford, for the work has been so faithfully and splendidly executed that we doubt if they have realized any profit. When we say that the pneumatic action cost over $3,000, it may well be imagined that their profit must be very small, if any. But they have produced an organ which, in point of perfection of mechanism, in action and the well considered contrivances for the production and the regulation of power, and in the perfect voicing of the solo stops, cannot be excelled here or elsewhere.

Mr. Willcox was not up to his usual standard in his opening solo; he appeared to be nervous; but in his subsequent improvisation, in which he displayed the various exquisite solo stops, he recovered himself, and justified the eulogiums we bestowed on him in our first article. He was warmly applauded, and received the honor of an encore.

Mr. George W. Morgan displayed his perfect mastery of the organ, per se. Although the instrument was almost entirely new to him, he handled it in a perfectly familiar way, making and varying his combinations with the utmost ease and rapidity. Under his hands the organ spoke all that it could speak, and although the absence of due weight was inevitably apparent, his performances were brilliant in the extreme.

Senators in Council on the Fine Arts.

WORKS OF ART AT THE CAPITOL—A BLIND APPROPRIATION IN SPIKE OF BETTER COUNSEL.

In the Washington Globe we find the report of a long debate held in the United States Senate, in the evening session of July 27, on a proposition to appropriate $10,000 for a full-length statue of Abraham Lincoln, to be executed by a young Western girl. It was opposed, on grounds of economy and of Art, by Senators Sumner, Howard and Edwards, but advocated with unreasoning zeal and unscrupulous personality by Messrs. McDougall, Cowan, Nesmith, Conness, and other Western Senators, and finally carried by a large majority, having already passed the House. The result in all human probability will be, (considering the inexperience of the artist, who never yet has modelled a full-length figure, and considering the warning we have in a similar experiment that stands in front of Boston State House), that the place for the true statue of our Martyr President at the Capitol will be long preoccupied by something which it may cost much 'charity' to pronounce a success, even though there should be genius in it. The Senatorial debate was so interesting that we wish we could copy the whole report. As it is, we sacrifice other matter to make room for some of the principal portions.

....The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, authorizing a contract with Vinnie Ream for a statue of Abraham Lincoln.

MR. SUMNER. Some evenings ago, sir, I made an attempt to secure an appropriation of $10,000 in behalf of worthy public servants in one of the Departments of this Government.... In refusing it you acted on a sentiment of economy.

Now, sir, a proposition is brought forward to appropriate that identical sum of $10,000 to be applied to the production of a work of art. I speak of it now in the most general way. If there was any assurance that the work in question could be worthy of so large a sum, if there was any reason to imagine that the favorite who is to be the beneficiary under this resolution, was really competent to execute such a work, still, at this time and under circumstances by which we are surrounded, I might well object to its passage simply on reasons of economy; surely this argument is not out of place.

But, sir, there is another aspect of this question to which you will pardon me if I allude. I enter upon it with great reluctance. I am unwilling to utter a word that would bear hard upon any one, least of all upon a youthful artist where sex imposes reserve, if not on her part, at least on mine; but when a proposition like this is brought forward I am bound to meet it frankly.

Each Senator of course must act on his own judgment and the evidence before him. Each must be responsible to his own conscience for the vote that he gives. Now, sir, with the little knowledge that I have of such things, with the small opportunities that I have enjoyed of observing works of art, and with the moderate acquaintance that I have enjoyed with artists, I am bound to express my opinion that this candidate is not competent to produce the work which you propose to order. You might as well place her on the staff of General Grant, or put General Grant aside and place her on horseback in his stead. She cannot do it. She might as well contract to furnish an epic poem, or the draft of a bankrupt bill. I am pained to be constrained to say what I do, but when you press this to a vote you leave me no alternative. Admit that she may make a statue, she cannot make one that you will be justified in placing in this national Capitol. Promise is not performance, but what she has done thus far comes under the first head rather than the latter. Surely this edifice, so beautiful and interesting, should not be opened to the experiments of untried talent. Only the finished artists should be invited to its ornamentation.

Sir, I doubt if you consider enough the character of this edifice in which we are now assembled. Possessing the advantage of an incomparable situation, it is one of the first-class structures in the world. Surrounded by an amphitheatre of hills, with the Potomac at its feet, it resembles the capitol in Rome, surrounded by the Alban hills, with the Tiber at its feet. But the situation is grander than that of the Roman capitol. The edifice itself is worthy of the situation. It has beauty of form and sublimity in proportions, even if it lacks originality in conception. In itself it is a work of art. It ought not to receive in the way of ornamentation anything which is not a work of art. Unhappily this rule has not always prevailed, or there would not be so few pictures and marbles about us worthy of the place they occupy. But had pictures and ordinary marbles should warn us against adding to their number.

Pardon me if I call your attention for one moment to the few works of art in the Capitol which we might care to preserve. Beginning with the Vice President's room, which is nearest to us, we find an excellent and finished portrait of Washington by Peale. This is much less known than the familiar portrait by Stuart, but it is well worthy to be cherished. I never enter the room where it is without feeling its presence. Traversing the corridors, we find ourselves in the spacious Rotunda, where are four pictures by Trumbull, truly historic in character, in which the great scenes they portray live again before us. These pictures have a merit of their own which will always justify for them the place they now occupy. Mr. Randolph, with an ignorant levity, once characterized that which represents the signing of the Declaration of Independence as a "shin-piece." He should have known that there is probably no picture, having so many portraits, less obnoxious to such a gibe. If these pictures do not belong to the highest forms of art, they can never fail to be regarded with interest by the patriot citizen, if not by the artist. There is one other picture in the Rotunda which is not without merit; I refer to the Landing of the Pilgrims by Weir, where there is a certain beauty of color and a religious sentiment; but this picture has always seemed to me too exaggerated to be natural. Passing from the Rotunda to the Hall of the House of Representatives we stand before a picture, which, as a work of art, is perhaps the choicest of all in the Capitol. It is the portrait of La Fayette, by that consummate artist, who was one of the glories of France, Ary Scheffer. He sympathized with our institutions; and this portrait of the early friend of our country was a present from the artist to the people of the United States. Few who look at it by the side of the Speaker's chair are aware that it is the production of the rare genius which gave to art the Christus Consolator and the Francesca da Rimini.

If we turn from painting to sculpture, we shall find further reason for caution. The lesson is taught especially by that work of the Italian Persico in the front of the Capitol, called by him Columbus, who is represented with a globe in his hand, but sometimes called by others, "a man rolling nine-pins." Near to this is a remarkable group by Greenough, where the early settler is struggling with the savage, while opposite to the yard is the statue of Washington by the same artist, which has found little favor because it is nude, but which shows a great mastery of art. There also are the works of Crawford—the alto-relievo which fills the pediment over the great door of the Senate Chamber, and the statue of Liberty which looks down from the top of the dome—attesting a genius that must always command admiration. There are other statues in the building by a living artist. Then there are the bronze doors by Rogers, on which he labored long and well. They belong to a class of which there are only a few specimens in the world, and I have sometimes thought they might vie with those famous doors at Florence, which Michael Angelo said were worthy to be the doors of Paradise. Our artist has represented the whole life of Columbus in bronze, while the portraits of contemporary princes, and of the authors who have illustrated the life of the great discoverer add to the completeness of this work of art.

Now, sir, the doors of this Capitol are to open again for the reception of a work of art. It is to be a statue of our martyred President. He deserves a statue, and it should be here in Washington. But you cannot expect to have even of him more than one statue here in Washington. Such a repetition or reduplication would be out of place. It would be too much. There is one statue of Washington. There is also a statue of Jefferson. I refer to the bronze statue in front of the Executive Mansion by the French sculptor David. There is also one statue of Jackson. It is now proposed to add a statue of Lincoln. I suppose you do not contemplate two statues or three statues, but only one statue. Who now shall make that statue which shall find a place in the national Capitol? Surely whoever undertakes that work must be of ripe genius, with ample knowledge of art and of unquestioned capacity—the whole informed and inspired by a prevailing sympathy with the subject and the cause for which he lived and died. Are you satisfied that this youthful candidate, without ripeness of genius or ample knowledge of art or unquestioned capacity, and not so situated as to feel the inspiration of his life and character, should receive this remarkable trust? She has never made a statue in her life. Shall she experiment on the historic dead and place her experiment under this dome? I am unwilling. When the statue of that beloved President is set up here, where we shall look upon it daily, I wish it to be a work of art in truth and reality, where the living features shall be preserved animated by the living soul, so that we shall all hail it as the man immortal by his life, now doubly immortal through art. Anything short of this, even if it finds a transient resting-place here, will be removed whenever a correct taste asserts its just prerogatives.

Therefore, sir, for the sake of economy, that you may not heedlessly lavish the national treasure; for the sake of this Capitol, itself a work of art, that it may not have anything in the way of ornament which is not a work of art; for the sake of our martyred President, whose statue should be by a finished artist; and for the sake of art throughout the whole country, that we may not set a bad example, I ask you not to pass this resolution. When I speak for art generally I open a tempting theme, but I forbear. Suffice it to say that art throughout the whole country must suffer if Congress crowns with its patronage anything which is not truly artistic. By such patronage you will discourage where you ought to encourage.

MR. PRESIDENT, I make these remarks with sincere reluctance. I am pained to feel obliged to make them, but such an appropriation as this, engineered so vigorously, and having in its support such a concerted strength, must be met plainly and directly. Do not condemn the frankness which you compel. If you wish to bestow a charity or a gift, do it openly, without pretense of any patronage of art or homage to a deceased President. Bring forward your resolution appropriating $10,000 to this youthful candidate. This I can deal with. I can listen to your argument for charity, and I can assure you that I shall never be insensible to it. But when you propose to pay this large sum for a work of art to be placed in the national Capitol in memory of the illustrious dead, I am obliged to consider the character of the artist you select. I wish it were otherwise, but I cannot help it.

MR. NESMITH. MR. PRESIDENT, if this was a mere matter of research I should be very much inclined to defer to the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but as it is not, and as it requires no great learning, no particular devotion to reading to discover what is an exact imitation of nature, I claim that my judgment on such a subject is as good as his own. My mind has never been perverted by the extensive reading which the Senator from Massachusetts has had, or by that vast amount of lore in which he is so accomplished, but I claim to be equally as good a judge as he is of any mere matter of art which is an imitation of a natural object. (!)

The first objection to this appropriation was on the ground of economy. Sir, it is the first time I ever knew that Senator seized with a costiveness of economy. [Laughter.] It was only last night that we listened to his long diatribes here when four different times called for the yeas and nays upon excessive appropriations to those who are already overpaid, and now he talks about the squandering of the public funds. Sir, there are no public servants in this country but those who are already overpaid, and he objects to this young artist—this young scion of the West, from the same land from which Lincoln came—a young person who manifests intuitive genius, and who is able to copy the works of nature without having perused the immense tomes and the grand volumes of which the Senator may boast—a person who was born and raised in the wilds of the West, and who is able to copy its great works.

Sir, the Senator might have raised the same objection to Mr. Lincoln, that he was not qualified for the Presidency because his reading had not been as extensive as that of the Senator, or because he had lived among rude and uncultivated society. I claim for this young lady, sprung from a poor family, struggling with misfortune and adversity, that she has developed such natural genius that her talents in this direction should be fostered and cultivated in preference to our giving this work to any foreigner. The Senator from Massachusetts has pandered so long to European aristocracy that he cannot speak of anything that originates in America with common respect. He even refers to our bronze doors which were cast in Munich, and to everything else of foreign production, and he gives no credit to native genius. Why did he not speak of Powers? Why did he not speak of our great American artists? Why is he constantly referring us to Europe?

If this young lady and the works which she has produced had been brought to his notice by some near-sighted, frog-eating Frenchman, with a pair of green spectacles on his nose, the Senator would have said that she was deserving of commendation. If she could have spoken three or four different languages that no body else could have understood, or, perhaps, that neither she nor the Senator could understand, he would vote her $50,000. [Laughter.] He is a great patron of art, but not a patron of domestic art. He is a patron of foreign art; he is a patron of those who copy and ape European aristocracy, and he does not propose to patronize or encourage the genius which grows up in our own great country, particularly in the wilds of the West.

Here is a young girl of poor parentage, struggling with misfortune, her father a mere clerk in a Department here; and by a casualty, on being introduced into a studio, she manifests great taste and great powers of art, and in the short experience which she has had she has developed wonderful powers in that line. But the Senator from Massachusetts, with all his learning and all his foreign tastes, is unable to appreciate anything of that sort.

Sir, I venture to predict that this young lady will rise to an eminence in the arts, that her works will yet decorate this Capitol, notwithstanding the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, who, when she has achieved success, will be among the first to sing paeans to her praise, and I was about to say that his children—but I will take that back, as he has none to speak of, [laughter]—would be among those who would praise her works and would cast a mantle over the proceedings of their recreant father who had refused to recognize native genius and native art. But, sir, as the Senator has remained a bachelor so long, that is a contingency which is not at all likely to occur. [Laughter.]

I say, then, there is nothing in the objection on the score of economy. This young lady deserves to be encouraged. I venture to say that the works she had already produced, which are on exhibition in this Capitol, and particularly the bust of Mr. Lincoln, are unequalled. I challenge the Senator from Massachusetts to produce one of the foreign artists, of whom he boasts so much, who can produce the equal of that bust. I do not pretend to enter into any competition with the Senator from Massachusetts on the subjects of books, but when it comes to matters of natural taste and to forming a judgment in regard to the imitations of natural objects, I assume that my judgment is equal to his. I can tell the height of a mountain, the length of a river, or the meanderings of a trail as well as he can, and I say that my judgment upon those subjects is equal to his. I deprecate his panegyrics upon foreign artists in derogation of those raised in our own country, and particularly those of the great West.

MR. SUMNER. Where have I said anything in praise of a foreign artist in depreciation of the artists of our own country? I have alluded with praise to the artists of our own country.

MR. NESMITH. I heard nothing of that. I heard the Senator speak with particular reference to that door which was cast in Munich.

MR. SUMNER. Which is by a Western artist, Mr. Rogers, reared in the West. I give him praise for what he has done.

MR. NESMITH. It was not cast in the West; it was cast in a foreign country, at Munich. Why could not that door have been made in the United States? I ask the Senator that question. Why should it be necessary to go to a foreign country, even if we produced the genius to mould the door, to produce the model from which it was cast? Why was it necessary to send an order to a foreign country for the production of the door itself? In mechanics and in the arts we are as far advanced as the countries of Europe, and I apprehend there is no reason, except it be the desire to gratify a morbid taste, why we should go to the old countries for these things. I appeal to Senators on this floor, to those who have natural taste, to those who have an eye for beauty, as I admit the Senator from Massachusetts has not, to support this young lady in her efforts to produce what will be a magnificent statue of Mr. Lincoln.

MR. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I dislike much the term "charity" that is used by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is a word of offence when spoken on such an occasion and about such business—offence to the person who is the subject of our business. This is not charity. It has been the custom of all cultivated States, from old antiquity, through the middle ages, and to the present day, to cultivate high art illustrating their own people and institutions, and to encourage their own home artists. Where high genius is found, it has been the office of great States to cultivate the development of that genius....

It is the policy of this Government, a great Government, to cultivate the same talents in our own country. I am confident that this young lady possesses genius. She has exhibited it. Her bust of Mr. Lincoln is the only one that does justice to him. There are plenty of them about; we have seen hundreds of them, but hers is the only one that has reproduced Mr. Lincoln as he lived. She has had the genius to do it; and it requires genius to do it; and young genius is just as good as old genius, and, sometimes a little better. I believe Napoleon was a genius when he was young; Alexander died when he was young; and a great many other people accomplished great results when they were boys and girls. Pitt when a mere boy, twenty-four years of age, was Prime Minister of England. The idea that because a person is young and has not attended the schools of Germany and France he or she is not fitted for a work of this kind is a notion. On yonder wall [pointing in the direction of the painting of the storming of Chapultepec on the wall leading to the gentlemen's gallery] is a picture painted by a man who never took a lesson in drawing, who never took a lesson in pencilling. He sat alongside of me as a boy at school on the banks of the North river; and he is now acknowledged to be the best battle painter there is in the world.

Several SENATORS. Who is he?

MR. McDUGALL. John Walker, the best battle painter now living, who painted the storming of Chapultepec on yonder wall. Though he never had a drawing-lesson, he drew and painted admirably when he was a boy. These things come by the force of innate consciousness and by the power of giving expression to that innate consciousness. This young lady is undoubtedly a lady of marked genius; and she has proved, so far as the bust is concerned, that she has produced the best likeness of Lincoln of any person that has attempted it. I have the right to say so, because I was perhaps better acquainted with Mr. Lincoln in his lifetime than any gentleman on this floor; he was a companion of mine many years ago, with whom I was long familiar. I had not been satisfied with any attempt to reproduce his features till I saw the bust produced by this lady. She had achieved a success, showing that she has true genius; and if she is young the better for her. In five years more she will be as great a genius as she ever will be, no matter how long she may live. "Whom the gods love die young."

PARIS.

THE OPERA COMIQUE, says Le Menestrel, "has always had a foible for brigands: Zampa, Fra Diavolo, Scopetto in La Sirene, Marco Spada, Lara,—fifty brigands of the second or third rank, have had their day upon its play-bills." The last novelty in this line is "Jose Maria," a comic opera in three acts by M. Jules Cohen, the libretto by MM. Cormon and Meilhac. A correspondent of the Orchestra (July 25th) says of it:

The scene is laid in Mexico; Mazatlan being the exact locality. The inhabitants of this place are in great dread of a certain band of robbers headed by Jose Maria, who is said to indulge in continual raids in the neighborhood, and intends favoring Mazatlan with a visit. The local authorities are on the quiver, and the troops are under arms day and night. The fact of the matter is that Jose Maria does not exist at all. He is the invention of a comic smuggler (Dinero), who, whenever he wants to "run" his goods, gives the governor of the town, El Senor Corregida, information that the bandits have been seen in a direction quite opposed to his own line of operations; and so the Governor and all his suite start off and leave Dinero to quietly work his business, while the others are engaged in their wild goose chase. Corregida has a nephew, Don Fabio, who has lost all his fortune at play, and is looking out for a parti sufficiently rich to set him up again. He has rendered an important service to Dona Armero, a rich and lovely widow, and she, out of gratitude to the uncle, consents to marry the nephew. But after her promise is given the widow begins to repent, and she finds out that "'tis hard to give the hand where the heart can never be;" for during her walks she has met with a gallant and sentimental tenor, who vows to pass his life in watching over her days, and tells her that if any danger should be imminent he will be her "Fechter," and always arrive in time to say "I am here." Carlos, for that is the gentleman's name, restores a bracelet she had lost some days before, sings her the usual "Adieu, madame," on hearing that she has given her promise to Don Fabio, and must keep her word, and takes his leave. But he obtains access to the apartments while Dona Armero is at a ball, and on her return she finds him there. Scene of distress; a threat to call assistance prevented by Carlos, who, in the usual Fra Diavolo style, cuts the bell ropes and locks the doors. He wishes to treat her with every possible respect, and, to prove it, threatens to kill her if she does not tell him where her fortune is concealed. After a long scene of reproach, &c., Carlos obtains the porte-feuille of the now ruined lady, and jumps out of the window. The news of the robbery causes the greatest consternation. Corregida and Don Fabio are furious, and the latter returns the Dona Armero's promise to marry him as soon as he finds out that she has lost her fortune. The Governor charges his private secretary with the instruction of the affair, and Dona Armero is astonished to find that he is no other but her brigand of the last night's adventure. Everything is explained, Carlos is the son of a high personage, and the lovers are united.

M. Cohen is young and rich; he is a thorough musician, and obtained the highest nominations at the Conservatoire when the Concours were of a much more serious nature than at present. His list of honors comprises Solfège, 1st prize, 1847; Piano ditto, 1850; Organ, ditto, 1852; and Counterpoint and Fugue (under Halévy), 1854. M. Cohen has composed many detached pieces, masses, &c.; the choruses to Athalie, an opera-comique, "Maitre Claude," which had a fair run in 1860, and the work under notice. The character of his writing is à la Auber, and is sometimes, in fact, a complete imitation not only of the style but of the phrases of that distinguished composer. In the overture a fine passage for the violoncello is to be noticed. In Act I. we have a chorus for men's voices, written, probably, with a view to the Orphéon. It is sonorous—in fact, all M. Cohen's cori are sonorous—sometimes too much so. Then come a good baritone song, with a sort of "echo" chorus, nicely written, and producing good effect; a charming Romance for the tenor (Carlos), his Adieu, Madame, and a pretty ballet to conclude. The best parts of Act II. are, a duet for Dinero and the soubrette—I forget her name, but she has nothing to do with the action of the piece, and is introduced because M. Ponchard, on account of his position in the theatre, must marry somebody. Then a romance and allegro for tenor, effective enough. The finale is weak. In the last act a fine duet for Dona Armero and Carlos is the most important number. The others require no particular mention. The execution was fair. M. Montaubry Carlos, and Mlle. Galle-Marie (Dona Armero) shared the honors; though the latter was scarcely at home in the rôle; "Character" parts in the tragic parts, witness the Page in "Lara," and the Bohemienne in "Fior d'Aliza" suit her much better. M. Melchisedech, Don Fabio, was well received; a careful study of the Use Of The Legs would improve him. MM. Ponchard, as Dinero, and Nathan (Corregida) and Mlle. Belia completed the cast. Somme toute, without being a great success M. Cohen's opera is well written, full of melody, and often effective: if he will only have the kindness to be rather independent in his ideas, and think for himself, the result of his excellent training and the natural musicianly qualities he possesses will be, that we shall have one more "serious" composer to add to our list.

The annual competitions in the various classes of the Conservatoire have occupied much of the past month. Heroic tests of zeal and patience on the part of judges and professors! Old M. Auber, for instance, heard the same solfeggio sung 121 times by the future Damoreans, Nourrits, &c. And the correspondent above quoted says:

To tell you the truth, I'm knocked up, having spent the last ten days at the Conservatoire, listening to singers, comedians, pianists, &c., of "high and low degree:" and I am still under the influence of the Concours de piano which came off yesterday, and we had the pleasure (?) of listening to the fifteen gentlemen who played Herz's 5th Concerto, and the thirty-one ladies who favored us with Hummel's ditto in A flat. To-day we have Opera Comique, next the Violin, Opera, and Wind Instruments; I trust all will be over at the end of the week.

GRAND OPERA. The last weeks of July offered nothing new or out of the usual round of pieces:—Roland à Roncevaux, L'Africaine, the Trovatore, Diavolina, La Juive, &c. But Gluck's Alceste was in rehearsal, to be brought out by the middle of August.

The THEATRE LYRIQUE was to reopen on the 1st of August. The expenses of the first days were to be met by some favorite operas, particularly Don Giovanni, sung by the artists who have recently "created" (!) Mozart's masterwork with such eclat at that theatre. M. Carvalho retains his popular singers of last winter: Mmes. Carvalho, Chanton-Demeur, Nilsson, MMs. Monjaux, Michot, Ismaël, Lutz, Dapassio, Troy, &c. "The new engagements are Cazaux, basso, whose fine voice and talent shone at the Grand Opera; and the tenor Jaulin, a powerful, sympathetic voice, precious singer for the mixed style so successfully cultivated at the Lyrique. The manager is also in treaty with Mlle. Hebbe, a Swedish singer, who has made her reputation in Germany; with the sisters Cornélis, remarkable young soprano and mezzo-soprano; and Mlle. Schroeder, a pupil of Mme. Viardot, who, it is thought, will make a sensation." The list of pieces promised includes the following old favorites: Faust, La Reine Topaze, Mireille, Traviata, Rigoletto, La Flûte enchantée, Don Juan, Martha, Oberon, Les Noces de Figaro, Freyshütz, &c. And there are hints of rare novelties not yet named.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUG. 18, 1866.

Haydn's Music.

It is easily characterized.

1. He is remarkable for the perfection of style; for neatness and elegance in all the details, happy arrangement, and perfect ease and clearness in the exposition of his ideas. He is the Addison of music, only a great deal more. He is the most genial, popular, least strange of all composers; no wonder the French call him "that great man." All those who enjoy clear writing, who love to see everything accomplished with the limits of graceful certainty, feel as safe with Haydn as the scholar with his Cicero and Virgil. We say of him, "that is music," in the sense in which we say "that's English." Whatever thought he had (and he had many), it came out whole and clear; it suffered nothing in the statement. He understood the natures of instruments so well, that they blended as unobtrusively in his symphonies as individuals in the best-bred company. How nicely he adjusts the matter between melody and harmony! The harmony gives out melody as a mass of glowing coals gives out light, wandering flame upon the surface; it is all one fire. Haydn's music is (so to speak) easily understood. It keeps the mind awake, like lively, easy conversation; but does not task the brain, does not excite any longing which it cannot satisfy. Hence it is perfection itself to those who want nothing deeper; and it can never be otherwise than agreeable to those who do. Its charm is infallible as far as it goes.

2. What we next remark is its sunny, healthful, cheerful character. It is the happy warbling of the bird building its nest. It is not the deepest of music; but is welcome to every one as the morning carol of the lark. It has not the tragic pathos of Mozart and Bellini; nor the yearnings and uncontrollable rhapsodies of Beethoven.

But it is good for the deep-minded sometimes to leave brooding and speculating, and for the sentimental to flee the close air of their sad sympathies, and rising with the lark some bright, cool morning, go forth and become all sensation, and enjoy the world like a child. Such a morning walk is an emblem of Haydn. The world is fresh and glittering with dew, and there is no time but morning, no season but spring to the feelings which answer to his music. He delivers us from ourselves into the hands of Nature; and restores us to that fresh sense of things we had before we had thought too long, or worked ourselves into that morbid and intense self-consciousness when our eyes seem actually to burn into everything they look at—when we accept no one's action simply, without asking the intention, and see no fresh bloom of beauty from too clear sight of the skeleton beneath. Quick, versatile, elastic, graceful, expressing himself fluently, he is the Mercury among the musical gods. Beethoven called himself the Bacchus, who presses out the wine of inspiration for his brother mortals. Handel's was the strength and serenity of Jove; (and this recalls what Mozart said of him: "When he pleases, he strikes like a thunderbolt.") Mozart may pass for the Orpheus who moved the stones to sympathy. One function of Hermes, however, Haydn has not—that of conducting souls to the mysterious other world. He loves this earth too well; in the sunny present he rejoices, and has none of the yearnings or superstitious forebodings of the heart. He sings always one tune, let him vary it as he will, namely the worth and beauty of the moment, the charm of reality, the admirable fitness and harmony of things. Not what the soul aspires after, but what it finds, he celebrates; not our insatiable capacities, but our present wealth. Surprise and gratitude and lively appreciation for ever new beauties and blessings—a mild and healthful exhilaration—just the state of his own Adam and Eve in Paradise!

He knows not how to be sad. He listens to the nightingale more like a curious school-boy, than like a lover who thinks that the grove has caught the melody of his own secret, dainty sorrow. Hence he never succeeded in dramatic music, though he composed many operas. Of course he includes the shades as well as the lights of the landscape in his picture. Still it is a landscape. The glooms and storms of human life are painted like the glooms and storms of nature. Sentiment and passion and mystery all make parts of one cheerful picture. He describes a passion, but does not express it. This must be said even of his "Canzonets," which he composed in England, and in which he seems almost to have stepped upon the brink of a new and deeper element. "She never told her love,"—"Recollection,"—"Fidelity,"—"Despair," &c., all are exquisitely drawn, and deeply shaded; most natural transitions into some of the darker keys of the music of life; but we feel how easily we may pass out again. His melancholy amounts to hardly more than regret, and a sort of serious musing upon happy times gone by. "Pleasing pain," might be the title of all, as well as one of these songs. His deep and sad strains are only minor variations of a happy tune, little cloud shadows on a sunny meadow. "O, tuneful voice," seems, in its form and style, to have suggested Beethoven's "Adelaide," but the one is only a sober pause to catch the echo of retreating joys; the other wakes all our longing for the unattainable.

Haydn's, therefore, is the music of one who loves nature; of one alive to every impression. In his music every thought acquires the grace of form, the richness and delicacy of coloring, with which every object blends into nature. He could not do a thing ungracefully, any more than a Greek; though he has a wanton, frolic vein, and can sometimes paint a rout of drunken satyrs as well as a choir of nymphs. But in his love of nature, nature plays a much greater part than he himself. Nature is more than the observer. He loses himself in his sights and sounds; gives himself up to sensations, and the simple feelings they awaken; but does not, like Lear, impress his own mood upon the elements.

Is not his great work, then, the true exponent of his genius? Was he not the very man to compose the music of the "Creation;" to carry us back to the morning of the world, and recount the wonders which surround us, with a childlike spirit? Is it not his art to brighten up the faded miracle of common things; to bathe our wearied senses, and restore the fevered nerve of sight for us, so that we may see things fresh and wonderful, and a "new-created world" may rise amid the "despairing, burning" of the falling evil spirits that confuse and blind us.

The Operas in Vogue in European Theatres.

The Leipzig Signale has adopted the practice of presenting every week, in parallel columns, a comparative view of the doings in the principal Opera houses and concert rooms of Germany, London, Paris, Brussels, &c. The list of operas performed is interesting and instructive as to the taste and fashion of the day. It shows what old operas wear the best; how real genius holds its own; where Verdi & Co. find the most willing audience, and where Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber; whether the great ship L'Africaine be still afloat, and what sort of headway Richard Wagner's "Art-work of the Future" seems to be making; how far the taste runs to light and sparkling and how far to serious musical drama; whether sensational and sentimental music, stunning music of "effect," elaborate, showy combinations on a great scale, have yet destroyed the charm of genuine, genial, sincere classical creations of genius. Of course, we need to compare repertoires over a pretty long period, to read the signs conclusively. This we may undertake to do some day; it would cost too much labor now. But we propose to bring together what these lists afford us for a single month; we think it will interest the opera-going American reader.

Here then are the operas performed during the month from the 20th of May to the 20th of June last (or thereabouts) in several of the leading theatres.

BERLIN, (Royal Opera.) Oberon, Fra Diavolo, Auber's Le Macon, Fidelio, Der Freyschütz, Tannhäuser, Musaniello, Le Prophète, La Dame Blanche, Cherubini's Wasserträger. These operas, all sung in German, alternated with ballets, "Flick and Flock," &c., which are in several acts, occupying a whole evening, composed mostly by the old Taglioni, and in music scenery, costume, dancing and the combination of all æsthetic graces, are quite as important works of Art as many of the fashionable operas of the day. During some seasons, the German operas at this theatre, given by its own company of singers, have alternated with Italian opera by an Italian troupe. Certainly the above list speaks well for fidelity to the immortal master works.

DRESDEN, (Royal Opera.) Adam's Postilion du Lonjumeau, Auber's Lac des Fées; Frey-schütz; Maillart's Das Glückchen des Eremiten; Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris"; Bellini's Montecchi e Cupuletti; "Wanda," by Doppler (twice); Lucia di Lammermoor; La Dame Blanche; Le Part du Diable, Auber (twice); Mozart's Zauberflöte and Don Juan. Here too all in German, Gluck and Mozart balancing or rather ballasting—a generous share of light French music.

VIENNA, (Royal Opera.) L'Italiana in Algeri, Rossini (twice); "Barber of Seville"; Gounod's "Faust"; Figlia del Reggimento; L'Afri- caïne; L'Elisir d'Amore. (The latter half of the list is not found).

HANNOVER. Kreutzer's "Night in Granada"; Il Trovatore; L'Africaine (twice).—Last half of May only).

MUNICH. (Royal and National Theatre). Boieldieu's Dame Blanche; Massaniello (3); Mozart's Nozze di Figaro; Halevy's "Jewess"; "Freyschütz"; Mozart's Zauberflöte; Robert le Diable—(one week wanting.)

STUTTGART. (For the month of May). Meyerbeer's Robert and Huguenots; Kreutzer's "Night in Granada"; Weber's Freyschütz and Oberon; "Faust"; "Lucrezia Borgia"; Trovatore; "Astorga", new German opera, by Abert.

LEIPZIG (little old Stadt—or Town Theatre). Operas in June: L'Africaine, 3 times; "Huguenots"; La Dame Blanche (with Roger for tenor); Lortzing's "Czar and Carpenter"; Robert Le Diable; Fra Diavolo, twice; "Massaniello." All in German.

FRANKFORT ON THE MAIN (Stadttheater). Spohr's "Jessonda"; L'Africaine, 4 times; La Dame Blanche; "A Night in Granada"; Mozart's Figaro; Mendelssohn's Heimkehr aus der Fremde; Adam's Postillon; "Freyschütz"; "Martin the Fiddler," comic operetta by Offenbach; Rossini's "William Tell."—These in the month of May.

CARLSRUHE AND BADEN-BADEN (Grand Ducal Theatre). In May: "Huguenots"; "L'Africaine"; Nicolai's "Merry Wives"; "Zauberflöte"; "Night in Granada"; "Der Freyschütz"; Le Part du Diable, and Le Domino Noir, Auber; "The Swiss Family," by Weigl.

DARMSTADT (Grand Ducal Theatre). In two weeks: "Faust"; "Sicilian Vespers"; Verdi's Freyschütz; "Massaniello"; L'Africaine (for the 21st time); "Daughter of the Regiment"; "Huguenots."

BRUSSELS (Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie). Last half of May: Robert Le Diable, L'Africaine, 4 times; La Reine Topaze, by Massé, (twice); "Quentin Durward," by Gevaert; Zampa, Herold.

STOCKHOLM. In April and May: La Poupée de Nuremberg, by Adam; "Norma"; "Dame Blanche"; "Faust"; Czar und Zimmermann; Prophète; Huguenots; Zauberflöte; Ernani; Wagner's "Rienzi"; "Oberon"; "Freyschütz."

PARIS (Grand Opera). L'Africaine, 4 times; Trovatore, 3 times; Le Dieu et la Bayadère, by Auber, twice; Le Prophète, 3 times; Robert le Diable. Besides various ballets. Toujours Meyerbeer and Verdi!—OPERA COMIQUE: Voyage en Chine, by Bazin, 12 times; Le Pré aux Clercs, Harold, 4 times; Les Absens, Poise; L'Ambassadeur, Auber, 4; Le Nouveau Seigneur, Boieldieu, 3; Fille du Regiment, Donizetti, 2; La Dame Blanche, 3; Le Châlet, Adam, 4; Flotow's Zitta, 8 times; Gounod's Colombe, 3; Fior d'Aliza, by Massé; Les Noces de Jeanette, Massé; Le Domino noir, Auber.—THEATRE LYRIQUE: Don Juan of Mozart, 15 times; L'Alcalde, Uzeppy; Le Roi Candaule, by Diaz; Le Cousin Babylas, by Caspers; Nicolai's "Merry Wives," 5; Mozart's "Magic Flute"; Rigoletto, 3; Les Dragées de Suzette, by Salomon, 3; Le Sorcier, by Marcelli, 3.

LONDON (Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden): Norma, 3 times; Il Barbiere, 2; L'Africaine, 2; "Huguenots"; Lucrezia Borgia, 3; Gounod's Faust; L'Elisir d'Amore, 2; Don Giovanni; Fra Diavolo, 3; Un Ballo in Maschera, Verdi; Meyerbeer's "Star of the North"; Donizetti's La Favorita; Verdi's La Traviata.—HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE: Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris, twice; Lucia; Sonnambula; "Huguenots," 2; "Dinorah," 5; Der Freyschütz, 2; "Magic Flute," 2; "Don Giovanni," "Oberon," 2; "Norma."

No account is taken of Italy in the reports from which we have condensed the above. Nor need there be. There it is ever the same story everywhere. Very little of Rossini, their great man of genius; very much of Verdi, with only more of the same harping there is everywhere on the old strings of Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante; hosts of new native operas, a dozen or so new aspirants being announced for every Carnival and never heard of afterwards; a few dips into Meyerbeer, Flotow, &c., and once in a while, but rarely, Don Giovanni. Music with the Italians seems to have run into temperament; the sensibility is common to the race; all love sweet melodies and phrases, catch them, sing and hum and whistle them; but this love is content with mere melodic common-places and effective turns made for the singers to show off their voices. As to composition, there is endless echoing, working over (refacciamento) of the same stock of melodic ideas, with thin clothing of harmony, or loud effect (a sort of gas-light intensity), while the day of real genial creation, fine imaginative genius like Rossini's, or even Bellini's, seems to have passed. We trust it will revive with the new life of a free Italy!

The Louisville Saenger-Fest.

This festival, more than any before, was participated in by Americans as well as Germans. Mr. Guenther, who would have been the Musical Director, had he not come to an untimely death by an accident, a distinguished teacher of music in Louisville and leader of the Philharmonic Society. His practice was almost exclusively among the aristocracy; and the position he was to hold during the festival did much to secure very liberal subscriptions from the leading Americans of the city. Thus the local committee was enabled not only to pay $13,000 for a Fest-Halle, built in a splendid location, and large enough to hold 5000 persons; but also to entertain all singers from abroad in such a manner that few complaints, if any, were heard; besides many other liberal arrangements. This says a great deal. The participation in the exercises, so far as the buying of tickets, personal attendance, and encouraging applause were concerned, could not have been better. The result was a great success, general satisfaction, and a stimulus given to the musical world of Louisville which will be felt for years. We are convinced that these festivals will become a settled custom the more all people—Germans and Americans—can participate not only in giving money and listening, but in singing.

2. The Orchestra of Louisville, although inferior to those of New York, Boston and Chicago, performed its part very creditably. The necessary substitution of a strange director and two other time-beaters for Mr. Günther was a calamity. Mr. Sobolewski, of St. Louis, is an experienced and energetic leader, who in his zeal sometimes forgets to dress his well meant remarks in a polite form. Condensing rehearsals and concert executions into the short space of four days, was quite a burden to some performers. If human nature is made responsible for the good behavior of a reed or brass instrument during six or seven hours a day in a hall packed full, and under a sun with 100 degrees in the shade, is it a wonder if the genius of music takes to his wings, and patience ceases to be a virtue?

3. The programme for the Prize concert was, and could not but be a failure. Nineteen societies had to sing on one evening. The order was given by the wheel. Those whose lot sent them to sing in the second part of the concert, were too exhausted by the heat and excitement to do themselves justice. The patience of a over-crowded house, the fashion and beauty of Louisville, sitting for three hours to enjoy and cheer the singers, was unparalleled.

4. The grand main concert produced on the whole a very fine effect. There were soul-stirring strains, which will linger long with those who felt them. We are not inclined to find fault with the selection of pieces. The responsible parties did undoubtedly their best. The pieces had been printed and—although at the eleventh hour—sent to all societies who wanted them. But we must find fault with the behavior of some societies, which had practiced these choruses not at all, or but imperfectly, or whose members during the general rehearsal were loitering about town, or sitting quietly in the hall, or cooling themselves by imbibing lager. In our vicinity there were among twenty singers not one who could, or did sing the chorus parts with precision, firmness and a loud voice. The orchestra had to suffer severely for the musical sins of the vocalists. If the total effect was fine, it could have been made sublime, if all the better singers had put their shoulders to the wheel and done their part. But the prize singing was over, and those one-horse singers cared little for the main cause of the festival after their society-pride had had its acknowledgment.

5. Would it not be well in one of the next meetings to secure the execution of some Oratorio or Mass? Few singers in the country have a chance to become much acquainted with such masterworks. The presence of ladies would be an addition not to be despised, and the engagement of some eminent singers in the land for the solo parts would prove a stimulus to many.

6. The local committee deserves, and has no doubt received the warmest thanks for the untiring perseverance, the perfect order and system, and the winning good nature with which the programme was carried out. How much labor, loss of time, and mutual forbearance is required to carry such a festival to a successful end, can only be known by one who has been "through the mill."

CHS. A.
Chicago, Aug. 12.

RISTORI. The arrival of this great tragedienne is awaited with rare interest. Mr. Grau has engaged her for a series of 120 performances in the United States and Havana; and our readers hereabouts will be glad to know that he has made arrangements for nine representations at the Boston Theatre in the two weeks beginning with the 29th of October. We had the good luck to see her once (in Strasburg) in her great part of Maria Stuart, and shall count it ever among the golden recollections. It was indeed great acting. Not perhaps the Rachel kind of power of entering into and creating characters of evil; not that denoniacal intensity of genius, so cold, remote, as well as greatly imaginative; but more of the charm of womanly feeling, dignity and beauty. The utmost refinement and the truest fervor. And the precision, the richness, the musical, heart quality of speech seemed something wonderful in her. One could almost understand her without knowing the Italian. Her fellow actors in the piece, all Italian, were each and all excellent, and we see that "her entire company of celebrated artists" are to come here with her.

PARLOR OPERA. It seems we are to have opera on a small scale next season in the Boston Music Hall, on alternate Thursday evenings, beginning Nov. 8. Mr. PECK, superintendent of the Hall, has charge of the business. Mr. WHITING, organist at King's Chapel, will direct the orchestra of sixteen musicians; and Dr. C. A. GUILMETTE will be vocal director and stage manager. The opening piece will be Don Pasquale, the four characters of which will be sustained by Miss Fanny Riddell, Mr. James Whitney, Mr. Rudolphsen and Dr. Guilmette. Mrs. H. M. Smith is announced for the next opera in course. Here certainly is fine opportunity for our native singers who have also talent for the stage, and we see not why it should not be made attractive and rewarding.

"BEGG"-ING THE QUESTION: We see notice in English literary journals of a new book entitled: "The use of Organs and other Instruments of Music in Christian Worship Indefensible, &c." By JAMES BEGG, D.D. (Edinburgh: McPhun & Son.)—Possibly, as the name of the publishers would seem to hint, the book is only an attempt to make fun of the Scotch hughbear, and this oracular sublime Dr. Begg may be a fictitious personage, himself a pure invention of the devil.

Music was not always such a bugbear in Scotland. An article in the July number of Good Words on "Vocal Music in the Olden Time" has the following passage:

In England in the sixteenth century music was regarded as an essential part of a polite education. Thus in an imaginary conversation we find the following recorded: "Supper being ended, and musicke books (according to the custom) being brought to the table, the mistress of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing; but when, after many excuses, I pretended unfainly that I could not, every one began to wonder! Yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up, so that upon shame of mine ignorance I goe now to seeke out mine old friend Master Gnorimus, to make myself his scholar." From Thomas Morley's "Playne and Easy Introduction to Practicall Musick," 1597. But this pleasing little picture of social life, we imagine, represents what was then passing not in the cottage of the peasant, not even in the farm-stead, but rather in the manse and the mansion. At the same time we must not forget how common were the art and practice of psalm singing during Reformation times, when, as we are told, it was nothing unusual to hear 6,000 persons at St. Paul's Cross all singing psalms. Neither was Scotland behind in this respect; for Calderwood informs us that, on the return of a banished minister (Rev. Mr. Durie) to Edinburgh in 1582, he was met at Leith Pier by several hundred persons, who, increasing to some two thousand as they went on marching up the High Street of Edinburgh, singing the 124th Psalm,

"Now Israel may say,
And that truly."

"in such a pleasant tune in four parts known to most part of the people, that coming up the street all bare-headed till they entered in the kirk, with such a great sound and majesty, that it moved both themselves and all the huge multitude of the beholders looking out at the shots and over-stairs, with admiration and astonishment." It is also an undoubted historical fact that, for several centuries, and even down to so recent a time as the year 1750, song schools existed in the chief towns of Scotland, where music, both vocal and instrumental, formed as regular a part of education to the sons of county gentry and town's burgesses as the classics. By-and-by, however, the public taste changed, and these institutions declined and vanished; and doubtless the musical degeneracy of Scotland is closely connected with this fact. By long disuse the musical faculty was believed to be lost, though not so much in England as in Scotland, on account of her Church possessing a more musical service.

BETHOVEN'S LETTERS.—The following extract is from a private letter addressed to a friend in England by Mr. Thayer, respecting Dr. Nohl's recently published edition of "Beethoven's Letters":—

"The last now thing in the multiplying Beethoven literature is a volume of Letters, edited by Ludwig Nohl, of Munich. I wish I could send you a copy, not for the value of the work, but that you might see for yourself the manner in which it is put together, and that you might read the wonderful preface. The familiarity which you acquired with German musical literature, in those years when we knew each other in Berlin, would enable you to appreciate this queer specimen of German profundity. Nohl begins his 'Introductory Preface' (Einführendes Wort) thus: 'In accompanying the present first complete edition (Gesamtausgabe) of Beethoven's Letters with a few introductory words, I do not need, in the first place, to deny that the creation of the collection has cost no small sacrifice.' He however confesses, on the next page, that it cannot be hoped that this 'complete' collection can be supposed to be anything like complete. And in this he is most decidedly in the right. My own collection contains over three hundred letters not in his book, while his—amounting, with those in the Appendix, to only 411—has about seventy numbers not in mine. And of these seventy most of them are unimportant notes, often of but three or four lines, from the papers of the lately-deceased Anton Schindler. Many of his numbers are but short extracts from letters, of which my copies are complete; and by far the greater part have been collected from printed books and periodicals. Moreover, Prof. Jahn, of Bonn, has still many neither known to Nohl nor myself. So much for the completeness of the collection. But the want of completeness I care little for, being thankful for any additions to my stock of knowledge; and, as above said, I find some seventy notes or letters which are new. What does offend me is this, that in his notes and remarks there is nothing usually to distinguish what is founded upon direct proof and what is merely his private opinion—hypothesis—guess-work. And so many grave errors strike me in glancing through these pages, that I lose all confidence in the editor. There are a few—some of little, others of more importance, but all alike showing the want of due care in the preparation of the notes. No. 11. 'In possession of Artaria, in Vienna.' Not so; the original is in the Imperial Library. No. 13. Beethoven speaks of 'one of his youthful friends;' and Nohl writes 'Stephan von Breuning;' he might have added "Query?" at least. I consider his supposition here entirely wrong, as where a few lines lower he writes 'Zmeskall.' No. 15. The well-known letter to Julia Guicciardi (in the English life of Beethoven, edited by Moscheles, pp. 104—5) has a note in which occurs the following passage: 'In the first place, it is certain—and, indeed, after the church register that Alex. Thayer has seen in Vienna—that Julia had already married Count Gallenberg in 1801.' Now, Alex. Thayer never told Nohl any such thing. He told him that, in his opinion, the true date of these 'Julia' letters is 1801; and any number of the Gotha Gräfliches Kalender for the last fifty years would give Nohl the date of Gallenberg's marriage as November, 1803. No. 26 is the remarkable testament (in the English biography, pp. 80 et seq.) Nohl remarks that the suppression of the name of the brother Johann in the address of this document was, by its original editor, in the Musikalische Zeitung, because that brother was then still living. In fact, it was suppressed simply because Beethoven himself suppressed it in the original. No. 43. Note to Rökel (printed p. 94, in the margin of the English edition). Nohl gives the date 1805, and make it refer to the performance of Fidelio. He is wrong on both points. No. 50. Date, according to Nohl, 1808; the aria spoken of, according to him, 'Ah, perfido;' the occasion, Beethoven's concert in the Meden Theatre. On all these points he is wrong. No. 112—which is here addressed to Count Moritz Lichnowsky, and dated 1813 or 1814—is the same as No. 98 in my Verzeichnis of Beethoven's works. It was written to Zmeskall; and the date should be 1802. But enough on this matter."

ALEXANDER W. THAYER.

THE NEW ORGAN. The Independent says: The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has become pastor of a new organ. It stands behind his pulpit, towering up to the ceiling, and looking like a church within a church. Its black-walnut columns, its steel-colored pipes, its architectural carvings, its huge size, present a striking contrast to the impoverished piece of white paint and dingy gilding which constituted the old instrument. The great Boston organ set all the good folk of that Puritan city agog for two or three months. The citizens of Brooklyn are now in a corresponding temper of town-talk and local pride. We ourselves became badly touched with the infection. Before hearing the living voice of the dead creature, we clambered into its bowels. What a museum! It looked like a many-walled bazaar of tin-trumpets and kite-strings! In and out, up and down, we wound our way through the thicket of mechanism, notwithstanding the polite grumblings of the organist, just audible from the outside, who insisted that those ramblers within would be shaking dust down his just-tuned pipes. But the irresistible committee of members of the press were not thus to be whistled off the scent. So we sat down like travelers in a cave, to survey the stalactites. But the more we studied the intricate thing the less we understood it. Finally, we discontinued our inquiries, and lapsed into bewilderment. Emerging aghast into the choir-gallery, the impatient gentleman at the keyboard blew a blast on all his trumpets, which, if we had only heard it on the inside, might have stunned us as much as the call for the Philadelphia Convention. Afterward we heard an hour's playing—a mingled jangling and ravishment—a wonderful exhibition of the power and majesty, the pathos and sweetness, of musical sounds. Several learned descriptions of this cathedral of noises have appeared in print—descriptions which, thus far, have baffled and confused, rather than enlightened, our minds. At present, all we clearly know of our new organ is that Mr. Hook made it, Mr. Wilcox played it, and we heard it. But we propose, when the public mind of Brooklyn shall become a little more calm on the subject, to choose some scientific person with a literary turn of mind, and request him to fix upon a cool day, and write up the organ handsomely for our readers. Meanwhile, the vox angelica, the tuba mirabilis, the viola da gamba, the flute harmonique may lull themselves into such quiet rest during the summer vacation that doubtless in September the new organ will be old enough to have become the haunt of church spiders and religious mice.

REV. J. H. HEYWOOD made a very fine speech at the Saengerbund picnic in Louisville, Ky., before an immense gathering of people, most of whom were Germans. He closed by saying:

"Here you will work with us to make our Fatherland a glorious commonwealth, consecrated to universal freedom; where man, as man, shall have every opportunity and incentive for full development—a genuine republic diviner than dawned on Plato's mind; made beautiful by art and graceful festivity; freed from discord and harmonized into celestial symmetry by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, strains richer and deeper than those Amphion strains, at which the city of old rose in grace and beauty.

"And be it our purpose, Germans and Americans, German-Americans and American-Germans, in accordance with the great ideas common to us and infinitely dear, while working for our beloved countries to do all in our power for universal humanity; to cause the earth to be felt, by all of human kind, as a Fatherland, our Father's land where all, united in brotherly love, and carrying out the Saviour's golden rule, shall rejoice in hope, and all kindreds and people shall form a grand Maennerchor—a world-embracing Liederkreis, whose harmonies shall thrill and gladden the universe."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- O wert thou in the could blast. Song. Mendelssohn. 30
Already familiar to most singers as a duet, but it is now published as a song, and does not lose anything by the new arrangement, and will be a welcome gift to all lovers of Mendelssohn's songs.
- Come sing with me. Song. A. Leduc. 30
Very pretty melody, twining around a simple story about the freed bird and his song.
- Stars of the night shino o'er us. (Madre del sommo amore.) Trio. Campana. 60
A most beautiful trio, or "terzetto," for Soprano, Tenor, and Bass. With the Italian words, it is a prayer to the Virgin. With the English, it is a fine sacred piece for any use. Somewhat difficult. Key of E.
- Greeting. (Gruss.) Song. Mendelssohn. 35
I would that my love. do. 40
Hunting Song. (Jagd-lied.) do. 40
Well known as glee, or four part songs, in which form they are perfect in their way; but as four persons are not always at hand to sing them, it is a convenience to have the present arrangement, which retains all the melodious effect, and only loses in power.

Instrumental.

- Orphée aux Enfers. Fantasia brillante. S. Smith.
The operetta mentioned, is a very brilliant and mirth-provoking little thing, describing the descent of Orpheus into the "shades," in what A. Ward styles a "cheerful" manner. The melodies are very bright, and are none the dimmer for Sydney S.'s handling. Moderately difficult.
- Sicily. Quadrille. C. D'Albert. 40
Very brilliant, quite original, and not difficult.
- Don Juan. "Moisson d'Or." Alberti. 20
Fading, still fading. (Crown Jewels No. 12.)
Baumbach. 40
A graceful rendering of "The last ray is shining," &c. Not difficult.
- Silver Ripples. Waltz. Illustrated title. Cooté. 75
Elegant music, in the fashionable waltz style, and has a fine picture on the title page. A good piece for the first one in a bound book of music.
- La Belle Helene, by Offenbach, arr. by Strauss. 50 Powerful and brilliant.
- Sentiment for Piano. D. Kern. 35
A sentimental sentiment, prettily varied.
- Zephyr Waltz. L. H. Hatch. 30
Amusement Schottisch. E. W. Parker. 30

THE ORGAN MANUAL; for the use of Amateurs and Church Committees; containing Directions and information to persons desirous of purchasing an Organ, and to enable organists to rectify ciphering, and other simple casualties, without sending for an organ-builder; to which is added, a brief history and description of the construction of an organ. By Rev. Henry D. Nicholson, M. A. 75

Mr. N., an English clergyman who has recently arrived among us, has packed, in this little book, the greatest quantity of useful information about the organ that could be inserted. It is the handiest book for the purposes specified, that has been published. In the appendix, an interesting description of Reed Organs may be found.

a way as to conceal the true accent of the measure, it is called syncopation. Example:

These variations from the primitive rhythm of melody are called Derivative Rhythms of Melody, and their variety is numberless.

II. BROADER SYMMETRIES. In the conception of the compound measures we have the beginning of that system of involution by which are built up the grander rhythmic symmetries of melody and musical form. A succession of measures so determined, or emphasized relatively, as to produce upon the mind the perception of completion, constitutes a Rhythmic Period. The ear recognizes a rhythmic period as complete only by the perception of a symmetry composed of groups, of two or more measures each, which are mentally opposed to, or set over against each other. Of these groups there must be two, or four, or six. A period of four groups is more symmetrical because it admits of being subdivided into smaller symmetries of two groups each. Such a symmetrical rhythm is represented thus:

The groups of two measures we will term phrases, and the groups of two phrases, sections. Of these it may be observed, in general, that the two sections offset each other; and that each phrase offsets the one corresponding in the other section. By the adoption of a similar derived rhythm in measures corresponding to each other, a still more pleasing effect may be produced. Thus:

This systematic variation of rhythm may be carried to any extent the composer fancies. The ear is assisted to the perception of the symmetry by the caesura, or repose, that marks the terminations of the sections.

But a higher symmetry than that of the period, awaits us. Two or more periods may be so combined and opposed to each other as to form together a larger whole: The Song Form. One of the more pleasing of the broader symmetries of this grade, is composed of three periods; in which the rhythm of the second varies materially from that of the first and third. For this plan of organization brings in another element of beauty: Unity. And of unity, the highest kind, unity of membership; "the union of separate and distinct things into one whole." The following, which is the rhythm of the Theme of the Allegretto in Sonata Op. 14 in E, by Beethoven, is offered as a case in point:

1st. PERIOD.

2d. PERIOD.

3d. PERIOD.

This principle is carried still further by the combination of several Song forms into one larger whole, as is done in the larger Rondo forms; for an account of which see No. 636 of this Journal.

Whoever attentively studies the Sonatas of Beethoven, especially the slower movements, and most of the works of the old masters that are now best liked, cannot fail to perceive the importance they seem to have attached to this element of beauty in musical structure. In almost every mind there dwells the ability to perceive symmetry. Even the horse is excited by a strongly-marked rhythm. A melody lacking in symmetry stands small chance of popularity. Even Bach's Fugues, dry as they are commonly supposed, are very symmetrical in their period forms. And, indeed, what is symmetry but an application of the Apostolic injunction, "Let everything be done decently and in order"?

Otto Nicolai.*

We have to do honor to the memory of one who, years ago, quitted the busy scenes of life, but who, in his works, has left many claims on our grateful remembrance. Berlin is the more bound to do justice to these claims, because Nicolai was a son of Prussia; because it was in Berlin that he began his brilliant, but, unfortunately, too brief career, and because, after many wanderings, with many varieties of fortune in many lands, it was thither that he returned, and there that he was called, while zealously following his art, from an earthly to a higher state.

Nicolai's life is a most effective example of an energetic artistic will, of a decided vocation for music, forcing its way through the most unfavorable circumstances, and attaining happily the goal, at which it certainly would not have remained stationary, had not an early death prevented its possessor from advancing still further. Nicolai's hard fortune in his youth, when, yielding to pressure of every description, he fled from his home, in order that he might devote himself to art; the enterprising boldness with which, though not even a youth, he flung himself into the wild whirlpool of life, courageously and persistently holding his own till he at length reached the goal which he had long darkly found in his own breast—such are the events in the life of an artist, a German artist. He himself, as Siegfried Kapper informs us,† was not fond of referring to his youth; nay, he studiously avoided all reference to it, a circumstance which led his friends to the conclusion that it had been a sad time for him, a time in which he had maintained no easy struggle at the price of his best efforts. Only once, during his residence in Vienna, did he let a hint drop of what he had gone through. This he did in reply to a young artist who was complaining that the struggle for mere existence took all his day, so that he had only the night left for his own studies and labors. Nicolai answered reproachfully: "But you have at least a fire in your room, and need not warm your frozen hands at the candle." What moments of bitter suffering does not this observation suggest, and yet they were not by any means the most bitter ones that the noble-minded artist recollected. But we will not anticipate the progress of our sketch. We will, therefore, commence with such particulars connected with his early life as we have been enabled to rescue from the obscurity in which he himself endeavored to envelop it.

* Nicolai's Biography (by Herr Hermann Mendel) has been forwarded, previous to its publication, to the editor of the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung, from which paper the above extracts are taken.

† An Austrian writer, with whom Nicolai was on terms of friendship.

Carl Otto Ehrenfried Nicolai was the son of C. E. D. Nicolai, who died at Berlin in 1857, and, at the date of his son's birth, 9th June, 1810, was a music-master at Königsberg in Prussia. Young Otto's education can by no means be styled a model one. His father, whose professional avocation kept him from home most of the day, could do but little for his mental cultivation and moral development. But this was not all: an unfortunate prejudice has caused in his breast a sort of aversion towards the poor boy. This was constantly evident in a system of severity often unjust, and must in time have exerted an evil influence upon the boy's character and intellectual powers, apart from the fact that his bodily development, also, suffered from it. We are acquainted with the histories of many distinguished men who passed through a similar ordeal, and yet subsequently became models of noble aspirations, of integrity, and of virtue, because a lucky fate had made them glorious reparation in their mothers, whose care exerted the profoundest influence upon the whole of their after-life. But even this reparation was denied to Otto. He possessed no mother to watch carefully over his education; to shield him from the injustice of a too severe father; and, awakening the germs of noble virtues in his boyish mind, so susceptible of all impressions, to guard him from straying from the right path.‡ Left generally to himself, little Otto formed his character after his own fashion, and the earnestness which, even at that early age, was visible in the features of the small, pale boy, was a picture of the unusual determination, nay, the defiance and spirit of resistance within him. This last quality, as likewise a certain irritability, which he also manifested at an early age, was naturally calculated to hasten the rupture, which, after many conflicts, at length happened between the father and the son.

Thus Nicolai's future would not have justified any particularly favorable hopes, but rather apprehension, if, in the place of his duty-neglecting parents, a higher being had not espoused the cause of the deserted boy. This gracious creature, who spreads only happiness and joy around her, and is able richly to indemnify for all misfortunes and troubles him whom, by her kiss, she has sanctified as her disciple, was Polyhymnia, the Goddess of music. When he was yet very young, and as though to compensate him for worldly injustice, the Muse had anointed him as her own, and the struggle with the prose of life, a struggle carried on by all the means at his disposal, and some of them were not to be altogether justified, in order to soar freely upwards to his benefactress, filled up all his existence. Just as sparks issue from the hard stone the instant the steel is brought into contact with it, talent darts forth its rays immediately an opportunity is offered. Opportunity simply evokes but does not create talent, and as surely as Raphael would have been a great painter, even though he had been born without hands, so would Nicolai have been a fine musician, even though his talent had never succeeded in expressing itself.

The great cause, however, of which we speak, that was destined to make known the boy's vocation for music, was a Vocal Union (Gesangverein), which was held every week at his father's house, and the rehearsals of which Nicolai attended with ever-increasing interest. Even when his father's harsh reproof had sent him off to bed or out of the room, he might have been seen anxiously listening in the next apartment, frequently, despite the danger of catching cold, only in his stockings, so that his presence might not be discovered. What he had heard he would sing and even play upon the piano with astonishing accuracy. Such manifestations of a deeply-rooted feeling for music aroused the attention and the speculative spirit of his father, who began to teach him the piano, when the boy was still very young. In conformity with the teacher's character, merciless severity reigned during the lessons. This increased when, despite the exceedingly rapid progress made by the boy, he did not seem likely to realize the project of working him up into a boyish phenomenon, who might travel about the country gaining money and fame. Dejected and unnerved, poor little Otto would often steal away to join the circle of his playfellows, though he could hardly find compensation or recreation even there. Despite the fact that he invented and taught many new boyish games, whenever he wanted to take the direction in carrying them out, he was rewarded with blows. Afterwards, it is true, whole multitudes of musicians grown grey in the service of Apollo bowed to his extraordinary talent for conducting, the moment his little wand called them to the artistic fight.

‡ We take this opportunity of mentioning that, by granting a separation, the hand of the law had at last put an end to the domestic differences of husband and wife. Nicolai's mother first went to Breslau, and afterwards to Warsaw, where we shall find her in another part of our narrative. Whenever the father was travelling about, as he frequently was, for the purpose of pushing the sale of a Pianoforte School, written and published by himself, and of his other compositions, little Nicolai was left under the charge of his uncle, where, at least, he could congratulate himself on being kindly treated by his aunt and by his cousin.

But in those days his glance turned frequently from such vexations, and he used to wonder whether there were not places and persons among whom he might lead a happier life. He would then run miles away, till he fell down exhausted and wept. But there was something echoing and sounding in his head, so that he could not help reflecting what it could be. Then would he listen also to the murmuring brook, the rustling trees, and the birds singing free from care, and cudgel his brains to put together the melodies they sang. Then, again, he would look upon the butterfly as it flew merrily past, and pity it deeply because it was horn dumb, while, compared to it, he considered the plain bee happy because it could at least sing.* These excursions, hardly remarked or cared for in his father's house, sharpened his gift of observation and his feeling for contemplation, affording him, as far as his tender age would allow, many a glimpse into his own soul. He extended his walks often for half or a whole day, subsisting on what nature offered, or what this or that person, pitying a poor boy, gave him unsolicited. When his father noticed this practice, and punished him with his ordinary severity, it was too late; and Otto did not hesitate stopping from home for days and nights at a time.

Under such circumstances, he made but small progress at the inferior elementary school which he attended, and he did not attend even that regularly. Subsequently, however, he bravely made up for all his neglect by the rapidity with which he raised himself in intelligence and intellectual culture. His favorite occupation was to sit at the piano, and, allowing his fingers to roam dreamily over the keyboard, clothe his boyish fancies in tune. One winter's evening, old Nicolai, finding he had fallen asleep while so occupied, though his fingers went on playing all the same, shunt him up, despite all his prayers and the most desperate signs of fear, in a loft, where the wretched boy was found next morning half dead with cold. Thenceforth there was no lack of attempts at flight of all kinds for the purpose of escaping such atrocities, but sometimes want and destitution, drove the child home again, and sometimes strangers brought him back.

In a number of the Berliner Musik-Zeitung, Dr. Weisse relates a "Geniestreich" (wild prank) as he terms it, on the authority of a friend of his. "After some harsh treatment on the part of his father," says the friend in question, "Otto, then about twelve years of age, suddenly disappeared. There was certainly some slight uneasiness at the fact, in his father's house—where I attended the well-known Vocal Society as a member of the basses belonging to it—but not to such a degree as could have been wished. One morning, I was seated in my student's room, cheerfully lighted up by the summer sun, and whence I enjoyed a pleasing prospect over the 'Pregelniederung,' when the door was suddenly opened, and master Otto Nicolai slipped in. His state was a considerably dusty one, and only a few yellow brass buttons were left on the small threadbare blue coat. No notice was taken of my surprise, and the question: 'my boy, Otto, where have you come from?' but a request was made in a hoarse, anxious voice, for 'something to eat.' 'Oh! I am so very, very hungry!' gasped forth the poor fellow in a melancholy tone. My old grandmother was instantly called upon for a fresh supply of breakfast coffee, and a considerable number of fresh rolls procured from my neighbor, the baker. The supplies soon disappeared before the appetite of my youthful friend, who then, and only then, was strong enough to tell me what had occurred. 'I ran away because I could bear it no longer,' such was the introduction to the adventures of his flight. The continuation was to the effect that he had wandered about for a fortnight in the fields and woods—it was hot summer weather—that he passed the night either on the green ground in the forest, or with the shepherd boys round their watch fire in the fields; and that he had purchased from the said shepherd boys scanty subsistence, with old buckles, small pieces of paper, lead pencils, and such trifles. 'When this currency was at an end, it was the turn of the buttons on my coat. As you see,' he observed, continuing his narration, 'even this resource also comes to an end, and I have only two buttons left. I have now come to procure some more such supplies from you, and then I shall go away once again.' At this moment I can no longer say whether I was more ready to cry or to laugh. I almost believe, however, the former. I did not offer him my hand preparatory to his again setting out upon his wanderings, but kept him with me, and during the day made arrangements, through an old friend, for him to return the same evening to his father's."

His subsequent wanderings in the world," Dr. Weisse goes on to remark, "which were rather longer, are well known; they were, properly speaking, the commencement of his praiseworthy artistic career. It was his own force of will which raised him to the eminence whence he afterwards looked down upon many a one, who had once had only a glance of compassion for the poor aspirant. Whoever is acquainted with the special circumstances of his later years, and knows how, to the best of his abilities, he did good to those who had formerly not done the same to him, will share my opinion: Otto Nicolai was a man of thoroughly honorable character."

But let us, after this involuntary digression, return to our biographical sketch.

(To be continued.)

Senators in Council on the Fine Arts.

(Concluded.)

MR. HOWARD.... If we are to have a statue of Mr. Lincoln—and surely no President since Washington is more deserving of that honor—it becomes a mere matter of business, a simple business transaction, as to whom we shall employ to execute the work. Shall we seek out and employ an artist who is known to possess high talent, one in whom we have confidence, and as to the result of whose labors there is no doubt and no risk; or shall we, as prudent business men, intrust this task to a person who is not known as a high and distinguished artist and who we have not much reason to suppose will or ever can become eminent as a sculptor? It is simply, as I said before, a question of business. If it were for you or me to contract for the making of a statue for a deceased friend, what should we do, supposing we had the means for the execution of one worthy of our friend? Should we take any such risk as gentlemen urge us to take upon this occasion? Should we not be sure to apply to and employ a person who was undoubtedly competent to execute the task? Sir, we should. We should run no risk whatever, if we could avoid it; and that is precisely this case. I know, perhaps, as much of the ability of the young lady to whom it is proposed to give this job as most members of this body. I have met her frequently, as other members of this body have done, and surely she has shown no lack of that peculiar talent known commonly as "lobbying" in pressing forward her enterprise and bringing it to the attention of Senators. I have seen her models of Mr. Lincoln; I have seen and examined the one, especially, to which reference is most frequently had; and although I do not pretend to be a connoisseur in this kind of art, I am prepared to say that I never was satisfied with that model. To me it is monotonous and without meaning and without spirit. I may be entirely mistaken on account of my want of skill and judgment in such matters; but according to my ideas the model is an imperfect model, failing in expression, failing in life, failing in very many qualities which I should expect in a first-rate model.

Now, Sir, I am willing to vote the sum of $10,000 for the purpose of securing a good statue of Abraham Lincoln; but I am not willing to vote that sum or any other sum to this person and take the risk of an entire failure in the end. If this country in its history has ever produced a statesman, and a great man deserving to be memorialized in its annals, not only upon the page of history but in the works of art, it is Abraham Lincoln. And, sir, it is our duty, if we undertake to carry forward this work and secure a statue of that great man, to do it in the best manner possible, and to employ the most skillful artist in our own country or even abroad, if it shall turn out upon inquiry that we have not an artist of competency among ourselves; and I expect, I confess, having in view the youth and inexperience of Miss Ream, and I will go further, and say, having in view her sex, I shall expect a complete failure in the execution of this work. I would as soon think of a lady writing the Iliad of Homer; I should as soon think of placing at the head of an army a woman for the conduct of a great campaign.

MR. COWAN. They have done both.

MR. HOWARD. It has not been their general history.

MR. McDUGALL. They have done it.

MR. HOWARD. No, sir. I would as soon expect from the pen of a woman the Paradise Lost or any other great work of genius which has honored our race.

MR. McDUGALL. Did you ever read the Fragments of Sappho?

MR. HOWARD. I have read the Fragments of Sappho.

MR. McDUGALL. What do you say about that?

MR. HOWARD. That certainly does not prove that Sappho was capable of writing Homer's Iliad.

MR. McDUGALL. She exceeds Homer in many respects.

MR. HOWARD. In many respects—in erotic expressions she certainly exceeds Homer. Whether the proposed work in the present case would have a similar merit I cannot say.

But, sir, without trifling on the subject, and without meaning to say a word in disparagement of this young lady, whom I suppose to be a young lady of genius, I insist that we are taking a great risk in intrusting the execution of this work to her. Let us employ a Powers, let us employ somebody from whom we have a right to expect, from what he has already done, a complete and creditable execution of a statue of Lincoln and not turn it into the hands of a person who, after the exercise of all her genius and all her powers, may miserably fail in the end and we be ashamed of the appropriation which we are about to make.

MR. EDMUNDS. I see on looking at the resolution that it, by accident no doubt, fails to provide that the model for which the first $5,000 is to be paid shall be completed to the acceptance of any official, as the statue is required to be, and therefore I move to amend by inserting after the word "placed" in the eighth line, the words "to his acceptance," so that the completion of the plaster model shall be to the acceptance of the Secretary of the Interior, upon which the $5,000 is to be paid, just as the completion of the marble statue is to be to his acceptance.

MR. WADE. I hope not.

MR. CONNESS. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. It is proposed to go into the market and make a bargain.

MR. EDMUNDS. I shall be glad to have gentlemen state frankly whether they intend to pay this $5,000 for a mere experiment, whether it be successful or satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior or not. I have understood from the course of this debate that this young lady is entitled to be trusted and to be contracted with in the language of the resolution, as a person of established reputation, whose reputation justifies there being intrusted to her this important work which engages all our reputation and is to be put on exhibition as being produced through our instrumentality. Now, if it be intended that this is to be merely an experiment, and is frankly so said, then we shall understand it. If, on the contrary, it be what it purports to be, the arrangement of a business transaction by contract with this young lady, then it is just to her as well as to us to provide that this model shall be completed to the satisfaction of the party who is to contract with her.

MR. TRUMBULL. I trust the amendment will not be adopted, and I think it ought not to be adopted. If I was drafting the resolution I should not put in these words. It will be seen by reading the resolution that it provides that a contract shall be made with this lady "for a life-size model and statue of the late President, Abraham Lincoln, to be executed by her at a price not exceeding $10,000; one half payable on completion of the model in plaster, and the remaining half on completion of the statue in marble to his acceptance." It is intended, I suppose, by the Congress of the United States, if they pass this resolution, that she shall be paid at any rate $5,000 for the effort. I suppose that is intended. It is not expected that she is to go on and devote her time for years, perhaps, to preparing this for nothing. Congress has that confidence in directing the contract to be made with her, from the knowledge they have of her talent, to agree that they will pay $5,000 for making this effort, and if she completes it to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior she is to have ten thousand. I do not presume that it is the intention of Congress, certainly it is not mine, to require her to go on and make this statue and run the hazard of being paid or not. She can do that without coming to Congress. What is the object of coming to Congress at all? Let her proceed and make a statue and give her time to it for years at her own expense; if it is one that pleases us we will buy it afterward. I think it would be mockery to pass a resolution of the kind. I trust the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon any such amendment.

Besides, the resolution has passed the House of Representatives; we have certainly spent time enough upon it; there is manifestly a disposition in the Senate to pass it, and I trust we will come to a vote and dispose of this matter. . . .

MR. SUMNER. I think this amendment had better be adopted. It is only a reasonable precaution in a case like the present. The Senator from Wisconsin alluded to a contract with Mr. Stone. He is a sculptor whose works are at the very doors of the Senate Chamber. The committee who employed him must have been perfectly aware of his character. When they entered into a contract with him, there was no element of chance; they knew precisely what they were contracting for; but in the present case there is nothing but chance, if there be not the certainty of failure.

MR. CONNERS. How was it in the case of Mr. Powell?

MR. SUMNER. I am speaking of the present case. One at a time, if you please. The person that you now propose to contract with, notoriously has never made a statue. All who have the most moderate acquaintance with art know that it is one thing to make a bust, and quite another thing to make a statue. One may make a bust, and yet be entirely unable to make a statue; just as one may write a poem in the corner of a newspaper, and not be able to produce an epic. A statue is one of the highest forms of art. There have been very few artists competent to make a statue. There is as yet but one instance that I can recall of a woman successful in such an undertaking. But the eminent person to whom I refer had shown a peculiar genius early in life, had enjoyed peculiar opportunities of culture, and had vindicated her title as artist before she attempted this difficult task. Conversing, as I often have, with sculptors, I remember how they always dwell upon the difficulty of such a work. It is no small labor to set a man on his legs, with proper drapery and accessories, in stone or in bronze. Not many have been able to do it, and all these have had in advance experience in art. Now, there is no such experience here. This candidate is notoriously without it. There is no reason to suppose that she can succeed. Therefore, the Senator from Vermont [MR. EDMUNDS] is wise when he proposes that before the nation pays $5,000 on account, it shall have some assurance that the work is not absolutely a failure. Voltaire was in the habit of exclaiming, in a coarse Italian saying, that "a woman cannot produce a tragedy." You have already seen that. I do not venture on the remark that a woman cannot produce a statue; but I am sure that, in the present case, you ought to take every reasonable precaution.

Sir, I did not intend when I rose to say anything except directly upon the proposition for the Senator from Vermont, but as I am on the floor perhaps I may be pardoned if I advert for one moment—

MR. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question for information?

MR. SUMNER. Certainly.

MR. HOWE. It is whether he supposes that by the examination of a plaster model he could get any assurance that the work in marble would be satisfactory.

MR. SUMNER. Obviously, for the chief work of the artist is in the model. When this is finished the work is more than half done. What remains requires mechanical skill rather than genius. In Italy, where there are accomplished workmen in marble, the artist leaves his model in their hands, contenting himself with a few finishing touches. Sometimes he does not touch the marble.

I was about to say, when interrupted, that I hoped to be pardoned if I adverted for one moment to the onslaught which has been made upon what I have already said in this debate. I do not understand it. I do not know why Senators have given such rein to the passion for personality. I made no criticism on any Senator and no allusion, even, to any Senator. I addressed myself directly to the question and endeavored to treat it with all the reserve consistent with a proper frankness. Senators, one after another, have attacked me personally. The Senator from Oregon [MR. NESMITH] seemed to riot in this business. The Senator from California, [MR. CONNERS], from whom I had reason to expect something better, caught the spirit of the other Pacific Senator. Sir, there was nothing in what I said to justify such an attack. But I will not proceed in the comments which their speeches invite. I turn away from them. There was, however, one remark of the Senator from Oregon to which I will refer. He complained that I was unwilling to patronize native art, and that I had dwelt on the productions of foreign artists.

I am at a loss for the motive of this singular misrepresentation. Let the Senator quote a sentence or a word which fell from me in disparagement of native art. He cannot. I know the art of my country too well and think of it with too much of patriotic pride. I alluded to only one foreign artist, and he was that sympathetic and gifted Frenchman who has endowed the Capitol with the portrait of Lafayette. The other artists that I praised were all of my own country. There was Pelee, of Philadelphia, to whom we are indebted for the portrait of Washington. There was Trumbull, the companion of Washington, and one of his military staff, who, on coming out of the war of independence, gave himself to painting and produced these works which I pronounced the chief ornament of the Rotunda. There also was Greenough, the earliest American sculptor, and, until Story took the chisel, unquestionably the most accomplished of all in the list of American sculptors. He was a scholar, versed in the languages of antiquity and modern times, who studied the art which he practiced in the literature of every tongue. Of him I never fail to speak in praise. There was Crawford, an American sculptor, born in New York, and my own intimate personal friend, whose early triumphs I witnessed and enjoyed. He was a true genius, versatile, fertile, bold. His short life was crowned by the honors of his profession, and he was hailed at home and abroad as a great sculptor. How can I speak of him except with admiration and personal attachment. I alluded also to Rogers, an American artist from the West; yes, sir, from the West—

MR. HOWARD. Who was educated in Michigan?

MR. SUMNER. And, as the Senator says, educated in Michigan, who has given to this Capitol and to his country those bronze doors, which I did not hesitate to compare with the immortal work of Ghiberti in the Baptistery of Florence. These, sir, were the artists to whom I referred, and such was the spirit in which I spoke. How, then, can any Senator undertake to say that I had praised foreign artists at the expense of the artists of my own country? The remark, permit me to say, is absolutely without foundation.

It is because I would not have the art of my own country suffer, and because I would have its honors follow merit, that I oppose the largess you propose. If you really wish to rear a statue of our martyred President, select one of the acknowledged sculptors of your own country. Do not go to a foreigner, and do not go to the unknown. There are sculptors born among us and already famous. Take one of them. There is Powers, an artist of rarest skill with the chisel; of exquisite finish; perhaps with less of variety and versatility than some other artists; perhaps with less of originality, but having in himself many and peculiar characteristics as a remarkable artist. Summon him to the work. He has been tried. In making a contract with him you know in advance that you will have a statue not unworthy of the appropriation you are about to make, or of the place where it is to stand.

There also is another sculptor of our country, whom I should name first of all if I were called to express freely my unbiased choice; I mean Story. He is the son of the great jurist, and began life with his father's mantle resting upon him. His works of jurisprudence are quoted daily in your courts. He is also a man of letters. His contributions to literature and poetry are in your libraries. To these he now adds unquestioned triumphs as a sculptor. In the great Exhibition of Europe his Cleopatra and his Saul have been recognized as equal to the best of our time, and, in the opinion of many, as better than the best. He brings to sculpture not only the genius of an artist, but scholarship, literature, study, and talent of every kind. Summon him to the work. Let his name be associated with the Capitol by a statue which I am sure will be an honor to our country.

I might mention other sculptors of our country. My friend who sits beside me, the distinguished Senator from New York, [MR. MORGAN] very properly reminds me of the sculptor who has done so much honor to his own State. Palmer has a beautiful genius, which he has cultivated for many years with sedulous care. He has experience. The seal of success has been set upon his works. Let him make your statue. There is still another artist, whose home is New York, whom I would not forget; I refer to Brown, the author of the equestrian statue of Washington in New York. Of all the equestrian statues in our country that is incomparably the best. It need not shrink from comparison with equestrian statues in the Old World. The talent that could seat the great chief so easily in that bronze saddle ought to find a welcome in this Capitol. There are yet other sculptors that I might name; but I confine my enumeration to those who have done something more than give promise of excellence. And now you turn from all this native talent, which has done so much and become so famous, to offer a difficult and honorable duty to an untried person, whose friends can claim for her nothing more than the promise of such excellence in sculpture as is consistent with the condition of her sex. Sir, I will not say anything more.

MR. COWAN. I have come to the conclusion to vote for this resolution, and I have also come to the conclusion that this young lady, whoever she may be, is unquestionably a person of great genius; it may not be exactly in the line of sculpture, but certainly she is in that of agitation. She is occupying the talents of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the honorable Senator from Vermont, the honorable Senator from Michigan, the honorable Senator from Oregon, the honorable Senator from Illinois, and several others, and has shaken and agitated this Chamber to its very centre. Certainly it is no ordinary girl that can do this. [Laughter.]

I shall vote for this resolution, Mr. President, because I understand that this little child of genius has struggled up amid poverty and difficulty to this great result through the medium of her statuary. I must confess I do not know much about statuary myself. Modern statuary, I think, would be about as well made by the tailor and the shoemaker, all except the head, as by anybody else. [Laughter.] Ancient nude statuary required an exact knowledge of anatomy and of the human form in the natural state. How it is proposed to have this statue of Mr. Lincoln I am not advised. Whether it is to be draped with a Roman toga, or with a white jacket and black coat and blue pantaloons, I do not know. [Laughter.]

MR. WADE. Perhaps with a cannon ball in his hand.

MR. COWAN. Perhaps so. And I may here remark, in regard to that group which has been criticized, that I think that is the largest Columbus and the smallest globe I ever saw in juxtaposition. [Laughter.] The squaw is a lusty-looking wench. I do not know whether it is a good representation of a squaw or not, for I never saw many of them. In regard to the other group, I should like to ask my friend from Massachusetts if he ever saw so large a stamp grow out of the belly of a dog as is there represented. [Laughter.]

Now, I think this young lady has given evidence of remarkable genius and remarkable perseverance in the way of her particular calling; and the best evidence this Congress has of it is the extraordinary excitement which she creates among the connoisseurs here. I am for patronizing native genius. I do not want any more Paradise Losts sold for five guineas. I do not want the Iliads of Homer to go down again to posterity without anybody knowing who made them, and having six or seven cities competing for the honor of giving birth to the author. If the statuary of the Capitol is in bad taste let us improve it; and I do not know any other way than to employ this young lady, who manifests such extraordinary ability, to try her hand upon it; and I am rather inclined to think, from the few specimens I have seen of her work, that she will do it. She has not made a very handsome bust of Mr. Lincoln, but that was not her fault; it was Mr. Lincoln's, because he was not a very handsome man. [Laughter.] He was a great and good man; but she could not be expected to make an Adonis of him; and I am rather inclined to think, after all, that that is the fault which has been attributed to her bust of Mr. Lincoln. My honorable friend from Michigan, in whose classic taste I have great confidence, and of whose classic learning I am assured, says that it lacks life and spirit. I think I may appeal to my honorable friend from Illinois (Mr. Yates) and my friend from California (Mr. McDougall) who will say that this is the very height of art in this young female artist in making these busts, because it was a remarkable fact that, of all the men living who perhaps had more humor in him than any one else, Mr. Lincoln was a man of the saddest face on earth. If it be true that she caught that peculiar expression of the man and put it into the bust, and his friends recognize that as a characteristic of that particular bust, that is the highest evidence of her genius.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have come to the conclusion to vote for this resolution; and I do it from the considerations which I have mentioned; and I think they will justify me in it. I have the highest respect for the opinion of my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. Sumner) upon all classical subjects, and particularly upon those which relate to most of the fine arts; but in statu quo I propose to follow the lead of my honorable friend from Ohio, (Mr. Wade) who I think is infinitely superior. [Laughter.] I have always done so, and as it was a good lead I have come to the conclusion to follow it all the way through.

* * * * *

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cresswell, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, Wado, Williams, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Edmunds, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Willey—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wilson, and Wright—18.

So the joint resolution was passed.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The Saturday Review thus sums up the season.

As Mr. Gye was first to begin this year, so he has been first to desist. He opened the doors of Covent Garden Theatre on the 3rd of April, and shut them again on the 28th of July—like Janus (Clausius), with the peace. The Italian Opera season is brief in comparison with former times, and, if only on that account, ought, one would imagine, to be more brilliant; but whether the fact be so or the contrary, it is not our present purpose to examine.

Among the singers unknown to this country whose names were advertised in the prospectus which it is usual to issue before the commencement of the season, only one can be said to have created a really strong impression. That one, it is almost superfluous to add, is Madame Maria Vilda, whose fine soprano voice took the operatic world by assault when it first made itself heard in Norma, who lost some little of her suddenly acquired prestige by a very mediocre performance of Lucrezia Borgia, and who won back her laurels fairly enough as Leonora in the Traviata. Not to enter anew into the general question of this lady's merits, we may say at once that, possessing no dramatic talent, nor even the promise of it, she is better suited in the last-named opera than in either Norma or Lucrezia. True, Leonora is supposed to be both young and beautiful, neither of which conditions is fulfilled in the person of Madame Vilda; but an elderly prima donna, even unaccompanied by the redeeming qualities that made Ninon de l'Enclos bewitching at seventy, has recently been by no means a very unusual rarity. The chief thing to be regretted in Madame Vilda's case is that, having begun stage life some twenty years too late, no expectation can be entertained of her acquiring within a reasonable period the experience indispensable to perfect herself in her art. Every year with her is, unfortunately, a year to the bad, instead of, as with a younger aspirant, a year to the good. Still she has a voice the power and rare quality of which are undeniable; and that voice may exercise a charm for some time hence, notwithstanding the evident fact that it has not been trained on such legitimate principles as to warrant a hope that she can ever become a much more practised singer than she is now. Next to Madame Vilda, Mr. Gye's subscribers have had least cause to be dissatisfied with Mdle. Aglaja Orgeni, another German soprano, who early in the season won considerable credit by her performance in the Traviata and Lucia di Lammermoor—a credit scarcely maintained by her subsequent essay in Martha. The strongly-flavored mannerisms of Madame Viardot Garcia, which are of course imparted to her pupils, and have done much to spoil the most gifted of them (Mdle. Desirée Artot), do not consort with the music which M. Flotow (a Russian (?) composer of whom the country of Glinka and Borntianski has small reason to be proud) put into the mouth of his Lady Enrichetta—music that, apart from the melody of the "Groves of Blarney" (not M. Flotow's), is insipidity itself. But Mdle. Orgeni—whose voice, though small in volume, is sweet in quality, flexible, and of fair compass—has youth in her favor. As an actress, while provokingly tame, she is natural, lady-like, and seemingly intelligent; the rest may follow. In short, though she has a great deal to learn and something to unlearn, we are warranted in looking to Mdle. Orgeni's future career with interest. Mdle. Morensi, the young American, but recently from Copenhagen—"contralto" or "mezzo-soprano" at pleasure—is a lively actress, as was evinced by her impersonation of Nancy (Martha), and still more remarkably by her Lady Coburg (Fra Diavolo); but she is wholly unformed as a singer. Yet she has attractions which, combined with youth, must always make her acceptable, provided she conscientiously strives to improve. It was a pity that a lady thus endowed should be so often exhibited under the grimy aspect of Azucena, the most emphatic illustration of boredom to be cited from the operatic repertory. A pity too that, when not assuming the complexion and habiliments of a ranting old sorceress, she should so often come forth in man's attire—as Urban, a page, or as Siebel, a sentimental lover, the interpolation of whom into Faust has brought down upon MM. Barbier and Carré the malediction of every worshipper of Germany's great poet. Had Mdle. Morensi been seen more frequently, dulce subridens, in the costume that best becomes her sex, she would perhaps have been more highly thought of. Under any circumstances she will be welcome next year.

Mdile. Marietta Biancolini, another young contralto, was only heard as Maffeo Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia; nor did the impression she created justify regret that further opportunities should not have been awarded her. Her sole claim to consideration was the fact—now rather an exception than a rule—of her being Italian pur sang. A good contralto seems as hard to meet with as a good tenor, or that scarcest of operatic phenomena, a "comprimaria" not only practised but willing. There seems to be a rooted objection among singers of our day to accept any less distinction than that of "prima donna assoluta—absolute first lady. Thus a manager is at his wits' end to apportion the secondary characters in an opera, even respectably.

The new singers of the other sex whom Mr. Gye has introduced to the public this year are Signors Fancelli and Nicolini—both tenors. The most recent performance of Signor Fancelli (as Contino del Fiore, in Crispino e la Comare) gave us no reason to modify the opinion founded upon the début as Edgardo, and strengthened by his subsequent essay as Elvino. To a voice which, however agreeable in quality, is wholly wanting in power—a tenorino leggiérissimo, though by no means over-flexible—he unites a degree of expression which at intervals endows his singing with a certain charm, but which has the slight drawback of being always the same. The last time you hear Signor Fancelli you find you have learned no more of him than when you heard him first; and for the best of reasons—there is nothing more to learn. The same privilege was not allowed us of testing the claims of Signor Nicolini, whose first appearance (as Edgardo) was also his last. To the precipitate retreat of this gentleman we were indebted for the Fra Diavolo of Signor Naudin an Italian, just as French in his manner, or rather mannerism, as Signor Nicolini (M. Nicolas), who is a Frenchman. Signor Naudin having been kept away last season by the Africaine of Meyerbeer, we include him among the new-comers, and at once acknowledge the substantial aid he has afforded to the theatre by his readiness and versatility. We cannot admire either his voice or his style of singing, which, it must be presumed, is natural to him, but which is affected, over-strained, and artificial. Credit, nevertheless, must be allowed to an artist who, besides being invariably correct, is able to sustain more than respectably so wide a range of characters. There is but little in common between any two of such parts as Vasco de Gama, Pollio, Danilowitz, Fra Diavolo, &c., but Signor Naudin, after his manner, sings them equally well, although he can hardly be said to act them, histrionic genius not being among his special gifts. M. Faure, who disdains to Italianize his patronym, had been equally passed into Meyerbeer's service; and thus London was deprived of him, too, for a season. No matter what name M. Faure assumed, it would be impossible to take him for Italian, or indeed for anything else than French. Though he uses the Italian tongue with sufficient fluency, we can scarcely believe he is singing in Italian, more especially when his companions are thorough "Romans," like Mdle. Adelina Patti, Signor Mario, and Signor Ronconi—as is the case in the delightful performance of L'Elisir d'Amore. We are not on the side of those who enthusiastically praise M. Faure. On the contrary, we think his voice, while flexible and thoroughly under command, hard and unmusical in quality; as a singer we consider him prone to exaggerated emphasis and other faults; whilst as an actor we are disposed to class him in the least elevated school of histrionic art—the realistic, or demonstrative. Still it cannot be denied that without this clever Frenchman it would be difficult to give Don Giovanni—for Don Giovanni with such a Don Giovanni as Signor Graziani would be intolerable; it would be difficult to provide a suitable representation of L'Etoile du Nord—for none can have forgotten how very little "Peter the Great" appeared, a twelvemonth since, under the aspect of that Italianized Frenchman, Signor Auri; and it would be difficult to fill certain characters of more or less importance in other operas. In versatility M. Faure is even more than a match for Signor Naudin; and now that Signor Tamburini has wisely abandoned the stage, and Signor Ronconi has so little voice left that he may be said to live upon the strength of his admirable comedy, just as certain physical subjects may exist for years by breathing through a single lung, we ought to be glad of such a ready and eager Frenchman. Besides, the alternative would be Signor Graziani; and aut Faure aut Graziani is a question which would not take long to resolve. It was a great disappointment, indeed, not to see M. Faure in the part which has earned him his more recent laurels. About his Nelusko there is but one opinion, and the policy of Mr. Gye in recurring to the grotesque piece of pantomime offered by the Nelusko of Signor Graziani, when the original Nelusko, the Nelusko of Meyerbeer's own choice, was in the theatre, baffles comprehension.

In other respects, although again the familiar voice of Signor Tamberlik was unheard; although Mdle. Carlotta Patti, who was to have played some of the parts ultimately confided to Madame Sherrington, Mdle. Fanny Deconet, stranger, contralto, and (ominous affix) "pupil of Madame Viardot," and Herr Schmid, the German bass (with whom last year to be disposed was an exception rather than a rule) while announced to the prospectus, were non-forthcoming; although we missed Herr Wachtel, Stentor among Teutonic tenors, the Berlin Vasco of Meyerbeer's choice; although Mdle. Marie Battu, snatched from us by that omnivorous Africaine, was not restored to us, with her companions, Signor Naudin and M. Faure; and although neither Madame Vandenhoevel Duprez nor Madame Galetti, who both made a good impression last year, came back to have that impression confirmed, the company was wonderful strong and attractive. Mdle. Adelina Patti and Mdle. Pauline Lucca again divided between them the admiration of the habitués; the votaries of legitimate art, of consummate singing, and of consummate acting being unanimously with the former, the admirers of the laissez-aller style, united to pretty, petulant eccentricity, with the latter. Each earned fresh bays with new characters—Mdle. Patti with Caterina, in L'Etoile du Nord; Mdle. Lucca (whose success in the Favorita was questionable) with Zerlina, in Fra Diavolo; each, too, essayed another part, of which we shall elsewhere speak. About the operas belonging to the established repertory in which these ladies appeared we need not say another word, having already, in previous articles, well-nigh exhausted the topic. And, indeed, what is there new to say about the Barbiere, Lucia, Don Giovanni, L'Elisir, La Sonnambula, in which Mdle. Patti took part, or about the Africaine, the Illeguents, or Faust e Margherita, which fell to the share of Mdle. Lucca? Happy the manager in the possession of two such "shining stars," compared with whom, in the eyes of opera-goers, "the brothers of Helen" are as rushlights! With Mdles. Patti and Lucca have been variously associated Signor Mario, who, are perennius, can only be regarded as a prodigy, who has withstood the shock of Meyerbeer's music now for nearly twenty years, and still endures, the most chivalrous of Raouls, the most sublime of Prophets, and, par dessus le marché, the most intense and poetical of lovers (Faust to witness).

In the way of novelty, the Covent Garden manager has been this year less adventurous than usual. True, his prospectus did not hint at much—two operas new to the theatre and a revival of the classic masterpieces comprising the sum total; but only an instalment of the promised little has been realized. One of the new operas was Don Sebastiano—"held by Continental critics" (says Mr. Gye) "to be, of its class," the grandest and most perfect work" of Donizetti. We have always heard Don Sebastien de Portugal reckoned by "Continental," as by insular critics, who happen to be acquainted with it, as the duldest; but duldest or "grandest and most perfect" matters little, seeing that it did not put in an appearance. The "classic revival" was to be Le Nozze di Figaro, with the additional attraction of Madlle. Adelina Patti and Pauline Lucca in the parts of Susanna and Cherubino. At the eleventh hour, however, the name of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was substituted for that of Madlle. Patti, and for some reason unexplained the production of Mozart's opera was deferred until the very last moment, so that, the season terminating, only two representations could under any circumstances possibly take place. The other new opera (not quite unknown in England by the way, inasmuch as it was produced nine years ago at the St. James's Theatre) has been given. Whether such a bagatelle as Crispino e la Comare was at all worthy to form part of the repertory of a magnificent lyric establishment like the Royal Italian Opera, may be a question. The brothers Luigi and Frederico Ricci, but poor composers under any conditions, do not, like the sticks, become stronger by cohesion. Two nonentities do not make an entity; nor would twenty Riccis make a Rossini. The libretto of Signor F. M. Piave, the same ingenious gentleman who constructed an opera-book out of M. Hugo's Ernani for Signor Verdi, though aptly described by the author as a "melodramma-fantastico-giocosco," and as fantastic (if not dramatic) as possible, is harmlessly diverting; and it is even more to the humor of the situations, and to the inimitable acting of Signor Ronconi and Madlle. Patti, as the cobbler and his wife, than to the music, however lively, that the extraordinary effect created by the duet in the first, and the trio for basses in the last act, is due.

We cannot unreservedly compliment Mr. Gye on his revival of Le Nozze di Figaro. Without stopping to grumble at the substitution of Madame Sherrington for Madlle. Patti in Susanna, and Signor Ciampi for Signor Ronconi in Bartolo, it may be stated generally that the cast, in every instance but two, might have been better. The exceptions are the Countess of Mille. Desiree Artot, a performance at once elegant and artistic, and the Cherubino of Madlle. Pauline Lucca, than which, although musically by no means perfect, anything more original and lively has not for a long time been witnessed. The Count in the hands of Signor Graziani is deprived of all force of individuality—a mere lay figure, in short; nor does Signor Graziani atone for histrionic insignificance by entering with anything approaching heartiness into the spirit of the music. As a counterpart to this, M. Faure's Figaro is not Figaro at all, but a walking gentleman dressed up in the costume which tradition assigns to the most famous of stage barbers. Perhaps in no other character has this gentleman's want of dramatic perception been so conspicuous; and as he sings the music for the most part well, it is the more to be regretted. Madame Sherrington's Susanna, a mere clever commonplace, calls for no particular remark; there is nothing particular to urge against it, and nothing particular to say in its favor. But such wonderful music—the best, perhaps, of Mozart's dramatic music, or at all events not inferior to Don Giovanni—with such an orchestra, under the control of such a conductor as Mr. Costa, to take part in it, must always be welcome. Even averting the eyes from the stage during the performance, it would be a luxury alone to hear it—so great a luxury that not a bar can be spared, and it is impossible to regard altogether with indifference certain curtailments (especially those in the finale to the third act, the scene of the wedding festival), which are not merely unnecessary, but unadvisable. The revival of Figaro, however, was a worthy climax to the season.

Music in its larger Meanings.

We practical Americans begin to respect Music as an Art, as a language of the soul, as part of the permanent revelation of God, and as one of the great divine agencies by which Humanity even now, is led on toward the fulfilment of its glorious destiny. Once it was only as an amusement, (more or less refined it is true; but still as an amusement), or as a mere church ceremony, that men thought of music. It is beginning to be esteemed as Art. And (whatever moralists may say against the German fashion of using the term "artist" and "artistical" to denote the highest accomplishments of man in his creative sphere,) we maintain that when any thing is taking up and pursued in the spirit in which a true Artist always lives and works, that thing becomes the most earnest, the most elevating, the most religious occupation of which man is capable, and the most productive of permanent blessings to mankind. We are beginning to respect the Art, to look to it for such influences as we do to Poetry, to Eloquence, to any thing that comes from the most religious depths of Man. That is something, when we have not the genius to create. Musical as yet we scarcely are, in the true sense. We have no great composers; no great performances in our churches; no well-endowed and thorough academies to train the artist, or to educate the public taste by frequent hearings of the finest compositions, except in a very limited degree. Our concerts often are attended more from fashion, it may be, than from real love. Our daughters are taught the piano as an accomplishment, to make them "ladies," rather than to inspire their womanhood with that Music which has been termed "the feminine principle in the Universe." Yet there are fine beginnings. Some excellent societies in our cities are learning the love of what is great and permanent, by their attempts to perform it; the number of appreciating listeners is sure to grow; singing-schools "for the million" are unlocking the outer musical sense for all, that, if they have a soul, this channel to it need not be obstructed; the real virtuosos come from Europe to give us a touch of their quality, having in their turn discovered that Jonathan has learned how to spend money for music; and finally, much excellent music is printed here, which our young ladies (and young men, too—they learn the piano,) study in lieu of the trash in which music masters dealt so long.

This we have called a Musical Movement; for we believe it to be one of the outward accompaniments, expressions and instrumentalities of the greatest movement which ever yet engaged Humanity; of which this our America, the common gathering place of all nations, is destined to become the theatre. Whenever the life of a people is deep; whenever broad and universal sentiments absorb and harmonize the petty egotisms and discords of men; whenever Humanity is at all inspired with a consciousness of its great destiny; whenever Love gives the tone to the feelings, the thoughts, and the activity of an age; whenever a hundred Reforms, all springing from so deep a source, all tend, in the very antagonism of their one-sidedness, in the very bigotry of their earnestness, to one grand thought and aim, the Unity of the race; in short, whenever there is a Movement, then, too, as by a law of correspondence, there should be a new development of the passion and the art of music. It gives out music, (such a movement) as it is said the spherèd planets do. Because Music is the natural language of Sentiment. Speech is the language of Thought; but underlying all articulate speech there is a basis of pure Tone; just as every thought of the understanding is prompted by a feeling. Sentiment seeks analogies, resemblances, and has a constant tendency to Unity. Thought analyzes and insists upon distinctions, differences, individualities; it gives birth to creeds and doctrines, to theories and schemes of life, to artificial laws and expedients, and effects no inward, but only outward union. It is only when men are moved by some great sentiment, (and all great sentiments are in some way forms of the cardinal and highest principle of Love,) that they become inwardly united; then only is there any society; and then society becomes a living conscious whole, one body harmoniously compacted of many members. The spirit of such a union is already felt, and will demand a language, even before it can get an organization. Speech alone will not content; Tone, through all its infinite shades of Modulation, Melody, and Harmony, becomes indispensable to the utterance of the full soul. For it would speak a universal language, which Asia and America alike may comprehend, with no interpreter and no dictionary but the heart, out of which and to which proceedeth all music.

If it be true, then, that Humanity is now on the verge, nay in the midst of a grand onward movement; that society is inspired, not with dreams merely, but with most earnest, energetic strivings after the realization of a Divine Order (strange, and ultra, and conflicting as may be the forms which that inspiration often takes,) then there is great significance in this growing interest now felt in music. Call it fashion, if you will, and call fashion an ape; still it is the ape of something, and not of nothing. This thought we have evermore to unfold. It never can be unfolded to the end; for its sense and its applications are quite infinite. In this light mainly would we treat of Music, as the language of that deeper experience in which all men are most nearly one; the language of those central fires, great heaven-born Passions of the soul, which prompt to holy ties of Love, of Friendship, of Family, of Social Order, which through these blissful foretastes of union steadily invite and draw us on to everlasting Unity with God; and which impel us to seek a type of his perfections, as well as of what our life should be, in the harmonies of outward Nature. We love to consider Music both as one of the expressions, and as one of the inspiring causes of the restless, but prophetic spirit of these times. Of course, then, we do not say much of mere musical trifles. It is our business, constantly to notice and uphold for study, and for imitation, music which is deep and earnest; which does not merely seek to amuse; but which, (be it in the form called Secular, or Sacred, be it song, or opera, or oratorio, or orchestra,) is the most religious outpouring of the composer's life. We feel that we do most good by speaking most of works of genius, even when the theme is old, and by measuring the new, not so much by their standard, as by the standard by which they measured themselves. And yet so far as time permits, we trust that humbler efforts, conceived in a true spirit and with any promising signs of talent, shall not be beneath our criticism. However, it is not so much the composition, as the performance of music, which invites attention now. To guide public taste in its selection, to inspire artists in their performance, and above all to exhort the musician to a high sense of the dignity of his profession, and teach others to respect it, too, must be our aim in criticism.

We shall never say more than we owe to Music. Could we only share the blessing, as we would, with others! It would be a worthy contribution to the great work of the times. Ever grateful let us be to music, then, that, in times when there seemed almost no sincerity, no faith, no earnestness; when the religion of society seemed its deadest manifestation; when every thought of the Ideal was damped by the triumphant sneers and the experimental arguments of worldliness; when no doctrines, no philosophies, no spheres open to young activity looked in any way inspiring, but altogether barren of promise and fatal to self-respect; when nothing satisfied, and the whole framework of society gave the lie to the voice of the preacher and of the heart;—ever grateful let us be, those of us whom an early passion for music seized upon with power, that this idle boy's love, as the elders called it, this wayward, impracticable enthusiasm, this besetting sin of indulgence, became our initiation into the great hopes of the Future, haunting us with a faith most irresistible though indistinct, that better days shall come, that the real destiny of Man is Unity and Harmony, and that the Law of Necessity must yield at length to the holier Law of Attraction,—of Liberty and Love.

New Music.

A formidable pile of specimen copies of new compositions and new editions of old has long loomed before us, the very shadow thereof weighing on our conscience, and it still accumulates. Each several bundle, nay, each piece, came courting a good word, or a few lines of what is conventionally called criticism. Many times have we summoned up a little courage to attack the mountain and try to say of each and all what should be said, and as often have recoiled in terror and despair. For what could be said? What critical discrimination can be made between a thousand and one songs, with or without words, or fantasies, nocturnes, caprices and what not for the piano, so few of which offer any features which fix any impression of individuality in the mind, as human faces do however ordinary? What can be said of one that has not already been said of a hundred others? Shall we just mention each in those hacknied terms of compliment employed so cheaply by the newspapers? That is what publishers love; but that is advertisement, nothing more, and what they can best do themselves, for no one is expected to be critical in praising his own child; but criticism it is not, and to our readers such matter would be the dullest bore. Shall we try to weigh each work conscientiously and carefully and state its exact worth? It might serve the good end of making publishers more careful what they send us; but the task, when you approach it, is much more formidable than it looks at first sight and in the general; each item of it costing more time, more study and deliberation, and more words than one busy editor's life or one journal's pages contain room for. Many a time we should have made some notice, have said something of these things, if there had not been so much to say, so much to weigh, printer the meanwhile pressing for immediate "copy." And so with each delay the mountain has grown bigger, and the problem still more vague and shadowy and helpless.

But the pile contains, amid much that is shallow, worthless, commonplace, ephemeral, much also that is valuable, much indeed of the very best; and we propose to try to render some account of the heterogeneous conglomerate and by degrees reduce the mountain till we cease to feel its shadow. At present we can but begin to allude to a few of the more interesting things.

Mr. John K. Paine's Mass in D (written for voices, orchestra and organ, but now published in vocal and piano score, in very beautiful style by Beer & Schirmer, New York), is of course too important a work to be disposed of in a moment. We can only say that, so far as we have been able to get acquainted with it in this form, it is full of earnest, dignified, deeply felt, carefully and skilfully wrought music. The manner in which the several texts are musically expressed is always appropriate, sometimes strikingly original; it never for a moment descends to triviality, not even in the Dona nobis. It is the serious, sincere work of one who has lovingly and faithfully studied the great art of Sebastian Bach. Whether it have genius or not, time must show; but such an effort challenges respect and real criticism; it ought to be performed in full and fairly tested; for, whatever it may lack, we can hardly doubt that it is the most important effort in sacred composition yet made by an American.—Mass writing seems to fire the imagination, or at least the ambition of our young musicians, for already there are two more Masses announced, one by Mr. C. C. Stearns, of Worcester, published by Ditson, and one by Mr. Eugene Thayer, to be published by Russell. We hope to make acquaintance with them.—We would fain speak also of numerous "Collections" of sacred music, of various merit. Among the best are W. H. Walter's Manual of Church Music (New York: S. T. Gordon), and The Sanctuary, a collection of original Quarters and Anthems, by August Kreissmann (Boston: G. D. Russell & Co.), not very original, but smoothly, clearly written, in good style. We may also name a little Catholic book for children, Cantica Sacra, by Rev. J. H. Cornell, (Boston: Patrick Donahoe). Most of the tunes are original; fresh, pleasing and expressive; for two voices, but the four-part harmony is made complete in the piano accompaniment, in which the parts are carried along in good polyphonic style. If the words of the hymns were always as well suited to childhood as Father Carroll's tunes, we should be inclined to call it the best Sunday School music that we know.

Out of the multitude of Songs we can draw much which we would sing you if we could, for it is unsatisfactory and awkward talking about such delicate, fine things. Surely the taste of our people has improved, for many are the good songs, the real "gems of song" now almost daily published. Best of all, best that the whole repertoire of Song affords (since Mozart), are these series of songs by Robert Franz, Schumann, Schubert and Mendelssohn, which Ditson & Co. have lately issued and are still issuing. Especially these one and twenty songs by Franz. Nothing better, nothing sweeter, fresher, more original, more perfect in expression, more refined and deeply musical in harmony, more sure of the charm lasting, can be found than Franz has given us in his two hundred and more songs, each one of which is so individual, each so true a reproduction of a true bit of poetry. This collection contains many of the best, some well-known, others equally deserving to be known. The words have been carefully and conscientiously translated anew, so as to preserve the flavor of the poem as well as to fit each line and syllable as truly as possible to the music. We hope yet to review the list in detail. These, added to earlier series issued by other Boston publishers (but this is much the richest) make us rich indeed in Franz Songs brought home to our doors. Indeed Boston may pride herself on this fact.—The Schumann series is almost as interesting. It contains 13 pieces. Nine of them are from the Cycle of Songs, called Liederkreis, the words from Heine's Dichterliebe (Poet's love), those little exquisite breaths of Song, so delicate and full of feeling, with now and then a bit of playful fancy, which strung together form an opaline and ever-shifting whole of warm and wondrous color. Just the ones which our Mr. Kreissmann used to sing are here selected, beginning with "Im wunderschönen Monat Mai" and ending with "Ich grolle nicht." Besides these there is the impassioned, mystical "Du meine Seele, du meine Herz," &c., &c.

Speaking of Songs, too, there are some good new ones, written in this country. Schubert, of New York, has published "Hantz," a Liederkreis out of that Persian poet's love songs, by F. L. Ritter, the words in German and with English translation by Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter. The composer shows the influence of Schumann and Franz, especially the former, and need not be ashamed to own it. The circle of Songs, ten in number, are well related to each other, yet of charming variety. They all show thorough and refined musicianship, poetic feeling, richness and delicacy of accompaniment, and they impress us as thoughtful and imaginative productions; not carrying you away at once, however, like those of Schumann. We hope to say more of them.—We may also name "Goldbeck's Love Songs," eleven in number, published by Pond & Co., New York, as quite superior to the common run of new songs. They show cultivated musicianship, ready resource, and express their several poems well. For instance, Tennyson's "Bugle Song," though very simple, catches the spirit of it; yet this is a case of a poem so complete and musical in itself, that the poem perhaps is better without any music.

(Here printer cuts us off; we shall resume.)

MUSIC ON THE COMMON. The pleasant concerts in the open air came to a close last week, much to the regret of thousands of happy promenaders of all classes. The performance last Saturday evening (the concerts for some time past have wisely been given an hour later than before, namely, from seven to nine) was by the Germania Band and remarkably good. Indeed on several occasions, listening to different bands, we have heard much that might be praised, and have only been surprised that so much pleasure, so much that was really musical could be afforded by mere brass bands of sixteen instruments. If these could arrest the steps of even fastidious listeners, and hold the general crowd delighted, how much more might be achieved by the organization of that "Civic Band" which we have from year to year suggested, not brass, not military, but for civic, peaceful, graceful ends, for public celebrations and processions, for school and academic festivals, to be under municipal patronage, and especially for concerts for the people, now in halls and now in the open air! Such band to consist of say sixty instruments, with full complement of clarionets, bassoons, flutes, French horns, &c., as well as brass.

The little brass bands have for the most part done well. The selections of music too, so far as we have chanced to notice, have averaged better than in former years, although there is still too much of the Italian operatic sort, which sounds too much like mock pathos and poor melodramatic tragedy thus caricatured in brass, even if it be good in the original. We do not object to the lighter dance and quickstep pieces, when they are as graceful and lively as some we heard, and when there is not so much of that sort as to become monotonous. One evening we heard four pieces of real solid character, such as one can enjoy anywhere. One was the overture to Egmont, a bold undertaking for a brass band, but more effective than we should have thought possible, though somewhat such a reminder of the original as we get of a fine painting when we see it worked in worsted; but the Beethoven fire and power were there. Another was the "Wedding March," capably played. But what most interested us was the performance of two Chorales, in four-part harmony, two taken from Mendelssohn's St. Paul. Of the graver music given by the bands nothing has sounded better or proved more satisfactory, quite confirming our suggestion that such chorales, harmonized as they are by Bach or Mendelssohn, are among the things best suited for a choir of brass instruments. We also coupled Gluck with that suggestion, and we are pleased to see that at a late concert in the Central Park, New York, a selection from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris met with decided favor from the crowd.

The beauty of the scene has of course enhanced the charm of the music. As the Advertiser truly says:

At any one of these occasions, with the velvet slopes and leafy arches of the Common in the full glory of verdure; with the natural amphitheatre around the music stand filled with an audience made up, in true democratic style, of both sexes in equal proportion, of many races and of all conditions in life; with the paths in the neighborhood occupied by endless processions of promenaders, all merry and not disdaining to show their enjoyment, all in good humor with the world and each other; with sweet music filling the ears of all and binding the multitude together in a common sympathy; with the rays first of the setting sun and later of the rising moon giving color and picturesque effect to the scene;—at any of the concerts, one saw much to make him proud of his country and the city of his residence, and to warm his heart toward his fellow citizens and mankind in general.

MARETZEK'S ITALIAN OPERA. The American Art Journal is "able to satisfy the public curiosity and anxiety" (!) on this great subject; thus:

Deprived for the present of its natural home, Mr. Maretzek's company will lead a rather predatory [word well chosen—vide Worcester] life for a few weeks to come. The following will show the extent of their wandering, the places they will visit, and the dates. The season will commence in Brooklyn, October the 10th, and will last till the 13th; in Philadelphia from October the 15th to the 27th; in Pittsburgh from the 29th to November the 3d; in Brooklyn from the 5th to the 8th; in Boston from the 12th to the 25th; in New York, at the Winter Garden, from the 26th of November until January, 1867. It is expected that the New York Academy of Music will be rebuilt and ready for occupation on or about the first of January, 1867. The greatest activity is displayed in pushing the work forward; not a moment is lost, for all the departments are progressing together. The scenery, decorations and fixtures for the interior, together with the properties, will be ready to put in the house the day that it is ready to receive them. We may, therefore, count with some certainty upon the promise of the architect to have the Academy ready for operatic purposes, immediately after New Year's day.

The full strength of Mr. Maretzek's company will necessarily be reserved for the grand season at the Academy of Music, but his company will be admirable in advance of that. It will consist of Miss Kellogg, Mlle. Ronconi, Senorita Carmelina Poch, Mme. Ortolani, and Miss Hauch, who made so successful a debut at Mr. Leonard Jerome's private Opera House, last season. The Contralto will be Mme. Testa, who is spoken of very highly. Signor Mazzoleni, Signor Beragli, Signor Ronconi, the great Buffo, Signor Bellini and Signor Antonucci. The repertoire will consist of the lighter operas, among them Harold's beautiful opera "Zampa," which has never been given on the Italian stage in this country.

We are further relieved of the "anxiety" aforementioned by the N. Y. Weekly Review, of Aug. 25, which tells us:

Signor Ronconi and his daughter arrived last Wednesday in the Persia, and were received, by Max Maretzek and some members of his staff, with all the honors due to the eminent buffo. Thus all the members of Mr. Maretzek's troupe are in America, with the exception of Signor Beragli, who is expected here shortly. The reputation of this gentleman as an artist is very good; we are informed by good judges of music, who heard him in London, that he is a highly talented artist and possesses a remarkably sweet and beautiful voice. Among the operas which Mr. Maretzek will bring out or revive next winter, we mention "Don Bucafo," "Zampa," "The Prophet," "Huguenots," "Elisir d'Amore," "Fra Diavolo." In point of repertoire the season will be one of the most interesting and varied we have ever had.

NO GERMAN OPERA, it seems! According to the Review, Mr. Grover, as well as Mr. Grau, has given up the idea of operatic performances next season. The Review says:

With less regret we miss the German opera, as it would have been incomplete, a regular torso, and would have tended more to injure art than to help it. Mr. Grover had received the most brilliant propositions for engagements from European artists of high reputation, but he preferred to stick to his cheap opera troupe, and therefore we could not have expected anything worth hearing from his singers. It is well that the public is spared hearing mutilated operas, the performances of which would have almost made the dead composers turn in their graves. The German singers now in this country will probably form flying corps, and roam through the States of the Union. It cannot be doubted that a good German opera troupe possesses all the elements of vitality and success in America, if the management is at the same time an artistic and liberal one, and if discipline is maintained among the singers; but it was easier for Daniel to get along with the wild beasts whose cheerful company he had to enjoy, than for a manager to quell the continuous rioting and disturbances of a German troupe.

Doubtless there is some reason in this; nevertheless such operas as Mr. Grover did give here in Boston repeatedly,—such performances of Fidelio, Der Freyschütz, La Dame Blanche, &c.,—was a great gain to the cause of good music compared with anything we get now-a-days from the Italian troupes. Must it be left wholly to the Italians?

MR. BATEMAN'S TOUR IN THE UNITED STATES.—Mr. Bateman has already engaged for his approaching tour through the principal cities of America, in the forthcoming autumn and winter: Madama Parepa, our renowned soprano; Signor Ferranti, the well known buffo; Mr. Levy, the dashing cornet-piston (Cornet Levy); Herr Rosa, the able German violinist; Signor Fortuna (basso baritone); and Signor Brignoli, the silver-voiced tenor from the Royal Italian Opera, whose vogue in North and South America is notorious. Mr. J. L. Hatton, the popular composer, is to be conductor and accompanist. Further arrangements are pending. The concerts in Steinway's New Hall (New York) will be continued, on a scale of the greatest attraction, without interruption, till the spring.

The above is from the London Musical World, which omits to mention Mr. Mills, the New York pianist, who is also to be a member of the troupe.

JULIUS EICHBERG. Boston, we are sorry to learn, seems after all to have lost this valuable musician. The New York Review says:

We are happy to announce that Messrs. Baker and Smith have prevailed upon the talented Bostonian, Mr. Eichberg, to settle in New York and conduct English opéra bouffe at their theatre in Broadway. Mr. Eichberg's opera "The Two Cadis," which he considers his best work, will soon be given, and will be followed by other operas of the English and French school. We hope to see Offenbach, Bazin and similar composers represented, beside Wallace, Balfe and Macfarren. Mr. Eichberg's eminent talent has so often been the subject of our remarks that we can refrain from praising him again. All we desire to do is to congratulate the public of New York that they have gained the services of a young composer of unmistakably high attainments.

MORE ITALIAN OPERA. The Art Journal says: Mr. Draper inaugurates his operatic season at the New French Theatre, in Fourteenth street, on Saturday evening, but not with English Opera, as he originally intended. His preparations in that department not being completed, he has engaged an excellent Italian company, and will give a series of Italian Operas, carefully studied and produced. The artists already engaged are Signora Boschetti, Signor Tamaro, Signor Orlandini and Signor Barili. The Opera to be given that evening is Rossini's "Barbieri de Siviglia." A large and well-selected Italian chorus has been engaged, and an orchestra containing some of our best musicians.

The next opera produced will probably be Gounod's "Faust," in which Signora Boschetti, as Marguerite, made so marked a sensation.

MR. JOHN K. PAINE, our young composer and organist, left London early in August for the continent, intending to remain there till the end of October. But the London Journal which tells us of this is in error in stating that Mr. Paine's Mass has been performed by a society in Boston. It has not been performed, though it deserves to be; and we hope soon to hear that it has been performed somewhere in Europe and the stamp of intelligent approval put upon it.

The marriage of ALFRED JAEEL and Mlle. TRAUTMANN is announced in foreign papers. The bride is herself a pianist of some distinction. The ceremony took place at the Church of the Madeleine, Paris. Ullmann, blandest of papas to artists who are fortune's favorites, is said to have witnessed the contract, and M. Camille Saint-Saëns to have played the organ at the nuptial mass. Jaell did wonders with two hands; now we trust he will revisit us four-handed.

ALOYS SCHMIDT, an artist of good reputation as composer and pianist, died at Frankfort on the 25th of July, at the age of 78. He wrote operas, symphonies, concertos, solo pieces; and his Studies, in four books, are much in use.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Stammering Trio. "Orpheans." 30
A very amusing and musical comic glee.
Daughter, I will drink no more. Song. A. Rochow. 30
A good temperance song. Music is coming nobly to the rescue in the great reform. An acceptable addition to a good list.
Darling Mary of the sea. Song and chorus. C. T. Doeltger. 35
I think of thee at morn, love. Ballad. G. Goodfellow. 30
In the valley she is sleeping. J. P. Webster. 30
Three pleasing and easy ballads, in the style which has become so popular.
I love him, I dream of him. Song. Dolores. 30
Three Fishers. 2d setting. S. D. S. 50
More in classical style than the preceding, the latter song being Kingsley's familiar poem, set to new music.
Lauda Sion. Quartette or Chorus. Lambillotte. 40
Tantum Ergo. Duet. "The Gloria." M. Girac. 40
Latin words only, and have pleasing music. It is a question whether the pleasure of singing solid music is not more enduring, when performed "in an unknown tongue."

Instrumental.

- Piano Piece, No. 5. IV. Bargiel. Op. 32. 20
do. 6. do. do. 20
do. 7. do. do. 35
do. 8. do. do. 20
Four more of these peculiar compositions, embodying much sweetness and originality. One or two of them would be acceptable organ pieces. None are difficult to those who play legato passages with facility.
I Vespri Siciliani. "Moisson d'Or." 20
Pretty air, well arranged for learners.
By the sad sea waves. Transcrip. B. Richards. 40
The original melody is preserved in all its beauty, and is afterward very gracefully varied. Moderately difficult.
Kingfisher Polka. C. Coote. 30
Mr. Coote improves on his former productions, which, sometimes, had only the merit of simplicity and clearness. This has more character, and is both pretty easy and quite brilliant.
Adolante. Polka militaire. G. Lafarge. 40
Has a sort of Frenchy neatness about it, with sufficient brilliancy. Not difficult.
Wedding March. J. R. Fairlamb. 50
Brilliant and melodious. A little difficult.
Souvenirs. Coll. of airs favoris. By D. Krug. Ea. 40
No. 1. La Stolla. Valse d'Arditi.
2. Hymne a la Nuit. "Desert." F. David.
3. Ay Chiquita. Chanson Espagnole. C. Gradien.
4. La Tradita. Rom. senti. L. Arditi.
5. L'Ardita. Valse brill. d'Arditi.
6. Leggero Invisibile. Bolero. Arditi.
7. A Grenade. Arietta Espag. de Rossini.
A collection of instrumental music of quite uncommon grace and beauty. The four pieces by Arditi are quite noticeable for their delicacy and sweetness, showing that "Il Bacio" was not the only fine musical idea in his head. These four have diverse character, and the harmony of one does not preclude the desire for the possession of another. The whole set might as well be purchased at once.

Books.

- Stearns' Mass in A. Cloth. $1.50
A Mass composed by Mr. C. C. Stearns of Worcester, Mass. It is in the usual Mass Form, with Kyrie, Gloria, Qui Tollis, Quoniam, Credo, Incarnatus, Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei, and Dona Nobis, and is very ably put together. Has Latin and English text, is not very difficult, and, while it takes a classical form, the manner of composition is sufficiently familiar and home-like to commend it to choirs and musical associations around the country.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Rossini and his Operas "The Barber of Seville" and "Othello."

(Translated for this Journal from the Presse, Vienna.)

Both operas were written in the same year (1816) at Naples; both hold a marked position, by their merit and success, among Rossini's works. And yet a position not so easily defined. There are few composers of Rossini's rank, who make it so difficult for criticism to determine periods of development in them, or discern turning-points of style and talent. Where with Rossini does the rosy morning of his talent end, and where the noonday height, the setting of the sun begin? With his Tancredi the youth of 21 was a celebrated man; his individuality seemed clearly stamped and fixed. He always remained the same, and yet grew always richer; with The Barber, Othello, L'Italiana in Algeri, &c., he made conquest of the world; with Moses and the Siege of Corinth, even of the French. Between these works again is always laid up something wholly insignificant and very short-lived; in each year Rossini shone once at the height of his full creative activity, and always in each year again relapsed into indifferent job work. Finally, he brought out the William Tell, the most remarkable card of leave-taking (p. p. c.) that a composer of Rossini's sort could leave behind.

In Tell Rossini's talent achieved not only its highest, but something altogether different from before; this work stands so isolated and peculiar in contrast with all his earlier efforts, that it is always tacitly excepted, when we speak especially of "the Rossini operas." And when, after years of silence, the now old maestro came out with a Stabat Mater, again his musical inventive faculty appeared as young as ever. And his style? It remained—always excepting Tell—both essentially and in outward particulars just what it always was. Changes in his style reveal themselves perhaps only to an eye sharpened by fond examination, yet they do exist and they seem interesting to us too. At first Rossini carelessly and joyously shook the rich tree of his talent; the blossoms raining down had the real unadulterated Italian, monotonously sweet orange blossom fragrance, such as breathes to us from many works of Cimarosa and of Paisiello. In this his first period (1809 to 1814) he wrote comic operas almost exclusively, and was peculiarly fond of farces; the only successful opera seria of these years was Tancredi. In the year 1814, Barbaja engaged the young composer for a series of years at Naples. New outward relations (to the impresario), and inward ones (his love to the Colbrand), here influenced his development, and weak as this influence may seem, it warrants our doctrinaire conscience in regarding Rossini's eight years at Naples as a sort of second period of his creative activity (1814 to 1822). Pledged by contract to write two new operas every year for Barbaja, Rossini became now more strongly impelled than he had been to serious opera. Besides Barbaja's preference, several outward circumstances may have contributed to this,—among others, the custom of making the entrée to serious operas higher than to comic.

A friend of Rossini's once expressed the suspicion that, had he come into the world as rich as Meyerbeer, he would never have composed any but comic operas. To us it seems more probable, that in that case he would have composed none at all. But the remark hits correctly the predominant tendency and talent of Rossini for lively subjects. The prima donna, for whom he had to write in Naples, was the beautiful Colbrand, absolute empress of himself and of Barbaja. Her voice, past its prime, was ill adapted for broad, sustained song; her delivery had plenty of virtuosity, but was without deep feeling, and so found its chief sphere in the ornamental and the brilliant. What wonder, if Rossini's music soon took on the physiognomy of his beloved? To write in her spirit, for her excellences, became the first law for Rossini, whose kindred nature served him all too well in this accommodation of himself. His music now assumes its pronounced tendency to the brilliant, the external, and becomes overloaded with embellishment. Who knows but what Rossini's talent, within its natural limits, would have assumed a deeper, warmer character, if the prima donna of his theatre and of his heart at that time had been named Pasta, instead of Colbrand?

Immediately after this Neapolitan period followed Rossini's triumphs in Vienna; his Italian celebrity had grown European. But world-celebrity and Paris are never to be thought of one without the other. The determining and characteristic feature of his last period is, in a word, the French influence. Under this influence appeared the Siege of Corinth, the Moses of that time, Count Ory, and William Tell; these in a certain manner form Rossini's third period (1825—1830). He has allowed French elements to influence him far less than his predecessors, Cherubini and Spontini, far less than his successors, Donizetti and Verdi; but he has not kept aloof from them. His countrymen remarked this French influence clearly enough; they scented it already in his Semiramide (1823), only they designated it as "stilo Tedesco" (German style)!

The merry Figaro and the wild Othello, then, are twin brothers in point of time. They even resemble each other more in form and features, than they willingly confess, or than they rightfully should in such a difference of position. An unjust fate has led the two handsome, amiable brothers in such different directions: pressing into the hands of the one the barber's basin, and of the other the field-marshal's staff! Figaro with his gifts and his culture was splendidly equal to his task; he has become the ideal of a barber and a prototype for comic opera. Othello, scarcely less gifted by nature, lacks the heroic energy, the manly earnestness for his vocation; his soul does not in the remotest degree possess the depth and passion, which can alone make such a fearful tragical end possible or conceivable.

Of the excellence of "The Barber" scarcely a word more need be said. Yet an original want in Rossini manifests itself even here: the want of deep and sincere feeling. The music of "The Barber" is everywhere brilliant, fiery, genial, nowhere warm and inward. Look at Rossini's cool and toying aria; look at the stiff, overlaid love duet in the second act. This cardinal want in Rossini's talent (the one of all his wants, which seems but weakly covered even in Tell) is only slightly perceptible in the merry, bubbling ensemble of The Barber; perhaps it even helps the unity of the picture. In Othello, on the contrary, we cannot get over this discrepancy between the subject-matter and the treatment; here the intrinsic coldness and emptiness, the trifling, glittering, prinked up show becomes intolerable.

We would not maintain that the composer had as little conception of the meaning of Shakespeare's tragedy, as had the poet who prepared his text for him, the Marquis Berio, well known for a good fellow and poor poet; but the power was denied to him, at all events, to find even a scanty expression for the tremendous import of "Othello." In respect of pure melodic invention Othello certainly belongs to Rossini's most luxurious productions; along with much utterly empty and long antiquated triviality, the opera contains very charming music. In point of dramatic worth, on the contrary, Othello is, in our opinion, greatly over-estimated. The overture is the introduction to an opera buffa; many numbers and passages of numbers, might, with a change of text, form ornaments to the opera buffa. The first two acts are sweet, brilliant concert music, nothing more; Othello self-complacent, proud as a peacock, Desdemona elegant and insignificant. In the third act Rossini as a lyric composer rises to a respectable height; in the grand scene of Desdemona the serious matter seems somewhat to have got the better of him. The short song of the Gondolier has a romantic twilight mood, which is one of the greatest rarities with Rossini. The song of Desdemona counts among Rossini's most beautiful inventions; here for a hundred measures long the seriousness of the situation is not interrupted by the tinkling bells of roulade. Unfortunately, the great duet with Othello, the acme of the tragedy, is again quite unworthy; the sovereign coloratur sets in again, and at Desdemona's painful cry: "Non arrestar il colpo, vibrato a questo core," the jumping crescendo motive from Don Basilio's La Calunnia air disports itself in the orchestra quite unrestrained. Admitting that Othello by its third act is superior, even in a dramatic point of view, to the five and twenty other lyrical tragedies of Rossini, still we cannot, apart from this comparison, follow a widespread critical tradition and recognize in Othello a music of soulful expression, of dramatic power and truth. Against a yet greater and more powerful majority of criticism, which in the development of music altogether only sees deterioration and decay (whereas every period, considered on the whole, only ripens other faults and excellences), we may add the perhaps superfluous remark, that in warmth of invention, in truth and power of dramatic expression the best operas of Bellini and Donizetti, nay even some scenes of Verdi, undoubtedly surpass Othello.

E. HANSLIK.

Mendelssohn as a Power.

Mendelssohn as a composer was the great restorer of the beautiful things of past days. Of a faculty eminently delicate, of a perception marvellously acute, of a judgment never wrong, of an experience rarely equalled, of an education peculiar—because chiefly the result of his own feeling—and of notions of duty attending his mission, grand, noble, and godlike, he dealt with music as he dealt with his soul. Many composers have their two sides—the false and the true; Mendelssohn had no side—he was always “terres atque rotundus”; he was incapable of manufacturing false images for the pleasure of others, and to his own heart the thought of falsehood in work was revulsion to his nature. In his boyhood he lived and moved among MEN—not simply professors of music, but men—warriors in art—armed from head to foot for fight in the work, and bravely and cheerily spending their lives and their powers for the advance of its kingdom and its governance over the universal heart of man. No one knew better than Mendelssohn that for things to come right, the means to the end must be right. His communings with the works of the mighty dead stirred up his heart to thorough work, and when he stepped forth to the church, the theatre, or the concert-room, he stepped from light into darkness, from the bright, clear sunshine into yellow fog and impenetrable mist. As there was no heart, there was no heat; he found the musical world frost-bitten and ice-bound. Ever modest—nay, humble—and never truly conscious of the fiery strength of his own powers, he dedicated himself to the revival of the great thoughts of those from whom he had learnt all he valued and loved. He desired the whole artistic world to be a witness of his harvest from the seed-sowing of centuries, to rejoice with him, and to sympathize with his veneration and gratitude.

He was eminently a church musician by profession, inclination, study and practice. His heart's desire was to write worship music, and to be concerned in its welfare and improvement. This governing feeling gave his music that full meaning—that purity of thought, earnestness of purpose, and that high-mindedness of intention which marks and vivifies all he did. He could have nothing in common with Meyerbeer, who wrote for the satisfaction of Scribe and the edification of Paris. His works excited no interest in the French capital—there all his enthusiasm and energy were thrown away upon those who could only see in them a certain precision of expression, and an exquisiteness of arrangement, at that time thought quite unnecessary. He could have nothing in common with Berlioz; for here, though the brain was strong, the heart was calm and unmoved, and in stepping aside in search of novelty and variety the adventurer had altogether missed the path to right and real beauty, and to all that had any real hold upon humanity. To have walked with Wagner was to have blindly tottered down the rough and uneven steps which lead to darkness and destruction. He looked around for a brother of the same heart for church song as himself, and found he stood alone. There was no mass composer living. Europe had not a musician who was doing anything for the music of the highest of church offices. As to oratorios, Schneider was vanishing, and Marx's “Moses” was only known to and valued by its composer. Spohr had cast his bread upon the waters, but it was bread that soon turned, having little of the true qualities of wheat in it. The last chorus of an oratorio is commonly the best test of a composer's powers as well as of his moral purpose, and the last choruses of Spohr's oratorios could never move the heart of Mendelssohn. The things in these choruses are neither new nor old. There was nothing here but a change, which led to the annihilation of all beauty.

Mendelssohn's first and chief labor was to put heart into music. From the inspiration of Seb. Bach he had learnt the nobleness and tenderness of really great writing, and his clear head, practised hand, and sympathetic spirit renewed the tones of the old prophet, and revived the zeal that had inspired his work. He caught up the spirit of the old Leipsic Cantor—it satisfied his own desires and longings—and passing by his subtleties, his never-ending dialectics, his deeply learned forms, Mendelssohn drew into himself the enthusiasm and affection which marks Bach's music, and so peculiarly renders it the music of the soul. But his new school was no mere echo of former days. All that he read and fed upon entered his spiritual life, and was developed according to the unaffected dictates of his own nature. He was no musician of the middle age, no miserable copyist of the subsequent organ giants; he had schooled himself into an individual expression, and matured a form which he claved to; and all that he read, and remembered, and used was passed through these two processes, and in this way became thoroughly Mendelssohnian. His vivid perception of the truth enabled him to fully grasp it, and in such a way as to make it afterwards his own personal revelation. In this way all his revivals assumed literally a new and natural existence, breathing all the freshness and charm of the young and living heart. As a pianist he used the old jewels in a way so felicitous and peculiar as to change the character of piano writing throughout Europe. Every pianist adopted, more or less, the old-new passages of the most captivating of piano players, and simply because it could not be helped—they were so beautiful and true. As organist he met the difficulty and supplied organ players with the new-old school music that could be heard with satisfaction on the organ of Silbermann's day, and yet gave full scope to the enticing varieties and combinations of the Cavaille-Coll instrument of his own time. He could treat the song with the grace of Schubert, the intensity of Beethoven, the terseness of Meyerbeer, the lucidity and yearning lovingness of Mozart, and combine all this with the poetical feeling of Handel, and the strange, tender, and grave solemnity of Sebastian Bach. His choruses—too vulgar [?] for Handel—too simple for Bach—somehow or other called up reminiscences of the enchanting freedom of the one, and the deep mysteriousness of the other. He had been talking with these mighty spirits, and it was the reflection of their long and full communings together.

The vivid perception and marvellous memory of Mendelssohn led him to the habit of an adaptability with reference to the thoughts of mighty dead that has in some degree affected his reputation as an original thinker. He is said to have possessed great imitative talent and to have fallen short of original truthfulness—that he modelled his symphony upon another, that his “psalmodies” were only interesting to the pious, and that his last oratorio—the “Elijah”—is wanting in invention, in dramatic vigor and real pathos,—that as real work it is overrated, unsound, and too feeble to withstand the hand of Time, the rudest but most just of all critics. The most dangerous of falsehoods is that based upon some atom of truth. Mendelssohn could take and did take the thoughts of others, but he had first made them his own. They had deeply affected his own being, and he desired it should be so with the whole world, for the whole world would be the better in participating in them. As a symphony writer he had not finished his course—in one sense not even begun it. His symphony called the Italian is every way below his position as a composer, and his Scotch symphony—by far his best—is not altogether even spiritually original. Of the movement to the Lobgesang the making up is painfully obtrusive, but pardonable by reason of its many excellences and its undeniable nobleness of intention. That his worship music is beloved and revered by the pious is to his credit. It demonstrates that herein was no hypocrisy, and that he has appealed successfully to kindred spirits. Mendelssohn did not write for the wicked. Of the oratorio of the “Elijah” much might be said. It was written to satisfy its composer—and hence it must be good; but it was also written for England, per order, for a special purpose—a Birmingham Festival—for immediate effect—not as a model oratorio—not as the most perfect—and for these reasons the “Elijah” is not like the “St. Paul.” And had the contemplated “Christus” been completed under the same circumstances it would neither have been perfect, nor a model, nor even, in our opinion, successful. The “Elijah” stands as a prophet—a forerunner—of one mightier than itself, and now that its dramatic composer has passed away—and his labors for this world have ceased—we accept it with gratitude and joy, and see in it all that is loving and good. The best things are not always seen in their best form, and the finer the diamond the more transparent the flaw.—Orchestra.

Otto Nicolai.

To the zeal of his father, and of his aunt Jeanette, as teachers, the little Nicolai was indebted for his great power and certainty of execution on the pianoforte. These formed the valuable basis of subsequent skill in composition and ability in treating the orchestra which distinguished him.

Even at this time, Nicolai exhibited a most astonishing mastery over his instrument, and was especially celebrated for his talent in playing difficult compositions at sight, but he was as backward in imparting expression, together with the proper gradations of light and shade, to the compositions he performed, as his tender age was behind a more mature period, capable of deeper sentiment. To his father, towards whom his loving heart continually attracted him, when this was at all possible, he now became exceedingly useful, by copying out a great deal of music, partly for his father's lessons, and partly for the Vocal Union. But the intolerableness of his position increased with the development of his intelligence. To this development of the feeling of his own value, the instruction given preparatory to his confirmation contributed not a little. There were hours when he felt bowed down by his supposed burden of sins, and actually began to believe in the bad disposition with which he was continually reproached at home. But when, on such occasions, he approached his father, in a spirit of confidential humility, he was frequently repulsed with hateful severity and scorn. Then, however, his heart would swell with a spasm of pride, and the desire he had long entertained to escape from such treatment and seek his fortune by his own exertions, became his favorite idea, a plan, a fact. Though ignorant, almost to simplicity, of the actual details of real life, he felt within him the power to work his way through whatever difficulties might assail him, especially since he possessed an accomplishment, the like of which, as he had frequently heard, had paved the way not alone to fame but to wealth; his pianoforte-playing. He no longer needed, as he rightly thought, to exchange, as formerly, the few little things he possessed for food, because a well-filled concert room would always supply him with the means of existing free from care for weeks together. With such ideas his feeling of independence increased; and with it, his courage, while from the latter sprang the resolution to flee and the carrying out of that resolution. He had not thought of the inconveniences to which he might be subjected, and of the obstacles which might be placed in his path by others, especially the police. This proves the carelessness with which, after having again suffered fearful corporal ill-treatment, for which he had almost longed, from his father, in the beginning of June, 1826, without legal papers of identification, without money, without provisions, and with no clothes but those he had on him, he quitted Königsberg, not to visit it again till after many years, and not till, moreover, he had become celebrated as a composer.

Nicolai first directed his steps to the little town in West Prussia, where his mother resided after her separation and before she removed to Breslau. He thought that with his profession he might easily support both her and himself there. The journey thither cost the poor wayfarer much patience and many a sigh of pain, when he had to go on continuously walking, and no compassionate waggoner gave him a lift for a part of the distance on his slowly advancing vehicle. In the villages he traversed, he appealed to the hospitality of kind-hearted peasants, but more especially to that of the "Cantors" and schoolmasters, though he passed, also, many a night in the luxuriant meadows, or in the silent darkness of the forest. In this manner, alone with his sensations, and with no living being to congratulate him, he spent his sixteenth birthday, the 9th June.

At length, after wandering across the country for many days, he reached his goal, being received by his mother, who was at first much alarmed, with genuine cordiality. But it was now that poor Otto first saw his chimerical hopes dispelled. The concert he intended to give proved a failure, in consequence of the want of credit attending his extreme youth, the time of year, which was unfavorable for such entertainment, and, above all, the absence of aught like interest evinced by the snobbish inhabitants, for everything immaterial. His mother was too poor to support more than one person—his sister—and thus, after a few days, poor Otto was once more compelled to grasp his traveller's staff, and seek for better fortune in a larger town, Stettin or Berlin, for instance. As he had hitherto journeyed so did he set out again, with this difference, however, that this time he had no defined goal in view, and that, after his first bitter experience, the thermometer of his courage had fallen some degrees. But the fatigue of his wearisome journey now began to exert its evil results, and it was nearly tired to death that he reached a village near Stargard, in Pomerania. The clergyman of the place, who not only read the touching story of the Good Samaritan in the Evangelist, to explain it to his congregation, but corroborated it by his own example, took pity on the poor exhausted boy, and by restoratives recalled him to life. Invigorated by meat and drink, the unhappy sufferer, passing over in silence the circumstances connected with the footing on which he stood towards his father, narrated his travelling adventures and his intentions to his kind host, and begged the latter's advice. The clergyman shook his head, it is true, on hearing the strange story, but directed his guest to apply to Herr Adler, an Auditor, in the neighboring town of Stargard. This gentleman, by his active and disinterested love for art, had acquired an excellent reputation in the town itself and the neighborhood. By his description of Herr Adler's agreeable character, the clergyman revived Nicolai's sinking courage. Doubly invigorated by his newly revived hopes, Otto wanted to leave at once and hasten to this Meccas of art. It was only with difficulty that the worthy host succeeded in so far damping the youthful fire flashing up in Otto's bosom, as to prevail on him to accept a night's lodging now doubly necessary and beneficial to him. So it was not till the next morning that the boy left with thanks and blessings.

Quickly carried to the town by the vehicle in which the good clergyman had procured him a ride, Nicolai immediately sought out the Auditor's house. He did not, however, find Herr Adler at home, for the latter, according to his practice of an afternoon, had gone to the Gesellschaftshaus, the resort of the leading inhabitants. The young artist presented himself to him there, and, after a short introduction, asked him to do nothing more nor less than get up a concert for him. Herr Adler scanned, in astonishment, the pale but bold features, and the somewhat shabby habiliments of the applicant. At length, he kindly invited him to come and take a cup of tea in the evening at his house and go more into the matter.

At the appointed hour, Nicolai made his appearance, and, as a matter of course, was at once asked to give a specimen of his professional skill.

To the astonishment of everyone, he stated that he did not play from memory, adding, on being further questioned, that his music, his legal papers, and his things, would very soon be sent after him from Königsberg. Herr Adler happened to have none of the compositions mentioned, and Nicolai made up his mind, therefore, to play one of Hummel's Pianoforte Concertos at sight, and did so with marvellous dexterity, but without the faintest tinge of feeling or delicacy. Herr Adler, however, thought his execution sufficient to justify him in extemporizing a musical evening, which brought in a sum of money, trifling it is true, of which he took charge for his prolégé. Not contented with this, he hired a small room for him in the house of a widow, and introduced him to the highly respected family of Herr Kretschmer, a Regierungs-Rath, in whose son, subsequently, the admirable painter, Nicolai quickly found a friend and comrade, whom, thanks to a lucky chance, he afterwards unexpectedly met again far from home and after a separation of years. Furthermore, Herr Adler sent him, in his own carriage, to the towns in the neighborhood, such as Soldin, Arnswalde, and Pyritz, where he played in the houses of Herr Adler's art-loving friends, who made a collection among themselves, which was conscientiously given by Nicolai to his fatherly patron.

Any one would have been justified in believing that Nicolai's livelihood was now secured at least for some time. Supported by a high-minded patron to the best of his powers, he could not have failed being materially successful. He would soon have settled down in regular employment, and his very great talent for teaching, which never deserted him at any period of his career, would have been still more developed among his pupils, though, it is true, at the expense of other and far more important qualities slumbering within him. Such, at any rate, would have been the normal course of a life, the account of which we might then have soon closed. From such a prosaic existence, however, Nicolai was preserved by his genius. The stream of his life was destined to first spread and fertilize, and then, brilliantly and brightly, to flow into eternity, and not be lost unobserved in the sand.

The very next event was to exert an influence upon his future. One morning, an exceedingly short time after his arrival in Stargard, Nicolai, pale and nearly breathless, rushed to his fatherly friend, and hastily begged for his little savings, saying he was obliged to start for Stettin at once. He evaded with equivocal answers all the kind questions put to him, and merely assigned as his motive the purpose of giving concerts at Stettin. In vain were the warnings of Herr Adler, who, tired at length with his fruitless efforts, handed him, not without just displeasure, his money, with which Nicolai, after hastily expressing his thanks, quitted the house. Scarcely had he done so, ere his landlady, also, rushed into Herr Adler's room, exclaiming: "Where is Nicolai, the rascal? He has run away; he has not paid his bill, and has burnt his bed!" Unable as yet to form a clear idea of the case, but fearing that, if he did not bestir himself, it might come before the authorities, Herr Adler sent the enraged woman to the place whence the coaches started for Stettin, with the imperative command for Nicolai to return, and a promise that, if he did so, he should escape punishment and be forgiven. Upon the strength of this, the young deserter made his appearance. After Herr Adler had got rid of the landlady by undertaking to become responsible for all the damage done, he demanded from Nicolai a faithful account of all that had occurred. Nicolai now confessed that, on the previous day, he had taken too much punch with Kretschmer, and, by some accident he was totally unable to explain, had set fire to his bed at home and scarcely succeeded in escaping with his life. To the question: why he had not paid for his bed, and, by so doing, better vindicated his character for honor, he replied: "he knew very well he could never get together sufficient to replace a bed, which, according to his ideas, must cost 100 thalers." Despite the seriousness of the matter, Herr Adler could not suppress a smile at such simplicity, but now insisted upon the truth as to the non-appearance of the luggage, music, and papers of legitimization, as it was only the respect for his appointment as an Auditor which had hitherto preserved him from an otherwise inevitable conflict with police. Nicolai then humbly confessed that he had run away from his father, on which he was given to understand that, under such circumstances, he could not be protected and must go back home. On hearing this, the youth with burning face and sparkling eyes tore open his waistcoat, pulled off his shirt, and, pointing to the marks still evident of the barbarous treatment he had endured, declared, with a determination unusual at his age, "that he might certainly be compelled to return, but it would be only to fling himself into the water." Moved by his wretched fate, Herr Adler promised he would still interest himself for him, and do what he could to assist him in his trouble. In the first place, he took him into his house, and wrote to a friend in Königsberg to get Nicolai, Senr., to give him the entire charge of the boy. He furthermore caused Otto to take lessons in the sciences, and, as he had not been confirmed, to attend the clergyman's preparatory course of lectures. Meanwhile, the necessary papers of legitimization arrived from Königsberg. Among them was the eagerly desired Freibrief, or letter of manumission, so to speak, by which the father gave up from that time all his rights over his son. We may mention here that a touching letter was afterwards received from Otto's mother in Breslau, wherein she tendered her most fervent thanks to her son's noble-minded patron, and invoked the blessings of Heaven on his head. Nicolai, Senr., did not remain long after this in Königsberg. After 1830, he resumed his business visits to Insterburg, Gumbinnen, Graudenz, and other small Prussian towns, for the purpose of pushing the sale of his Pianoforte School.

The less the concern of the father had been at separating entirely from his son, and the less the fatherly feeling he had manifested for him, the greater became in a short time the affection entertained for the boy by his new protector, who did all in his power to fill up the deficiencies existing in every branch of Otto's education. The result was that the youth received regular scientific instruction; his morals gained, from his confirmation, together with good precepts and example, a steady support, while his taste for sociability and elegant manners was vigorously fostered by his intercourse with the most esteemed families in the town. Under these favorable circumstances, Otto's musical talent became, to Herr Adler's intense satisfaction, strongly and undoubtedly prominent. The worthy man considered himself bound to take measures for its proper artistic development, though this involved the heavy necessity of separating from one who had now grown so dear to him, but who required, to perfect himself in the higher branches of his musical education, to reside in a large town, the meeting-place of the representatives of every department of the art. In the highest acceptance of the words, this was true, at that time, of Berlin alone; so Herr Adler resolved to send his prolégé, with strong letters of introduction, to the capital. The sum which the concerts he had still continued to give had brought in for Nicolai, Herr Adler made up to 200 thalers, with which, together with his best wishes and blessing, he sent the young artist forth, after having made him give his word not to adopt the uncertain career of a virtuoso, which would have required a much greater degree of development, but, by a thorough study and practice of theory, to ensure his material position. That Nicolai kept his word is well known, but it is not so well known what love and gratitude he always entertained for his first benefactor, and how he seized every opportunity of manifesting those sentiments. Thus Herr Adler was the first to receive, from the then popular composer, with the inscription: "To his fatherly Friend in Gratitude and Love. Otto Nicolai. July 1844," the portrait subsequently got up by the Philharmonic Society in Vienna. During a visit, also, that Herr Adler paid to Berlin at the time Nicolai wielded the conductor's staff in the Royal Chapel and the Cathedral Choir, the musician introduced him to a company of artists and lovers of art as his "real father."

Rachel and Ristori.

It is hard to believe that it is now eleven or twelve years since the excitement of the summer was the expectation of Rachel. She was to come early in September, and in the absence of wars or rumors of war, the gay loiterers at Newport and Saratoga, and Sharon and Lebanon, and the White Sulphur Springs and the White Mountains, and wherever else their glittering was seen, had that new zest to the old pleasure, and forgave the early coming to town since it might be made only a delightful excursion from which they could return with sparkling memories and eager mouths.

Punctual to the time Rachel came, as three or four years before Jenny Lind had come. But there was nothing in the fame or story of the actress which could arouse the enthusiasm that greeted the singer. That vast moral welcome of which we have formerly spoken as awaiting Jenny Lind could not possibly salute Rachel. However supreme the actress might be, the popular conscience looked askance at the woman. Besides, she spoke French only. Her audience must necessarily be limited and half foreign. There might be great admiration of a select circle, but there could not be universal popular delight.

The pleasant September evening of her first appearance came. The pretty metropolitan theatre was full of a choice and curious audience, the mass of which was undoubtedly American, only partly familiar with the French language. They sat with the book of the play—it was Corneille's "Les Horaces"—and patiently awaited the rising of the curtain. Presently the prompter touched his bell and the stage was revealed. Its formality and severity, even to bareness, was the first impression. There were the two regulation arm-chairs, a general, faint, feeble hint of "classical" rigor, and a premonition of a drama in which the "unities" and the conventions were painfully prominent. But before the impression was very clearly defined a figure, exquisitely draped, of the severest symmetry, a form of tragic grace, not full to ripe queenliness but of a royal maiden, glided upon the scene with a face so pitiful and wan that its overpowering woe put every mind in key for the tragedy.

But Rachel herself was more tragical than any part she played. Her genius seemed to be an exceptional to her whole character as a fine voice. She was already stricken with mortal disease when she came; but the poor girl of the Boulevards, the slight singer at the cafés of a few years before, burned to be the sovereign of two worlds, as she proudly declared. She could not know what she had undertaken. How could she, whose chief weapon was speech, hope to subdue those who could not understand her? Her tones, her movement, her superb taste might be acknowledged, but even actual passion in a foreign tongue is strange, feigned passion may be even ludicrous. Rachel could not but feel acutely that her American career was not a triumph, was not exactly a success. And she was mortally ill when she became conscious of it! And she had crossed the sea to confound and conquer the barbarous Yankees, and they were not subdued! They were not averse, they were not unkind, ungenerous, or unintelligent. On the contrary, they were ardently eager to be enthusiastic, and she who had illuminated Europe with the blaze of her genius turned it upon them, and they smiled and hoped but were not warmed. How truly that wan, piteous face, that wasting figure, that low voice which vibrated through the hearer, that hollow cough which destroyed the sad illusion by a sadder truth, told the melancholy tale of disappointment and despair. No one can recall those last and unluckiest days of Rachel without a willingness to draw a cloud of forgiveness over her wild and wayward life.

The expectation of this summer fortunately has none of these mournful aspects. Adelaide Ristori, who will be the September guest of this year, comes invested only with the most womanly and attractive associations. No longer young she is still in the gentle prime of her power, and brings to us the worn and persuasive genius which did not shrink from the contest with Rachel when she sat crowned in her own capital. The gossip that Dumas or Jules Janin or Véron or some other proud Parisian resolved to show Rachel that fames could be made as readily as omelets, and therefore brought Ristori to Paris and puffed and applauded her into a great reputation, is worthy of Paris for its extravagance and folly. Paris is the worst place in the world to try such an experiment, for the Parisians are remorseless and spoiled. A hungry man may be duped with a painted dish, but not the victim of satiety.

It seems that Ristori was born near Venice in 1822. Her parents were strolling players, so that she began life in the theatre. When she was fourteen she played in "Francesca da Rimini," and in a very few years became the most noted of Italian actresses. Her beauty and her grace, with her winning genius, made her everywhere a favorite, and in 1846 Julio del Grillo, son and heir of the Marquis of Capranica, saw her, and loved her, and offered to marry her. The chronicler from whom we cull these facts of high romance informs us that the pride of the fine old Italian nobleman and of all his fine old family was aroused by the threatened degradation. Remonstrance was in vain. The affair took the course that it always does in the fine old English comedy. The lovers eloped and were married; then returned upon their knees, and were reconciled to the fine old people, who insisted that the Marchesa del Grillo—for such, says the proud chronicler, is the true title of Ristori—should remain at their villa, where she remained in seclusion for nearly two years. But the retirement was haunted and disturbed by the ghosts of former triumphs and excitements. She longed to return to the stage, for which her genius so peculiarly fitted her; and she again appeared at Rome, in 1848, in Alfieri's tragedy of "Myrrha." But the French were soon battering at the city, and Ristori left the theatre for the hospital; nor was it till 1850 that she returned to the stage, of which since the death of Rachel she has been the undisputed Queen.

In this country, of course, Ristori will play in the Italian language. As with Rachel, this must, of course, limit both her audience and their enjoyment. Yet her magnificent action, her womanly tenderness and passion, the pathos of the heart, will not fail of their effect. These are of no country, and appeal to the universal sympathy of humanity. Her coming assures us of a refined and profound artistic enjoyment. The "whole audience" may not "rise in a body," so deeply moved that the play for some moments cannot proceed; but their "overwrought feelings" may not find "an outlet in loud shouts, clapping of hands, wavings of handkerchiefs, and such tumults of applause as are very, very rarely witnessed in any theatre;" but they will certainly feel to their hearts that exquisite charm of true womanhood which is described as the crowning grace of Ristori.—G. W. Curtis, in Harper's Magazine.

Tonic Sol-Fa.

(From the London Athenæum.)

Transactions of the Tonic Sol-Fa School. Fifth Session, 1855-6. (The Tonic Sol-Fa Agency).

A more comical shilling's worth than this is not in our musical experience. The above coin at any given Casino enables the payer thereof to hear "The great Vance," or "The Cure," or some rather tiresome version of Herr Offenbach's newest Grecian, or Roman, or Romantic absurdity; but it will be as well invested by any musician who loves nonsense in the "Transactions of the Tonic Sol-Fa School."

There has never been any want of empiricism in the teaching of Music. But since the century came in the same has become rampant. To give two instances: Logier with his "Cheiroplast" (adopted by Kalkbrenner), so hardly hit by Lady Morgan in her Crawley dinner ("Florence Macarthy")—Colonel Hawker, the intrepid duck shooter, with his "Hand Monks," conceived they had smoothed the way to "a short and easy" mastery over the keys of the piano forte. "Where is either implement now?" The Studies of Cramer and Moscheles endure, whereas the machines for subjugating Nature have passed into the limbo of obsolete tortures. No one sits in stocks (it is to be hoped) at the time present with a view of his toes being turned out in the canonical positions of dancing.

Those, however, who overlook the "Tonic Sol-Fa School" have faith in their own Galimatias, and expect the staff and staves of musicians to study a new nomenclature, from which they will have to proceed to the old one. Here, to exemplify, is a scrap from the cover of this comical book:—

1. Major Chords.

1.	Da.	Fa.	Sa.	{ 8 5 or 5 3 or 3
2.	Db.	Fb.	Sb.	{ 6 3 or 6
3.	Dc.	Fc.	Sc.	{ 6 4 or 4

The alphabet of music was arranged and has been completed many a year ago, and is not to be revolutionized by enthusiasts, who recall by their airs and grimaces the transactions of the folk who attempted to establish the Phonetic Nuz, and who threw away money, time, talent (a grain of genius, too perhaps), on an attempt to show that two spelling-alphabets are easier to learn than one. But not merely is the musical notation dislocated; we have to learn a new polyglott jargon. Such descriptions as Tonic Sol-faists, "Postal classes," "Mr. Longbottom's Choral-voice training class," require a glossary for those who have not the "shibboleth." But the writers of these Transactions are, musically and orthographically, a peculiar people. Says Mr. Proudman, in his paper on "The Common Marks of Expression," "There is something deeper and higher which vocalists and orators must possess to make themselves felt as well as admired. While cultivating this soul-thrilling power," &c. The scholars are desired to take care "not to accent loudly the second pulse in the measure, as, for instance, the 'Lah' on the word good, Ex. 31, page 28, Standard Course." Then Mr. Proudman descants "on organ tones, or tones all of one thickness," on "staccatoed tones" on "laughing tones;" and thus closes his evidence:—

"If in drawing attention to these common things in musical expression, our execution becomes more correct and scholarly, we shall be the better fitted to illumine our performances with thoughts that burn, and with flashes of feeling, fire and fun, which shall stamp us as worthy students of a noble art."

Mr. Gardner's paper "On the Relation of the Tonic Sol-fa Method to the Old Notation" is not less clear and comical than the above; and mark the deduction from all his entangled paragraphs:

"In the discussion which followed, Miss Kenway said, that as a teacher she could not get on for one day without the old notation. For instrumental music it was at present indispensable. Mr. Dobson instanced a case in which by teaching the old notation he gradually succeeded in making his pupils see the superior advantages of the Tonic Sol-fa Notation. He thought we might often help Sol-fa by teaching the old notation."

Even Mr. Longbottom, who figures substantially in these "Transactions," declared that "in Scotland, he could teach in no normal school unless he taught the old notation." Mr. Griffiths, on the other hand, said that "in Lancashire, the mill-hands left the singing-classes so soon as the old notation was introduced; the music was too costly and troublesome." Mr. Dobson is weighty on the subject of instruction, and really holds that teachers who profess to teach ought to understand teaching. Pupils, which is more, are admonished that learners ought to learn. "Mr. Root, in the preface to his admirable 'Musical Curriculum,' says: 'May I be pardoned for hinting at the importance of learning music rather for the benefit and pleasure it may be to others than to feed and gratify vanity and self-love, since right views and corresponding motives will go far towards keeping the pupil in the right course, and practising in the right way.'" This is the very greenery of grass! But, later, Mr. Dobson throws some spirit and animosity into the relations of teacher and pupil, by declaring that "no teacher has any right to give his pupils that class of music which they cannot thoroughly appreciate and enjoy!" We had innocently fancied that the earliest steps in the art, such as scale-practice for voice and fingers, however salutary, were not peculiarly enjoyable. Then Mr. Dobson recalls with pride an uninitiated minister in Melbourne, as under: "Although he was no musician practically, yet he stood up for Sol-fa wherever opportunity offered, and has been of good service to the cause in the Antipodes." Into the overbearing analysis of harmony, tendered by Mr. J. K. Starling, A.C. (which means Advanced Certificate), we will not presume to venture, having no clear idea of what is meant by "part-pulse dissonances," "horizontal forestroke," "waving tones," "the ray in the tenor," and other definitions. Mr. Proudman turns up a second time, with receipts showing how to make "a successful programme." He thinks (to give an example of his taste in arrangement) that "Home, sweet home," which appeals to sentiments at once pleasurable and sad, should be succeeded by a piece like the 'Moonlight Song of the Fairies,' rather than by the 'Tickling Trio.' The interposing 'Song of the Fairies' would prepare for laughter without pain, and prevent the hurrying away of emotions and sentiments which refresh and exalt the mind." We plead guilty to having heard some music; and therefore respectfully inquire, What is the 'Tickling Trio'? Neither are we acquainted with 'The Showman's Courtship,' by Artemus Ward. The Sol-faists poke about apparently in strange nooks and corners. The Rev. Mr. Curwen, who is the director of this Association, next testifies about stringed instruments. We submit the following specimen of his evidence to "counsel learned in the law." The curious experiments in acoustics of Prof. Helmholtz have set his wits "a-gadding." At least, every one would be glad to know what is meant by the passage we cite:—

"To deprive a tone of its harmonic octave would be a great impoverishment, but what if, by similar means (by hitting in the right place), you could deprive it of the sharp dissonant 'wiry' harmonics, ta da ra ma, which lie so close together by the third octave! Then surely you would have enough of fullness and all the richness without the hardness. That 'right place' for hitting on the modes of the dissonant harmonics is, according to the Professor's principles, the very same which the practical men have found out by accident."

Next testifies Mr. Bourke on "Figured Basses,"—and so darkly mysterious is his evidence that we will not here attempt to get behind the "seven veils." To this succeed Mr. Longbottom's paper "On the Use of Writing in Elementary Classes," and "the discussion, by request of several influential teachers, on the question of Mr. Curwen's claims as regards his copy-right in the tonic sol-fa notation." Where were the representatives of M. Emile Chévé, of Paris, who was to be heard of some twenty-five years ago, and who entered the lists of teaching class-singing by logarithmic notation, against Wilhem, who, on his side, had only adopted and adapted the method of Nägeli, of Zurich—even as Mr. Hullah adapted and adopted Wilhem's method for England? Mr. Kennedy's paper, "On the Extension of Instrumental Music among Tonic Sol-Fa-ists," is in the right key of a collection such as this. Mr. Proudman turns up, for a third time, as an exponent of "Music and Morality," and is fierce and sanctimonious, and, if sincere, very absurd. Mr. Evans speaks to "the training of boys' voices." Seeing that boys' voices change inevitably, it might be suggested, that whereas the musical training of boys could be made too complete, their vocal exercises might wait till such time as the settled organ for song presented itself. One would be glad to have the name of a single "marvellous boy" who has shot up into a great singer—Braham being the exception that proves the rule. Mr. Thomas Ryder (A. C.) is dimly stupid in his communication on the subject of Psalmody, and apparently disapproves of organs; on both subjects rebuked by Mr. Curwen. Next comes the rebuker's essay "On the Stops of the Harmonium," that cheap and shabby substitute for the glorious old organ. Stops more, or stops less, the "Harmonium" is only, at best, an economical makeshift for the great instrument, having generic peculiarities of tone which become to some ears intolerable. Mrs. A. T. Stapleton, another A. C., prefaces a long and amusing article "On Voice-Training by the Italian System," by declaring that "writing a paper is a task for which she is totally unfitted, having had a private education!" We shall merely give one or two valuable paragraphs:—

"Miss Glover—when I went on my visit of inquiry to Norwich, as to the comparative merits of the two systems (which I had Mr. Curwen's full approbation for doing)—urged me to use a Sol-fa Harmonicon in my classes, in order to cultivate purity of intonation, and softness of delivery of tone. She used one herself, and drilled her pupils to sing with it two years on twelve short canons. Thus she formed their voices, and very musical and soft they certainly became. In accordance with her advice, I purchased one, before I left Norwich, of Mr. R. Warne, who manufactured Miss Glover's, and commenced using it as soon as I returned home. But both my scholars and myself soon tired of it: for besides the annoyance of being treated as a dangerous fellow-traveller in every omnibus that I entered, with my suspicious brown-papered-baby-coffin shaped parcel, the children lost all interest in it, and as I could not force them to submit to such irksome drill,—like Miss Glover, who was almost the sole support of many of her pupils' education and future hopes in life,—I should soon have lost them from the class. The glasses also occasionally got broke, and we had to wait till the maker could find time and opportunity to send us new ones from Norwich, so that I was obliged to give up voice-training by Sol-fa Harmonicon."

The "Italian system" includes, according to Mrs. Stapleton, devices as suspicious as "the brown-papered-baby-coffin." Some professors make their pupils practise with half-a-crown in their mouths. Mrs. Stapleton "thinks a florin, or, if that is too large, a shilling, might be advantageously held between the teeth when a looking-glass cannot be used." Practising with a looking-glass in the mouth must be a "parlous" sport. We believe wedges have been used to give the mouth a good set; and have even heard that the broad ample smile of Pasta, which no one can have forgotten that ever saw her receive the homage of her subjects, owed some of its charm to mechanical appliances.

Enough of this shilling's worth of empirical conceit. We may be thought to have devoted more time and attention to the matter than its folly merits; but we have too much respect for the noble art of Music, to see it debased by the intrusion of quackery, without now and then offering our "screed of doctrine."

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The season, which came to an end about the middle of last month with a series of "Farewell performances at reduced prices," is thus summed up in the Musical World:

On the whole Mr. Mapleson's patrons have had little reason to be dissatisfied with his actual performances, from the 7th of April, the night on which his doors were opened, to the 10th of August, the night on which were closed. True, he has not revived the Donna del Lago of Rossini, in which Signor Mongini was to have made his first appearance; nor has he produced the Vestale of Spontini, whose operas, to quote from the prospectus, "have been unaccountably neglected in this country;" nor has he fulfilled his pledge with respect to M. Gounod's Mireille, in which the part of Mireille was put down for Mlle. Irma de Murska, "for whom" (again to quote Mr. Mapleson) "the composer has expressly written several new pieces." Signor Mongini came out, not in La Donna del Lago—in the revival of which the manager informed us, "he had not only in view the beauty of the music, but the tried capabilities of his company for adequately representing it"—but in Il Trovatore (Ben Lomond to Primrose-hill;) the opera of Spontini, inasmuch as its non-appearance was unaccounted for, remained "unaccountably neglected;" while the "several new pieces" of M. Gounod are still to be heard. Add to the foregoing the Falstaff of Otto Nicolai, which though promised with a new Falstaff (Herr Rokitansky) and a new Fenton (Sig. Gardoni,) made no sign.

The promise about Meyerbeer's Dinorah was duly kept; Mlle. de Murska's graceful and very original impersonation of the heroine of this still lovelier pastoral—supported by the best Hoel and the best Corentin, in Mr. Santley and Signor Gardoni, that our stage has witnessed, by the delightful singing (later in the season) of Madame Trebelli-Bettini, as the Goatherd (for which character, at the Royal Italian Opera, Meyerbeer expressly wrote a new and beautiful air,) by a mise en scène, one of the triumphs of Mr. Telbin, and by a musical execution, orchestral and choral, conferring the highest credit upon Signor Arditì and his followers—was one of the most brilliant attractions of the season. Another important pledge was equally redeemed, in the production, for the first time, of Gluck's best Greek opera, Iphigenie en Tauride, which, as Iphigenia in Tauris, is likely to keep its place for a long period among the most solid supports of the Italian repertory. The performance of this fine dramatic work was in all respects admirable. It provided a new grand classic part for Mlle. Titiens, which, as in the case of Medea, a year earlier, once more directly invited public attention to her extraordinary ability. Moreover, it afforded Mr. Santley and Signor Gardoni as Orestes and Pylades equal opportunities of distinction, and M. Gassier in Thon, another chance of advantageously exhibiting his versatile powers. In short, the distribution of the four chief characters could not have been more effective; while the rest of the musical performance was to match. Signor Arditì entered upon his task of preparing the opera of Gluck with as much zeal as he had already shown on behalf of the far more elaborate opera of Cherubini—and probably with the heartier goodwill, inasmuch as the ungrateful duty of adding accompanied recitatives of his own to a long accepted masterpiece was in this instance spared him. Iphigenia was also played three times; but those three occasions stand out nobly prominent in a retrospective view of the past season. As Mr. Costa made Gluck's Orpheus acceptable at Covent Garden, so Signor Arditì made Gluck's Iphigenia acceptable in the Haymarket; and it is now for either to try his hand on Alceste, Armida, or Iphigenia in Aulis. The revival of such works need in no way interfere with, as it can in no way imperil, the popularity of more modern operas; on the contrary, an agreeable variety is afforded which adds new zest to their enjoyment. Not less memorable, and for similar reasons, is the production (for the first time here in Italian) of Mozart's most genial comic opera, Die Entführung aus dem Serail—the opera of his youth and early enthusiasm, the smile that chased away tears, the sunshine that peeped out from behind the dark cloud of Idomeneo. This model of a comedy in music, as Il Seraglio, enchanted every ear, and protested emphatically against the indifference that had permitted it so long to lie on the shelf. Talk of "unaccountable neglect!" Here, if we will, is a glaring instance of

It. The music of Il Seraglio is as full of vigorous life as a young lion, as unclouded as the mind of a girl in her teens, who has known no grief nor can conceive it. Languishing as are the loves of Belmonte and Constanza, they are just as serenely happy as those of Blonde and Pedrillo, only they convey the aspirations of a pair of lovers who sigh for each other in a loftier and more refined sphere of feeling. Neither Constanza nor her devoted worshipper entertains the slightest doubt that all will go right, that they will escape from the Pasha and his watchful Osmin (of whom they stand in no fear,) whatever obstacles may stand in their way. But their confidence is the confidence of youth, and there is youth about the whole thing. The Pasha Selim is just such a tyrant as a boy might picture to himself, with a certainty that he can be more than a match for him; the formidable steward is something only to laugh at. And so it turns out in the opera. How Mozart has treated all this, how freshly, in what bright colors, with what springy youthfulness of touch, has been described already; and we must not be tempted further to dilate upon the theme. Nor is it requisite here to add one word to what was said at the time about the performance of Mlle. Titiens and Sinico, as Constanza and Blonde, of Dr. Gunz, Signor Stagnio (a most promising young singer, who must endeavor to hold true to his promise,) and Herr Rokitansky, as Belmonte, Pedrillo, and Osmin—or of Signor Foli, in the small part of Selim.

The several performances of Il Flauto Magico and Oberon, both of which had already formed part of the repertory, must be singled out as among the most interesting of the many interesting incidents of this operatic campaign. Il Flauto Magico brought back that thoroughly practised German singer Madame Harriers-Wippen, as Pamina; and one more competent to deliver with force and propriety the divine music which Mozart has put into the lips of his fire-and-water-proof heroine could not be named. Then it delighted us again with Mlle. de Murska's very remarkable execution of the great airs of Astarti—flamante, and—not less welcome in its way—with the Papageno of Mr. Santley, which, however inferior in a sense of comic humor to the memorable impersonation of Ronconi, in a musical sense has never been equalled. Signor Foli, too, the young American bass, whose voice is so justly extolled, found an opportunity of displaying his artistic readiness by undertaking the part of Sarastro, High-Priest of Isis and Osiris, at the shortest possible notice (Herr Rokitansky being suddenly "indisposed")—an opportunity of which he took such excellent advantage as to show himself incontestably one of the most useful members of the company. A livelier Papageno than Mlle. Sinico could not be imagined, nor a Tamino more thoroughly versed than Dr. Gunz in the German traditions of the principal tenor character of an opera which, according to Beethoven, was the most German, and therefore the most genuine, opera of Mozart. Certain deficiencies in the general performance of Il Flauto Magico have been pointed out; but these, like the nondescript Furies in Iphigenia, will doubtless be looked to in the interval between now and next season. About Oberon—in which the four leading characters were sustained by Mlle. Titiens (Rezina,) Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Fatima,) Signor Mongini (Hoon,) and Mr. Santley (Sherasmin,) who all take part in the glorious quartet, "Over the dark blue waters" (we prefer the original text of Mr. Planché,) in which Signor Bettini played Oberon, Madame de Marie-Labache Puck, M. Gassier Babekan, and Mlle. Bauermeister the Mermaid—there is really not another word to say.

To complete the list of works for some mysterious reason termed "classical"—though not a bit more classical, if classical means universal, accepted as models, than the Barbiere di Siviglia of Rossini, which will live as long as Le Nozze di Figaro of Mozart, as long, indeed, as dramatic music is a public want—we have heard Der Freischütz, with Mlle. Sinico; Fiddio, to name which must suffice; Don Giovanni; a single representation of Cherubini's Medea ("classical," if anything is classical,) but recently spoken of at length; and the in almost every respect admirable revival of Le Nozze di Figaro—to which, for precisely the same reason, we are not called upon again immediately to refer. The other works have been Il Trovatore, with which worn-out capo d'opera the season commenced, and which was successively responsible for two failures—that of a French tenor, "Signor Arvini," in Manrico, and that of a German soprano, Mlle. Louise Lichtmay, in Leonora; the Puritani, in which Mr. Hohler made so successful a debut; Lucrezia Borgia, the second representation of which will be remembered as the occasion of the first and last of the "limited number of performances" accorded to Madame Griesi, in which Mlle. Titiens "has consented to" (but did not) "take part;" Faust (the inevitable;) Martha, with Mlle. Titiens and Signor Mongini—not so well suited as Mlle. Bettelheim, the Viennese contralto, and Mr. Santley; Lucia di Lammermoor and La Sonnambula, helping fully to confirm the impression created last year by Mlle. de Murska, and in the latter of which, on one occasion, Mr. Hohler (replacing Signor Mongini) showed himself at least as familiar with the music of Elvino as with that of Arturo; Robert le Diable—brought forward for the debut, as Alice, of Mlle. Celestine Arvini, a new French soprano, with an Italian name, who, neither in that nor in her subsequent essay, as Pamina, produced a very strong impression, and in which Signor Tasca played Robert, Mlle. de Murska the Princess, Signor Foli (again at a moment's notice) Bertram; Les Huguenots with its well-known cast, including Mlle. Titiens and De Murska as Valentine and Marguerite, strengthened by Signor Mongini's Raoul, Madame Trebelli's Urbain, and Herr Rokitsky's Marcel (both of which operas would probably be denominated "classical" by the advanced party in the politics of music;) Il Barbiere, with Madame Trebelli as Rosina, Signor Bettini as Almaviva, Signor Scalse as Bartolo (the best Bartolo, as he is the best Leporello, since Lablache,) and M. Gassier as Figaro; Verdi's Ernani, with Mlle. Titiens, Signor Tasca, M. Gassier, and Mr. Santley in the principal characters—revived for a single performance (!); and, last not least, Rossini's Semiramide, to the effective assumption of the three leading characters in which—by Mlle. Titiens (Semiramide), Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Arsace) and M. Gassier (Assur)—a just tribute of acknowledgment was paid not long ago. The various representations from time to time of these popular operas filled up the intervals agreeably enough, and gave a fair place to the old-established "repertory" in the general transactions of a more than usually interesting season.

CONCERT OF MR. MOSCHELES.—The evening concert on Monday, in St. James's Hall, "for the benefit and relief of the sick, wounded, and sufferers of all nations engaged in the present war, in conjunction with the Ladies' Association established for that purpose," was a brilliant success. The attendance was very large, and we understand that nearly £500 were realized for the charity. The concert began with a performance on the pianoforte (Erard) by Mr. Moscheles, consisting of the Etude from his Op. 95, called Reconciliation, and the numbers in D minor, A flat, and G major, from his first book of Studies. Madame Parepa followed with the air, "Du village voisin," from Auber's opera, Le Serment (accompanied by Mr. Benedict). Then Mr. Moscheles played some new variations of his own upon the "Harmonious Blacksmith," which differ in all essentials from the old variations of Handel. Then Madame Lind-Goldschmidt sang an air from Der Freischütz—"Und ob die Wolke Sie verhülle" (accompanied by her husband), and on being rapturously called back, repeated the last half of it. Then Dr. Gunz (Mr. Benedict accompanying) gave Schubert's Lied, "Der Neugierige" ("The Curious"). Then Madame Parepa sang Mr. Benedict's song, "The bird that came in spring" (accompanied by the composer). Then Mr. Moscheles extemporized at great length upon themes from the last three movements of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, mixing them up with "See the conquering hero comes" (in honor of Count Bismarck), and on being called back, resumed his seat, and played two more of the later Etudes, winding up with a pezzo di bravura.

Then there was "relache."

Then Dr. Gunz (accompanied either by Herr Otto Goldschmidt or Mr. Benedict) sang a German Lied by one Weinewurm (R.)—"Schöne Einrichtung," ("Beautiful Redress!"). Then Madame Parepa (accompanied by the composer) sang two Lieder by Mr. Moscheles—"Botenschaft" and "Frühlingslied." Then Mr. Moscheles and Herr Otto Goldschmidt, on the piano to the left, Mr. Benedict and Mr. Charles Hallé, on the piano to the right, played a concertant (the composition of Herr Moscheles), for four performers on two instruments, and bearing the suggestive title of Les Contrastes.

Herr Peterson (from Stockholm) did what he had volunteered to do (accompanied by Herr Otto Goldschmidt on the pianoforte). Then Madame Goldschmidt sang the bravura, "Ma la sola," from Bellini's forgotten opera, Beatrice di Tenda; and then (to conclude) the overture to Cherubini's Anacreon was played on two pianofortes, by the forty fingers belonging to Messrs. Moscheles, Goldschmidt, Hallé, and Benedict.—Times.

ALFRED MELLON'S Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre follow up the opera season as usual. The World says of them:

These concerts proceed swimmingly. The piquant singing of Mlle. Liebhardt; the dexterous fiddle-virtuosity of M. Winiawski—now engaged on "classical," now on purely "exhibitive" music; the brilliant pianoforte playing of Mlle. Mario Krebs; the lively dance pieces—including Sir Hugh Baillie's "Marie's walse," F. Godfrey's new waltz, "Helena," Mellon's "Patti" polka, &c.; the "selections"—Africaine (with "unison"), Trovatore, &c.; the overtures, marches, symphonies, &c.—on the special "nights;" the splendid band; the vigorous conducting of Alfred the Great (and what not?)—combine in making up a first-class varied entertainment, and in delighting crowded audiences. We have had a "Mendelssohn night" and a "Beethoven night"—both excellent. We are promised a "Weber night" on Monday; and, as there has been a "Gounod night," and is to be a "Verdi night," we may fairly expect a "Coote night" and a "Pittman night." A "Chappell night," a "Boosey night," a "Cocks night," and a "Hopwood and Crew night," would not be bad notions.

PARIS.—Mehul's "Joseph" is under revival at the Opera Comique. The "Mignon" of M. Ambroise Thomas is to be the first novelty there.—The first novelty to be given at the Theatre Lyrique is the "Sardanapalus" of M. Victorin de Joncières—an amateur, we believe, whose music illustrative of "Hamlet" was performed in Paris a year or two since. M. Offenbach is preparing music for a grand fairy spectacle to be given at the Theatre du Chatelet during the Exhibition of 1867. "There is a question," says the Gazette Musicale, quoting another journal, "of a grand choral meeting to which the singers of all nations are welcome, to be held at the opening of the Exhibition. Every choral society or body of Orpheonists, whatever be its number, nature, or place of residence, may take part, and sing what best pleases it. The first prize is one of 10,000 francs." What a task for the arbiters!—MM. Fournier and Wekerlin were the artist and author selected by the manager of the Grand Opera to compose the Cantata performed there on the Emperor's fête day. M. Devoyod, one of the successful pupils of the Conservatoire, has been engaged at the same theatre.

The Gazette Musicale announces the discovery of a composition by Mozart at the age of ten years, produced for the installation of the Stadtholder, William of Orange the Fifth. It is in ten movements, and is written for harpsichord, stringed quartet, two hautboys, two horns, and a bassoon, and is described as very remarkable, the youth of its writer considered.

M. Georges Kastner, who has published one or two books of some curiosity and research on subjects connected with music,—among others, "The Cries of Paris,"—has just brought out one with a not very comprehensible title, "The Paremiology of Music,"—a collection of the proverbs, sayings and allusions to which the art has given occasion.

It is said that Herr Wagner is at work on an opera, the subject of which is "Frederic Barbarossa."

DRESDEN.—We are to have another Loreley, Herr C. A. Fischer, organist here, having just completed an opera with that well-known title. A grand concert of sacred music has been given in the Frauenkirche for the necessitous families of the Saxon soldiers who fell in the late war. It was got up by the heads of the Royal Capelle and the Theatre Royal, the exccutants being the members of the above two establishments, assisted by the Dresden Singacademie, and also by Dreyssig's. The programme included Organ-prelude (Herr Merkel, organist to the Court); Bach's chorale: "Gieh dich zufriednen;" Mozart's Requiem (soloists; Messrs. Burde-Ney, Krebs-Michalesi, Herren Weixlstorfer and Scaria); Fugue in A minor—Bach (Herr Merkel); and the Forty-second Psalm, Mendelssohn (soloists: Mlle. Alvaleben, Hanisch, Herren Eichberger, Hollmann, Mitterwurzer, and Waixlstorfer). Mozart's Requiem was conducted by Dr. Rietz, and Mendelssohn's Psalm by Herr Krebs. The theatre, which was closed in consequence of the Prussian occupation, reopened on the 1st inst. The piece selected for the occasion was the Antigone of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's music.

nounced their programmes, and the plans of the Societies to which we look for what is best seem to be slow in taking shape. The private speculators in concert business, to whom music is more a matter of money-making than of Art, are naturally the most sharply on the look-out to seize fresh opportunities, preoccupy the halls and forestall as much eclat as possible. Thus, first in order of time, we have a lottery in the Music Hall, for the sale of certain silver ware, &c., with music for an extra bait to purchasers and to make the whole thing swim and pass off more agreeably. Such affairs are called "Gift Concerts;" they are given commonly by unmusical people, for unmusical ends; and we trust our musical artists are too jealous of their self-respect and of the dignity of their Art, to be trapped into any connection with such so-called "Concerts." Even a raffle for an Opera House, with thousands of dollars worth of paintings for smaller prizes, is not a thing to be done in the name of Art, and when it announces itself as "the grandest Art enterprise of the Century," it simply insults and degrades Art, setting up the speculator and the auctioneer as greater characters (even in the Art world) than Mozart, Raphael or Beethoven. But we do not apprehend that Boston will prove a very promising field for this sort of enterprize, on the great scale or the small. So we pass to speculations which, while they seek first the good of Number One, to-wit the impresario, are also essentially musical in their character and aim at some musical excellence.

The first visitation which we have to look for is the return of Mr. Bateman's concert troupe, which opens its second season in America here in Boston, on the 26th of this month, in the Music Hall, and remains two or three weeks. It will certainly be pleasant to hear so great a singer as Mme. PAREPA again, and to listen to the exquisite violin-playing of so pure and true an artist as CARL ROSA. Boston, if no other city, will ensure the latter a warm, appreciative welcome, and is counting on him for more of his interpretations of the highest classical music, such as he played in a concert of the Harvard Musical Society and in a chamber concert of his own. We trust the Bateman programmes will include some of these good things, and not be altogether ad captandum for the multitude. Depend upon it, even the multitude can be trusted hereabouts for some appreciation of the very best. We shall miss Danreuther, the pianist, who has settled down in London; but Mr. Bateman has secured the services of the excellent New York pianist Mills, whose brilliant virtuosity is not the whole of him, but who knows Beethoven and Chopin as well as Thalberg and Liszt. Levy, the cornet player, does not come; but in his place we shall have our old friend, J. L. Hatton, genial and clever pianist, singer and song composer, who will officiate as conductor and accompanist. There may be need of a "conductor," for we read of a variety of other elements which Mr. Bateman means to bring into his concerts (we hope it will not render them too miscellaneous): for instance, Signor Ferranti, a buffo of some note abroad; Sig. Fortuna, a basso baritono; the "silver-voiced tenor" Brignoli of old; besides Messrs. Hughes and Winterbottom, solo trombonist and what not. We hear nothing said of orchestra, but we may safely presume that Mr. B. will not

Music the Coming Season.

It is about time that Boston music-lovers should know what good music is in store for them this fall and winter. The more important, permanent sources of supply have not, however, yet ando less than he did last year, and will wish to give his performances the character of "grand concerts" rather than mere miscellanies of solo singing and playing. Our readers will be glad to hear that Carl Rosa has already arrived in New York.

The destruction of the New York Academy, which can hardly be rebuilt before February, renders us peculiarly exposed to "predatory" incursions of Italian Opera. All that is set down for a certainty is, that Maretzek's company (particulars in our last) will occupy the Boston Theatre from the 12th to the 25th of November. The light operas they promise will be welcome: Zampa; Cagnoni's Don Bucefalo, in which there is said to be a fine character, that of a maestro di musica, for Ronconi's buffo talent; Crispino, again, we suppose; but why not also Il Barbiere? why not some delicious thing of Mozart, say the Seraglio or the Nozze di Figaro? Other Italian combinations will be wandering about, the Strakosch company, &c., some of which may trust themselves to come and make trial here; but fortunately Boston is not so good a field as some other places for any but good opera. Since we have heard Fidelio, &c., by the German troupe of Mr. Grover, the Italian opera, at least such as it has averaged of late years, has lost its prestige with us. Why we should have no German opera now needs explanation. So good a success as that deserved to be cherished, strengthened and made permanent. The elements seem still to be scattered about the country and within call; we read ever and anon of Frederici, Johannsen, Himmer, Hermanns, Habelmann, Anschütz and the rest, as partaking here and there in trios, pairs, or singly in some small concert enterprise: why not re-unite them and add to them till there be such a German Opera as may be always sure of welcome and support in our music-loving cities? Having that for a standard, the Verdi and Donizetti operas would not die out probably, but would fall into their rightful place; both kinds would be better appreciated by contrast.

—But we are wandering away from our purpose, which was merely to survey the field before us for the winter, and note what music we are really to have. The experiment of so-called "Parlor Opera," in the Music Hall, is soon to be tried. The parlor, to be sure, is rather large, and if the noble Hall is to turn itself into a theatre, as well as a bazaar, a lecture room, an arena for all sorts of shows, Music will soon be homeless. But the idea in itself is not a bad one. It aims to do a simple, practicable thing, which, if tastefully and well done, may give much pleasure and may develop into something worth cherishing. The design is to present, in English, with modest outlay of fit scenery, small orchestra, &c., some of those nice little operas, which require hardly more than a quartet of principal singers, without chorus; such as Don Pasquale, Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" (Heimkehr aus der Fremde), an early work worth knowing, Balfe's "Sleeping Queen," &c. They will begin on Thursday evening, Nov. 8, and be continued fortnightly. Mr. Peck, superintendent of the Music Hall, has charge of the business arrangements, and the season subscription, we are told, is already encouraging. Mr. Whiting, the organist, will conduct; and the singing actors will be Miss Fanny Riddell, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mr. James Whitney, tenor, Mr. Rudolphsen and Dr. Guilmette.

Our prospect of Opera, therefore, on the whole is not large. We shall of course be open to flying visits of various concert troupes "predatory," shoals of little fishes, so soon as the great Bateman whale is out of the way. But let us pass to what interests us all far more. Let us look to our supplies of music of the highest kind, the concerts, whether of societies or individual artists, (only not of unmusical speculators) of the kind which really give musical character to a community; the oratorios, the orchestral and classical chamber concerts.

We are sorry to see no definite promise as yet of Oratorios. The Handel and Haydn Society do not announce their plans. They will of course do the Messiah at Christmas time. But what else? From grand performances, as last year, with the splendid aid of Mme. Parepa, they naturally shrink, when it involves sharing the gross proceeds equally with Mr. Bateman, as if the lady's single services were a fair offset to chorus, orchestra, organ, conductor and all the other singers! But this being out of the question, are there not plenty of good things which a society so well equipped and disciplined can always do, relying on chorus and orchestra mainly, and taking the best that can be found at rates not ruinous for soli? "St. Paul," for instance, has had only one trial here yet, and that a most encouraging success. "Judas Maccabeus," the "Hymn of Praise," the "42nd Psalm" and other Psalms of Mendelssohn, and much more which they have learnt, to say nothing of more which they might learn, are things which we have a right to expect now periodically and somewhat frequently; the Society itself in its present effective condition, the Music Hall, the great Organ, the appreciative eager audience, are so many pledges that the good work shall go on. We will not doubt, then, that we shall have as much and as good Oratorio as we had last year, at least, even should it be without great solo singers. And for the first coming together of the Society for autumnal practice we commend the chorus: "Be not afraid!"

Whatever doubt there may be about Oratorio, there is none, thank Heaven (and the Harvard Musical Association!) about that which is, after all, the main and central feature of a true musical season, that which more than any other element determines the musical character of a season or a place, and on which all the music really pivots; no doubt at all about that class of concerts which is pretty sure to give the tone to all the other concerts—at least, so we cannot but read the experience of last winter—the concerts of great Orchestral music. The second series of "Symphony Concerts," initiated last year with such signal success by the Association above named, is already guaranteed by a large subscription within the circle of the Association, and arrangements are in progress, in the hands of the same efficient Committee. The general programme will soon be made public. There will be eight concerts, instead of six as before; subscription for the series $6.00; the same afternoon hours which proved so popular, from 4 to 6, will be retained. It had been fully intended to give them also on the same day of the week. But the pre-engagement of the Music Hall, especially for Fairs covering two or three weeks at a time, seals up nearly all the Thursdays against music until the end of January. The Committee therefore are obliged to take Fridays. The loss of the prestige acquired for Thursday, our people having come to identify these concerts with that day, is something; but it is for the concerts to give the character to whatever day, and there appears to be no reason why Fridays will not answer quite as well as Thursdays. By this means the concerts can begin earlier. The first will be given on Friday the 23d of November. Thus there will be three concerts before New Year, at regular intervals of a fortnight; then a wider interval of four weeks, making room for extra rehearsal of new things, and then five more concerts, also at fortnight intervals, except before the last, which may need extra preparation. The orchestra will be essentially the same as last year, numbering not less than 50 instruments and CARL ZERRAHN again will be conductor. No available means will be spared to strengthen and perfect the orchestra and keep up its artistic tone. The scheme of programmes is not yet arranged; but the past is guaranty enough of pure programmes and that they will prove acceptable. The general voice demands the repetition of a good share of the matter of last year's concerts, especially the interesting works then presented for the first time; and only by such repetition can time be gained for study of new things. Such Symphonies and Overtures, by such composers, as made so deep and pure an impression before; such piano-forte Concertos, by the same and perhaps some other artists; such chorus performances, only better, will be grouped with due variety and unity in each concert,—to the utter exclusion of shallow, sentimental trash and empty exhibition pieces. Of course there will be some new features of equal interest with any yet presented. We by no means despair of making the Ninth or "Choral" Symphony available for a grand finale of the series. We hope, by our next issue, to be able to announce the whole arrangement.

Besides the "Symphony Concerts," and all the more because of them, the more cheap and popular, but excellent Wednesday Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union will be resumed later in the season. Such selections as they gave last winter—always a good Symphony and one or two good Overtures, with lighter miscellany for the juveniles—and with so good a little orchestra, and Zerrahn for leader, are to be counted among the fine silver opportunities, if not golden.

Our Chamber Concerts are sure to be classical in character, good in quality if not in quantity. We can only conjecture what we are to have. Mr. Schultze is said to be on his way back from Germany, so that we may look to the Mendelssohn Quintette Club for evenings of string Quartets, Quintets, Trios with piano, &c., of the usual high order; we only hope the evenings will be more than four this winter. There is reason to hope that OTTO DRESER will give some of his exquisite concerts of piano music, having now had more than a year's rest from concert-giving. It is as good as certain that the young ERNST PERANO, who will return and settle down in Boston next month, will give concerts. So there will be no lack of opportunities to hear the best piano compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, besides moderns like Bargiel. We are happy to learn, too, that Mr. KREISSMANN writes from Leipzig to a friend here that he will return early in November, having quite recovered his health, in spite of earlier discouraging reports, but being already tired of Germany (!) after his long experience of American citizenship and life in Boston. Mr. LEONHARD we may look for also; and so the music-lovers here will hold them good (why not?) for more such charming evenings of Bach, Chopin and Schumann, of Robert Franz and Schubert, as they gave us last year.

The great Organ we have always with us, and it is played still and will be played every Wednesday and Saturday noon and Sunday evenings, when the Music Hall is not otherwise occupied. Besides the questionable variety of things played on it to gratify the curiosity of those who go chiefly to hear the instrument put through its stops, there is always enough of Bach and Mendelssohn and Handel in the programmes, to keep alive the knowledge of true organ music.

LESSONS IN GERMAN. Knowledge of the German language is becoming quite as desirable to Americans as that of the French; to musical Americans much more so. The music and the literature of Germany are most rewarding to all students. To those of our readers who may be seeking a good German teacher, we can confidently commend Mrs. ZERRAHN, the wife of our well-known Conductor. To an intelligent familiarity with and love of the best authors of her native tongue, she unites a rare talent for teaching, inspiring others with her own enthusiasm. Those who have witnessed her capital impersonations in private German theatricals, will not wish to hear the language spoken with a purer accent.

THAYER'S LIFE OF BEETHOVEN. We give the following extracts from a letter just received from our old friend, now U. S. Consul at Trieste:

DEAR DWIGHT.—I catch a moment to tell you that at last (!) a volume of "Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben," by &c., . . . is in print. It makes with the preface just about 400 pages, closing with the end of Beethoven's student life and the reunion of himself and two brothers in Vienna. The reasons for printing the German translation first will be found in the prefatory letter. In one point already my course is justified, viz: in this, that a great deal of new and excellent material has been added by my translator—matter which was not to be had when I was making my researches on the Rhine. Of course I have ordered a copy to be immediately sent to you.

By the way, from letters which I have received from Berlin, I learn that a Mrs. E. Seiler and her daughter are about emigrating to Boston. I am not personally acquainted with her, but her reputation as a teacher of singing, and the excellence of a small pamphlet by her upon the development and management of the voice, lead me to the opinion, that she will prove a very valuable addition to our corps of musical instructors. At all events, I hope she will have a fair trial and have no cause to regret the step she has taken. I understand she was connected with Helmholtz in those magnificent studies which formed the basis of his wonderful work upon the "Sensations of Tones," (Tonempfindungen.)

Yours as ever,

A. W. T.

MASTER COKER, the boy soprano, will return, we understand, this fall, and make a concert tour through the States. His exquisite voice, artistic singing, and fresh musical fervor have won much admiration in England. Who will not be glad to hear this rare voice again before it inevitably changes? Master Coker will be accompanied on his tour by Miss Adelaide Phillips, Mr. George Simpson, the well known tenor, Signor Strini, basso, Mr. Davies, baritone, and Mr. Edward Hoffmann, pianist.

MUSICAL CONVENTION AT KEENE, N. H. A correspondent of the Worcester Spy writes:—This was the fourteenth annual session of the convention, and was the best of any we have ever attended there. The conductors were Carl Zerrahn and L. O. Emerson of Boston. The orchestra was composed of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, with the addition of a double-bass. Added to this was a splendid "Chickering Grand" and a Mason & Hamlin cabinet organ. The solo singers were Mrs. H. M. Smith, soprano; Miss Annie Carey, contralto; Mr. James Whitney, tenor; Mr. M. W. Whitney and J. F. Rudolphsen, basses, all from Boston. The music given was Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's Forty-second Psalm, "As the Hart Pants," and selections from Emerson's new church book, the "Jubilate."

The convention opened on Monday, Aug. 20, and Mr. Emerson had charge, and the day and evening and a part of Tuesday was devoted to the practice of church music. By this time Mr. Zerrahn had arrived, and he commenced the rehearsals of the Psalm and Stabat Mater.

The first concert was given Wednesday night, by the Quintette Club, assisted by Mrs. Smith, Miss Carey, and Mr. Rudolphsen. It was a fine entertainment and was enjoyed by all present, we doubt not.

Thursday the usual rehearsals took place, and in the evening a second concert was given, of a miscellaneous character; the first part consisting of songs, duets, &c., and the second part consisted of the Stabat Mater. This was performed in good style, and Mr. Zerrahn deserves great praise for bringing this work out so well with so little rehearsal. Mr. Whitney sang the tenor air "Cujus Animam" in excellent taste. He possesses a pure tenor voice, his style of singing is good, and we hope to hear him in Worcester at some of your musical gatherings. "Quis est Homo" was sung by Mrs. Smith and Miss Carey; their voices blended together beautifully in this duet. Mr. Rudolphsen sang the basso solo, "Pro Peccatis" in a very finished manner. Mr. M. W. Whitney sang the solo in "Eia Mater" with much acceptance. He has established himself as a favorite in Keene; we never heard him sing better; in fact, he is the only real Basso they have in Boston. Miss Cary sang "Fac ut portem" in good taste and fine expression. The quartet "Sancta Mater" was sung uncommonly well by Mrs. Smith, Miss Carey, Mr. Whitney, tenor, and Mr. Rudolphsen; it was warmly applauded. But we think the finest specimen of quartet singing we heard was "Quando Corpus," sung without accompaniment by the same artists, with the exception of Mr. Rudolphsen, Mr. Whitney singing the bass. The composition is exceedingly difficult to sing. The intervals are strange, and at times discordant, unless the intonation is perfect, but a most beautiful quartet it is. At the close Mr. Meisel softly played the chord of G minor, (the key in which it is written,) and found the singers were exactly on the key. They were handsomely complimented by Mr. Zerrahn. Mrs. Smith sang the solo in the "Inflammas" in brilliant style. The choruses were well done by the large number of voices. Friday night the forty-second Psalm was given with other selections. The solo singers were well received by the people of Keene, and we doubt if a better quintet could have been secured. Mr. Zerrahn succeeds admirably in bringing out the voices and making them sing difficult music with but little rehearsal.

HERR BOGUMIL DAWISON, the greatest of German actors (Devrient perhaps excepted), and one of the greatest Shakespearian actors living, arrived in New York a few days since, in the most quiet manner, unannounced and unexpected. The war probably induced him to leave Dresden, where he has long been the reigning star of the royal theatre, though well known in all the principal theatres of Germany. He is of Bohemian origin, now well advanced in years, and recently has been pensioned off, only acting occasionally. But his announcement is always greeted with enthusiasm. He comes to our shores under no engagement, it appears; but German managers in New York are eagerly competing for his services. If we only had such dramatic companies here as he had to play with him in Germany, it would be a treat indeed (to all who understood the German language) to witness his masterly impersonations of Richard III., Hamlet, &c. We have seen him in these parts, and dare not say that we have ever witnessed greater acting. The freshness of his voice is gone, but the genius is unmistakable. It would be interesting to compare his Hamlet, and other Shakespearian characters (so far as the German version of the plays admits) with the interpretations of our admirable Edwin Booth. Dawison has the artistic sincerity so common in Germany, which puts art before self, and does not shrink from taking small parts to make the whole play good. Thus in the little partly musical, partly spoken drama of "Preciosa," with Weber's music, we have seen him play the leading gypsy to the life, greatly contributing to the exquisite whole.

PLAIDY, the veteran piano teacher in the Leipzig Conservatorium will soon emigrate, it is said, to New York.

SINGING ON COMMISSION. Novello's Musical Times, reviewing the past musical season in London, thus shows up one of the tricks of trade, in which, shame to say, there are too many distinguished public singers ready to connive "for a consideration":

The gradual advance of the "Ballad Concert" has been a noteworthy feature of the past musical season. That these entertainments have been mainly fostered by music-sellers there can scarcely be a doubt; but we are sorry to see artists of the highest eminence letting themselves out for hire to further the spread of such utter inanities as we have been compelled to listen to at these concerts. That the "Royalty" system is lucrative alike to vocalists and publishers cannot be questioned; but the degradation to art and artists should have some little weight with those who live by the opinion of the public. Good voices and good singing may galvanize into something like life such puerilities as "The sparrow's chirp," or "My mother's arm-chair;" but the real question is whether vocalists of established reputation would ever have travelled beyond the title pages of these effusions, had they not secured a positive interest in every copy sold. Apart from these modern manufactures, however, many of the really good songs by native composers have been resuscitated at these concerts; and although we cannot admit that Balfe's and Wallace's compositions can be classed under the head of "Old English Ballads," we are willing to allow that entertainments of this nature, with a judiciously selected programme, might do good, if only by reminding an audience that English composers have left us some music of purely home growth.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Hunter's Farewell. (Wer hat dich, du schöner wald). Song. Mendelssohn. 40

One of the set arranged from 4 part songs, and has an unusual richness in its harmonic effects. In five flats.

Autumn song. (Herbstlied). Song. Mendelssohn. 40

Of the same set. In E minor, changing near the end to E major. A fine song, and, like the others, has German and English words.

I love it,—that village so old. Song. F. Abt. 30

About a remarkable place where there "was peace and content," a fine old acre, shaven lawn, maypole, and elders sitting under a tree. Fine music.

The charming young widow I met in the train.

Comic. W. H. Cove.

The rather green "Cove," who relates his adventures with the widow, the loss of his watch and purse, &c., in a funny way. Night verses, and a laugh in each. Very pretty music, and easy.

I'll meet thee in the lane. S'g & Cho. Blamphin. 40

A very musical description of a pleasant interview in the green, moon-lit lane, from 9 to 10 o'clock, P. M. Fine illustrated title.

Ruby. I opened the leaves of a book, last night. V. Gabriel. 30

Contains much deep feeling, and is of a high order.

Your name. Song. T. Ryan. 30

A queer story. Song. Moulton. 30

Pleasing comic song.

Instrumental.

Grand Paraphrase de Concert. J. Ascher, Op. 50. 65

Peculiar in some respects. Good difficult pieces increase in number very slowly, and those who play such pieces are but few. This is difficult, but not extremely so, and combines the two national airs, "Partout pour la Syrie," and "God save the Queen," in a striking manner. If you wish to make a sensation in company, without having to work too hard for it, learn this.

Ah che la morte. "Trovatore." (Crown Jewels). Baumbach. 40

No. 1 of this fine set, and very melodious. Moderately easy.

The Battle of Sadowa.

A regular battle piece of imitative character, and one of the best that have been published since the appearance of The "Battle of Prague," which it somewhat resembles. A good piece for lessons, as the firing of the needle guns, &c., require numerous runs, and the different phases of the battle cause frequent changes of style.

Oh, dear, what can the matter be? Trans. by B. Richards. 60

A melody which "talks" quite plainly on an instrument, and is happily chosen for transposition.

Mabel galop. D. Godfrey. 50

Quite brilliant and effective.

Books.

A WINTER EVENING'S ENTERTAINMENT. Social Cantata. Words by Sydney Dyer. Music by A. Cull. $1.00

A very pleasing and genial cantata, representing an old-fashioned "quilting party," with a snow-ball scene, and various in-door amusements, enlivened by sprightly choruses, duets, and solos, in which William and Estella sing the love songs, and Jenkins and Araminta maintain the comic element. Not difficult, and as the music is good throughout, it bids fair to be very popular.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Sonnet.

TO C. F. D.

We were alone within a dim alcove,
From whose dark walls the shadows seemed to start,

As those deft fingers, with consummate art,
Into the purple web of twilight wove
The subtle mysteries of fate and love.
I seemed to see Beethoven and Mozart—
And yet one other soul that stood apart—
Arise within the darkness to approve.

And when those hands,—unknown unto whom
Their gift of wondrous grace had been displayed—
Paused o'er the keys till silence filled the room,
Before they moved again, I saw the shade
Of sad-eyed Chopin, leaning through the gloom,
Whisper a word—and then again they played.

Astorga.

Translated for this Journal from W. H. BIANZI'S "Musikalische Charakterköpfe."

EMANUEL ASTORGA, commonly with the prefix of "Baron," was the name borne by an Italian singer and composer of the first half of the eighteenth century.*

I fancy to myself Astorga as a tall, proud, noble form, a little bowed by the weight of secret grief, the profile sketched in fine but bold outlines, a burning dark eye, a ghastly pale face between long waving locks of raven blackness. Do not tell me that the man probably wore wig and cue, or at least his dark hair powdered white; periwig and powder would quite belie his thoroughly romantic type of character. Manners and outward forms are those of the man of the world; but under this light mask, which education and custom have woven, looks out the poet, who had to live in the splendor of courts, when he would so much rather have lived all alone by himself. Not only do his compositions glowing with Southern fire stamp him as a musical romanticist in that pig-tail period; but equally his outward personality, his fate in life, which as it were weave themselves into the poem. In his music vibrates the old legend of the outcast, of the soul whose vital nerve had been poisoned, and who retires from the world of deeds into the dream world of Art as into the asylum of a cloister.

We meet the youth of twenty years for the first time—on the place of execution, where the headsman's understrappers hold him fast, that he may not turn his eyes away from the quivering corpse of his father. It was the weak-minded Philip V. of Spain, who by such means suppressed the insurrectionary spirit on the isle of Sicily, which had been annexed to his kingdom; and Astorga's father had been one of the heads of the party who had drawn sword for the independence of the island. The mother broke her heart. Of the son the tradition runs, that for weeks long in a state of benumbed unconsciousness he had not left the place of horror, and the image of his youthful sorrow threatened to work upon the sensuously excitable Sicilians even more powerfully than the terror of the execution. Then the Countess Ursini, the celebrated first lady of the queen's, or more properly of the king's, household, had him taken away and carried to the monastery at Astorga in Spain.

To this must we attribute this musician's pale face between the black locks; to this the soft breath of sadness resting upon all his works. But here at the very root, too, the melancholy trait in Astorga's compositions distinguishes itself from the sentimentality in the works of most of the modern artists—with pale faces. He had actually lived through a tragical fate; he had "made his little songs" out of his own most real "great sorrows.*" It was not the hospital air of the

• "Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen

study chamber, but the anguish of a terrible historical moment, that lay so pale upon his cheeks.

Over the beginning and end of his life the deepest obscurity reigns. We do not even know his real name. King Philip had broken up his family arms, confiscated his estates, and the family name of the outlaw has vanished and become forgotten. From the silent cloister, where Emanuel won in Art new courage to endure life, he took the name of Astorga. The wrath of the king at least could not prevent the son of the executed nobleman from winning for his new name an artistic patent of nobility, which enabled him to brook the extermination of his old name. Equal obscurity rests over the end of the master. He is supposed to have retired into some Bohemian monastery, no one knows what, and there to have died, no one knows when. And between this mysterious entrance and exit lies a romance.

From the Spanish monastery Astorga had gone to the court of the duke of Parma, where he found hospitable reception and could live for the art of song, which had brought health back to him. Here the poetic youth got entangled in a love relation with the daughter of the prince, almost like that which Goethe has described in "Tasso." Astorga was not less unhappy, and yet happier than Tasso. The Duke, when he saw through the thing, sent him to Vienna, the most musical court of that time; and so the artist, for the lover's sake, was led forth into the great musical world, and the sacrifice of a passion nipped in the bud brought him an excellent Art school. The imperial residence at Vienna was at that time a true arena for every capable musician. The Kapelle (orchestra) of Leopold I. numbered nearly a hundred men. The emperor himself examined its members; he seems often to have forgotten the study of political for that of musical counterpoint, and to have been more at home among his musicians than among his ministers. When he perceived that his hour was nearly come, he summoned his Kapelle to his bed-side and so died in the middle of a concert.

The unfortunate Sicilian nobleman found a friendly asylum at the tuneful court of Leopold, and the Emperor honored him with his personal intercourse. After his death, Astorga went out into the wide world and travelled through the half of Europe on an artistic pilgrimage of years. It was a very aristocratic Art journey. For the most part the composer stopped in princely houses. Everywhere he left the fame of his genius behind him, but only a single time in his life did he come out before the public in the production of an opera.

While he saw so many cities and countries, he still veiled his face before his native land and was never willing to see it again. But although the singer wished to forget his island home, he never could deny it. In the soft, melodious, curly waves of the rondos of his chamber cantatas the well-known Sicilian popular airs are heard again. There it seems as if the Siciliano, that prototype of the gently gliding rhythm of the graceful six-eight measure, had unconsciously rung in the composer's ears. It seems to us not seldom in these love-songs of Astorga, as if we heard the O sanctissima of the Sicilian mariner, to which the oars gently beat time, while the tepid evening breeze wafts the tremulous expiring sounds away over the boundless surface of the tranquil sea.

Criticism has doubted the authenticity of many of these details in the romance of Astorga's life. It has found in it too little prose, too little of the Philister element, to see the stamp of credibility. The scanty remains of Astorga's works furnish evidence of the genuineness of these details, at least so far as melodies and harmonies can witness to the facts of outward life.

It is perhaps more than a play of accident, that Astorga in his noble Stabat Mater has strangely set the passage: "Fac ut animæ donetur Paradisi gloria" in the minor. Is it not the soul steeped in sorrow, consecrated to Art by the depth of misfortune, which even in the glory of Paradise cannot suppress an echo of yearning sadness? And then the passage where it reads, that a sword has passed through the sighing heart of the Mother of God! Pertransiit gladius! The basses at these words stalk on demoniacally in chromatic passages against the billowy upper voices; they cut as with a sword of sharpness into their web. Few composers in this passage, which has been composed innumerable times, so send the martyr feeling through the bone and marrow of the hearer, as the otherwise so mild Astorga. This is the sword that went through the young man's soul on the place of execution, when it severed his father's life; and perhaps he has here unconsciously set the history of his own agony in notes.

Another great church work of the master, his Requiem, is so far only discovered in fragments. Cloud upon cloud hides the story of this man; but the little that we know and possess of him with certainty, is so precious, that it makes us long to explore that which is in the dark and lost.

We alluded above to Astorga's chamber cantatas. Such a Cantata a voce sola out of the pig-tail period is for the most part a dry-rattling pastoral love music, an endless sigh of love all curled up into trills and floriture. Everlastingly the same litany of infidelity and treachery and terrible love torment in the minor, or, on the other hand, of inexpressible bliss of love in the major. Such Cantatas are then—literally—tediousness set to notes. For the most part therefore they look not merely old-fashioned, but repulsively wrinkled and grizzled. It is as if Methuselah should make a bleating confession of love to a fresh blooming maid of seventeen. In Astorga's Cantatas the verses are as trite as in the rest; and the stiff, awkward form is adhered to. But we forget both in the deep, warm glow of soul gushing from the tones that float over the meagre texts. Like a Murillo compared to the late Italian painters of the seventeenth century, Astorga's chamber music contrasts with the works of that kind by the otherwise kindred masters of the Neapolitan school. It is the musical Tasso, dreaming of his Leonora at the court of Parma, that meets us in these love hymns; not the stiff schoolmaster Nicolo Porpora, writing solfeggi upon vows of love. It is the romantic glow, the burning tone of color of the Southron, that so sharply distinguishes Astorga from most of his contemporaries and brings him so near to the present. But with all the glow of passion he never renounces the musical aristocrat, the gentle dignity, the fine, high-bred reserve in all his forms of Art.

Perhaps no two characters can be found in the whole history of music which stand in sharper contrast to each other than Wenzel Müller and Astorga. It may seem an odd idea to name the two together. But both were natures in the full sense of the word; both original, genial, only wide apart as the poles in ends and means; both genuine artistic characters. Müller wrote for the people, Astorga for the select circle of the poetically initiated; the latter was a lonely spirit, the former lived in the mass. Müller is no longer much esteemed, because he was too popular; Astorga is but little more known, because he was too aristocratic. Both are ignored by the pig-tails of the school: Astorga, because he has too much poetry for them; Müller, because he has too much nature for them. Astorga remained isolated in his activity; Müller saw himself surrounded by numerous pupils. The latter led the life of a respectable common-place citizen; the former was flung fighting and struggling from adventure to adventure. Of the circumstances of Müller's life we know almost nothing, nor do we lose much thereby, since we know so much the more of his labors; of Astorga's destinies much more is known, but so much the less of his creations.

The silent joy, the painfully smothered ecstasy, the secret Columbus-like consciousness of the lover of Art, who amid a heap of trashy paintings suddenly discovers a masterwork veiled by the smut of centuries, has been often enough described both seriously and in jest. The enthusiast becomes a child again; the Christmas joy of long vanished years springs into new life. This I could perceive in myself when, amongst the musical manuscripts which I obtained from an old Dutch collection, I found a couple of "new" Cantatas by Astorga, in fact those very love songs of the Tasso of Parma, of which I have been speaking. If one had discovered similar buried treasures of poetical literature, the first thought would be to publish them. With musical treasures on the contrary that is the last thought. There is no longer a whole edition of men able to pay,* who would take interest in an Astorga. The thought that you possess all alone a masterpiece, and can enjoy it all alone, has also a high charm, though to be sure somewhat egotistical. Not long ago, on the hundredth anniversary of the death of the great Sebastian Bach, the pride of the German nation, a Bach Society had to be founded, to render it in that way possible, by subscription, after a hundred years, to present the works of the national master, complete and correct, for once, to the nation! To this shamefully mortifying example no other art offers a counterpart.

It has always seemed to us a monstrous shame when we remarked, how recently a church aria of Stradella came to be assiduously sung in concerts, merely because it occurred to a libretto poet to travesty an anecdote from the life of that old musician in the form of an opera. Now all at once the long forgotten Stradella became attractive; people were curious to know how the man actually sung, who now treads the stage as such a sentimental tenore amoroso.

Admirers of Astorga have within a few years, had his noblest work, the Stabat Mater, engraved, not for the sake of gain, but to gratify their own enthusiasm enough to kindle something of the same in others.† No publisher's name appears on the title page of the score; it is only decorated by a simple cross.

It is the cross, to which the ideal tone-poetry of the olden time has been nailed by modern music-makers!

* Chorus (of thriving music-publishers and impresarios): Why the deuce do you write about him then, you fool? The pay, the pay's the thing, wherewith we catch, &c.—Ta.

† Robert Franz, the admirable arranger and editor of so many of the Bach Cantatas, has recently done the same service for Astorga's Stabat Mater.—Ta.

Otto Nicolai.

Precisely at this time, Berlin was at a very high, if not, indeed, the highest point of its musical glory. The Opera, and the performances of the artists there, under the dictatorial power of Spontini, enjoyed a world-wide renown; while the Singacademie, under the management of Zelter, and, also, the latter's "Liedertafel," were extremely celebrated. To these must be added the "Sinfoniesoreen," less indebted for their reputation to the leading musician, connected with them, namely the Concertmeister, Moser, than to their programmes and the way in which those programmes were carried out. There were, also, carefully executed concerts of Chamber-Music given by the most distinguished of the local artists. No virtuoso of importance omitted visiting Berlin, but, on the contrary, every such a one considered it most meritorious to add a new leaf to its wreath of glory. Round about all that was done by the musicians in question were grouped, too, men like Bernh. Klein, Felix Mendelssohn, G. Meyerbeer, Ludwig Berger, A. B. Marx, Romberg, Rellstab, Ries, and many more, who cast on the capital a lustre seen far and wide.

It was with a beating heart that, on a fine day in October, 1827, Otto Nicolai drove through the Prenzlau Gate, and the streets of Berlin, teeming with busy, never-ending life. Yet a series of happier and more hopeful days, awaking in his breast every noble aspiration and effort, was then beginning for him. He immediately delivered the letters of recommendation which he had received from Herr Adler and other patrons. These letters, in the first instance, procured him the protection of a very estimable family, and then, a fact of the highest importance for him, introduced him to the celebrated masters: Klein, Berger, and Zelter, under whom he began and continued, with the greatest assiduity, his theoretical musical studies. Of these three especially kind-hearted and amiable men, he gained more particularly the good-will and affections of the last in a high degree. To this he owed not alone his remarkable progress in music, but innumerable favors. Zelter improved his voice, and then introduced him as a bass-singer into the Singacademie, where he was fond of frequently entrusting him with little solos, though he commanded the services of many other members possessed of undoubtedly superior powers. He would fain, also, have secured his favorite for his Liedertafel, but his desire was effectually thwarted by the strict statutes of that society, and, despite his absolutism as director, he could not subvert them for the sake of one person. The number of members was limited to twenty-four, and, therefore, the number of candidates anxious to belong to the society so large that they had to wait years before they could be admitted. In consequence of this and other obstacles, Zelter afterwards encouraged young Nicolai to establish an independent society, which, under Zelter's directions, was soon brought into working order, and met, under Nicolai, every week in the Englisches Haus. Nicolai wrote for it several vocal quartets, the society, as a rule, and in imitation of Zelter's Liedertafel, singing no music, and, if possible, no words, but what was written by some of its members. (See Nicolai, Op. 4, 6, 9, 10, 17, etc.)

Thanks, also, to the kindness evinced for him by Zelter, who was now often to be seen in his young friend's company when taking his once solitary walks, Nicolai formed many interesting acquaintanceships, and was admitted into many excellent families. Foremost among these may be mentioned the family of Herr Rintel, Sanitätsrath (officer of the Board of Health,) and Zelter's son-in-law, where music was lovingly and tenderly fostered.

Nicolai took advantage, moreover, of the first part of his residence in Berlin to do what he had long neglected doing, that is, to go through a regular course of reading such as is pursued at the Gymnasiums. This brought him into contact with Professor Fischer, an excellent teacher at the Graues Kloster, and also a highly respectable composer. Under him were the gymnasial singing-classes. He made young Nicolai, whose musical talent did not escape his penetrating glance, a member of the model singing-class, as it was called, which met every Thursday from five to six in the afternoon, and was accompanied in its practice by Royal chamber-musicians. In this class, where only a few exceedingly good singers were admitted, Nicolai became acquainted with Ferdinand Gumbert, then nine years old, afterwards celebrated as a lyric composer, and whose magnificent soprano voice produced a deep impression on him. He often sang in the class, as well as at Herr Rintel's, duets with Gumbert, and these had something to do with his subsequent partiality for composing duets to be sung by soprano and bass.* One of his most favorite works at that period was Romberg's "Glocke." The two, when well-known and popular composers, afterwards renewed their acquaintance in Vienna, and mutually recalled with pleasure these happy days of their youth. The mode in which Nicolai sang Zelter's ballads, generally written for a bass, as well as his solos at the performances of the Singacademie, even then rendered him well known and popular as a vocalist.†

In proportion as his musical knowledge increased under the guidance of his teachers, he began to turn it to material account, and, after no very long period, had the satisfaction of becoming a * See Nicolai, Op. 2, 14, 15, 23.

† It is remarkable that, in his sketch already quoted, Kapper should assert that Nicolai had no talent for singing. We can only suppose that, later in life, Nicolai never used his voice, and that this caused Kapper to make such an assertion.

highly esteemed pianoforte and singing master, enjoying the most influential patronage.

But his talent for composition, also, now began to be manifested in the most gratifying manner, and to seek a vent in pianoforte pieces and songs. Even the Duet for Soprano and Bass, Op. 2, published as a first work, by Bechtold and Hartje, met with an encouraging reception. The most respectable critical paper of Berlin, the Berliner Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, which then, under Marx's direction, stood very high, spoke thus in No. 50, for the year 1830: "The little work, which is very well and correctly composed, will, without putting forth, or pretending to satisfy, any great pretensions, be welcomed by many singers. It may be had also in written orchestral parts." The copyright passed into the hands of Whistling of Leipzig, after the failure of the original publishers. This duet, as likewise six "Dances brillantes," under the title: "Souvenir de Lutzkau," Berlin, Bethge, were gradually followed by songs, duets, and vocal quartets, creating a more and more favorable impression.

Even then his undoubted talent for vocal compositions was everywhere apparent. While his pianoforte productions, though as a rule admirably worked out, never rose to the height of anything extraordinary, he has left behind him in his vocal works a treasure progressing in value as it went on. In the first period, embracing his first residence in Berlin, that is to say: till about the year, 1833, of his smaller efforts (we will return to the larger ones presently) it was more especially his duets which placed his talent for composition in the strongest light, and, at the same time, afforded evidence of his skill in treating the different voices artistically. The melodious duet, Op. 2, already mentioned: "Wenn sanft des Abends Lüfte säuseln," is still a favorite with many singers, so that the present publisher, Herr Heinrichshofen, has thought it worth while to bring out a new and elegant edition. Of the other songs of the same kind, we would direct especial attention to the duet, full of deep feeling: "Selig wer liebt" (Op. 14, No. 1.) wherein the different renderings of these words by the soprano and the bass are very finely and cleverly conceived. In No. 2 of this work: "Auf ewig dein," we would point to the fiery passion with which the soprano first recites strophe for strophe, while the bass follows in melodious sequences, both uniting in the refrain of good wishes. The concluding verse in G minor is characteristic, melting into a deliciously charming accompaniment in G major. "Rastlose Liebe," too, Op. 23, is admirable for its warmth of passion, and blends very beautifully art and melody.

But the severe and strict tendencies of his teachers, especially Klein and Zelter, directed his attention to the graver subjects in Art, and thus most of his compositions of that time belong to the sacred style. Most of them are still unpublished, and, at a later epoch, found in their composer their most austere judge. He afterwards, as Kapper informs us, produced only a psalm, but with great success, at Vienna, and, having most carefully touched it up in MS., dedicated a Mass to the King of Prussia, which, probably, had something to do with his subsequent appointment as head of the cathedral choir in Berlin.

But, at a concert in the Englisches Haus, in April, 1833, and at a performance of sacred music in the Garrison Church, the following month, when artists from the Royal Operahouse and the Königstadt Theatre effectively supported him, Nicolai gave the general public, also, a brilliant proof of the progress he had made in all the above-mentioned branches of his art. Thus the Freimüthige says in its No. 78 of that year: "Otto Nicolai's concert was well attended and well got up. The young concert-giver appeared as composer, singer, and pianist, and in all three characters exhibited remarkable talent. That, in addition to his own compositions, he should select pieces by Mozart and Beethoven, and not, as is usually the case, sacrifice to the taste of the day at the expense of Art, deserves being mentioned."

It was at this period, too, that Nicolai composed a very spirited Hymn with brass accompaniment. The Junior Artistic Association (Künstlerverein) produced it, on the 16th April, 1833, at the Englisches Haus, on the occasion of the Dürer Festival, when it was most favorably received.

We cannot part from Nicolai's successful creative efforts during this first period without mentioning three important works, which had the principal share in establishing his reputation and position in Berlin, and which even attracted the attention of the King, who gave the young composer a ring of brilliants as a mark of his favor, and subsequently facilitated his career, by the appointment at Rome. They were a "Te Deum," commenced when he was still under the influence of Klein, "as a thanksgiving for the disappearance of the cholera from Prussia" (completed March, 1832;) a Symphony in four movements; and a "Christmas Overture" ("Weihnachtsoverture,") publicly performed at the Singacademie and in the Garrison Church. They were most kindly and encouragingly received by the public and all the critics, and evoked numerous signs of extraordinary interest, in which the art-loving public of Leipzig, also, joined, when the last-named work was performed in that city on the 18th December, 1834.

We have now to speak of a period in Nicolai's life, when his feelings of gratitude towards his benefactors received more than one wound. Just as in life hours of merriment and hours of sorrow not only quickly alternate but actually come together, and as Chance, in her fits of caprice, frequently does not disdain to paint upon the most gloomy background the most grotesque figures, so did events succeed each other in those happy days of youthful dreams, when the dreamer revelled in the sweetest hopes for the Future—in those hours of inward satisfaction and elevation, when everyone regarded with respect Nicolai's youthful talent, which exhibited in his works not only deep poetical conception, but a thoroughly educated musical taste, rare qualities which could belong only to some one extraordinary in Art. In the midst of this felicity, he lost, on the 15th May, 1832, his fatherly friend and teacher, Zelter, and, scarcely four months afterwards, on the 9th September, Bernhard Klein, to whom he owed the scientific foundation on which his talent for composition reposed. They died, the one an old man, the other full of health and strength. Both were regretted by the entire world of Art, of which they were worthy members, but by none more deeply and more sincerely than by Nicolai, on whom the loss of each produced a marked effect, even interrupting his usual exertions. All the sufferings of his youth were revived within him, and when once these serious chords had been struck, they re-echoed for a long time through his subsequent life. Perhaps we may date from this epoch the dissatisfaction always remarked by his intimate friends, and which, even in the happiest moments, and many such, thanks to Fate, were in store for him, embittered every pleasure. Very frequently, when, as he could be, he was merry even to extravagance, he would burst out into the opposite extreme of melancholy dejection, and punish himself with the words: "Fool that I am! How could I so far again forget myself! I, of all men in the world, have no right to do so!" In fact, he was fond, on every occasion, of taking the most melancholy view of life, and hence the striking alternations of merriment and depression, for which people could frequently assign no valid reason. Poor Nicolai, it was not your life but your soul which resembled the mournful pictures you so often painted for your own torment, only that your good genius developed out of them the most lovely blossoms and fruit. In this state, humbled and sorrowful, he again made an attempt to renew his intercourse with his father, and was so delighted when he succeeded, and he visited him in Posen in 1832, that he cast off the lethargy and sadness with which he had been afflicted for months, and devoted himself with all his energies to his duty as a teacher, nay: felt his vocation for it doubly strong. It was an attempt, though he himself was not clearly conscious of its being so, to fill up the void left by Klein, who was unrivalled in his scientific knowledge, that induced him to announce, for the winter of 1832-33, private lectures on thorough-bass and composition. In the then dearth of really good theoretical teachers, these lectures would perhaps have been successful, if, a short time afterwards, his fate had not conducted Nicolai to a country where he was not above being again degraded into a pupil: Italy.

In Berlin Nicolai was a frequent visitor at the house of a very distinguished and clever lady, who collected around her all the literary and artistic celebrities. To her he was indebted for the acquaintance of the famous theologist Schleiermacher, in whose family he was appointed music-master. The circumstance proved of the greatest importance to him, as it was the means of introducing him to that clever antiquarian and enthusiastic champion of Protestantism, Herr Carl von Bunsen, then Prussian Ambassador to the Papal Court at Rome, whom political affairs had brought to Berlin. Herr von Bunsen's penetrating glance immediately enabled him to perceive the young artist's great talent, and he resolved to secure it for the furtherance of his plans which were directed to the improvement of Protestant church-music. It required no very powerful persuasion (for what artist's heart does not beat more quickly and more joyously when thinking of Italy, the cradle of Art?) to induce Nicolai to proceed to Rome, nor the exertion of all Herr von Bunsen's influence at Court to prevail on the King, already favorably disposed towards so promising an artist, to confer on him the post of organist in the Ambassador's Chapel in Rome. Thus we find the young musician, followed by the sincerest good wishes of his numerous friends, and by a flattering critical notice from the pen of Ballstab, on Sunday, the 8th December, 1833, on the road to Italy, where he was destined to pluck his first laurels. The course of his journey took him through Leipzig, Munich, and, by the Alps, through Verona, Padua, Venice, Ferrara, Bologna, Florence, Leghorn, and Civita Vecchia.

Italy, as could not fail to be the case, worked upon the excitable young artist with all the power of the charm peculiar to it, and his surging feelings rose to enthusiasm amid the innumerable great and beautiful objects which the Eternal City, his new and enviable residence, contained within its limits. As a musician, he more especially took the deepest interest in St. Peter's, and the Sixtine Chapel, the innumerable and priceless manuscripts dating from the palmy days of strict sacred music, and, above all, in the Abate Giuseppe Baini, Director of the Papal Chapel, one of the most distinguished musical scholars of any period, whose strict severity and deep love of art stood out, compared with the frivolous doings of modern Italian musicians, almost like Trajan's Column, the Colosseum, the baths of Caracalla, &c., as the monumental remains of a better age. The three combined directed Nicolai's genius exclusively towards the most elevated aims. Under Baini's guidance he studied ancient sacred music in sources inaccessible to any one else, and open only to the Papal director, and commenced the foundation of that valuable collection of manuscripts on which, as they were obtained only by the most unremitted exertion, and frequently by pecuniary sacrifices almost beyond his means, he greatly prided himself as long as he lived. After his decease the majority—namely, eighty-two specimens of manuscript and exceedingly rare old printed compositions—went to the Royal Library, Berlin (according to a notice in the Preuss. Staatsanzeiger). At St. Peter's finally, while listening to the strains of the incomparable Sixtina, he studied psalmody, afterwards turning to account in the Berlin Cathedral Choir the experience he had gained from hearing Allegri's "Miserere," Palestrina's Masses, &c.

Though, when looking at the subsequent course of his development in Italy, we may deplore that any one endowed with such talent should have visited the Promised Land of Art so young, and as a scholar as yet possessing too little energy to assert his idiosyncrasy, instead of sacrificing it entirely to the foreign element, we should remember two great characters, Mozart and Meyerbeer, who first visited Italy under similar circumstances and at the same age, and who nevertheless assimilated the new elements to their own originality, and thus created a separate style of art. Nicolai evidently attempted to do the same. He only partially effected his object, however; but then his life was a short one. How, to the surprise of all, he fell into a style so dissimilar to strict artistic tendencies, is what we shall show in the course of our sketch. We will, for the present, simply mention that it was not without pain that Baini perceived this revulsion in the development of his pupil's mind. He did not die till the 10th May, 1844, exactly five years before Nicolai.

That in his official capacity as organist, Nicolai, despite the miserable salary of thirteen scudi a month, neglected nothing, is a fact which it is almost superfluous to notice; punctuality and care in matters connected with his profession were virtues which not even his opponents ever dared deny him. His duties, however, took up so little of his time, that the situation seemed rather to exist for him instead of his existing for the situation. It afforded him, certainly, the opportunity of improving himself very considerably in organ-playing, so that in this particular, as in others, he increased his capabilities as a musician. But of more importance to him than all this were his relations with the head of the Embassy, who now commenced carrying out the plans he had conceived at the time of Nicolai's engagement in Berlin. To enter at length into Bunsen's connection with the religious reforms which had commenced in Prussia some years previously would lead us beyond the limits of our notice; but that the religious question then raised and so eagerly discussed possessed one of its main supports in Rome, and in Herr von Bunsen, is beyond a doubt. As far as the reforms affected music, this really indefatigable champion of Protestant churchship wished to evolve, out of the elements furnished by Roman Catholic art in its very focus, a new and original arrangement for divine service, and he hoped that, when its good points had been seen at Berlin, this arrangement would be generally introduced into his native land. Hence springs the liturgy, in many respects peculiar, of the Ambassador's Chapel at Rome, Nicolai having actively contributed his share by composing liturgies, motets, and psalms. Indeed, this was the most fertile part of his life as far as sacred music went. In his situations at Vienna and Berlin, he drew, as a rule, from this source, and, at most, merely re-modelled this or that work.

A young German, zealous in his art and enjoying the highest patronage, could not fail to obtain admission into many distinguished families. The result of his new connections was the gradual abandonment of the old Berlin connections, which he had kept up by correspondence.—Only on hearing that there had been published in Germany, and what is more in Berlin, a book on Italy; that this book had become notorious on account of its gross misrepresentations; and that its author, a musician named G. Nicolai, had, on account of numerous points of resemblance, been set down as Nicolai himself, facts which rendered him uneasy about his reputation at home, was he induced to break silence, and, in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, of the 11th December, 1835, publish a letter, which, on account of want of space, we unfortunately cannot give in its entirety, and which sufficiently characterizes his irritability and passionate warmth of temper.

PUNCH AND POLYPHEMUS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—"Hats off, gentlemen—a Genius!" quoth a friend of Robert Schumann, when introducing some new music by Chopin, the composer. Well, if one is to take one's hat off in reverence to Chopin, one ought to go upon one's knees, at least, when hearing Handel. So, open Sesame, young Cerberus, and let me squeeze in somewhere to perform my genuflection, if you can't find me a seat. Thus spoke the Great Punch at the Little Handel Festival, which was held the other day in the Crystal Palace Concert-room; and his magnificent humility so moved the stern policeman that an extra chair was placed, on this occasion only, in the gorgeous private box.

My eye, what a crowd! was Mr. Punch's classic thought, as he placidly surveyed the worshippers of Handel, who had made a special pilgrimage all the way to Sydenham to listen to his songs. Three thousand chairs at least were all as full as coat-tails and crinolines could make them, and there were hundreds of legs standing at the sides and in the doorways, that the ears which they belonged to might hear Acis once again. Once again! ah, yes, alas! oime! cheu fugaces! I remember, I remember, years ago at Drury Lane, Once I heard delightful Acis—now I hear it once again. Priscilla Horton then was Acis, and how sprightly she was looking, and how splendidly she sang! And how all the town was talking of the Clarkson Stanfield scenery, and especially the moving waves that, with innumerable murmurs, broke upon the stage! By Jove, too, I remember that dear glorious old Stanny did it all for love, and wouldn't take a penny from Macready for his work. I should like to see such artists now-a-days, by Jove! To shew my admiration, I'd let 'em draw for Punch upon precisely the same terms.

Thus prattling to himself, Mr. Punch had no great trouble in employing the few minutes ere the overture commenced. Then for an hour and three-quarters, excepting to cry "Bravo!" once or twice to Polypheusus, he never spoke one word. Intentus aures tenebat, and he sucked in the sweet sounds as greedily as aldermen might swallow those of codfish. With a fair quartet of singers, and a not too noisy band, his rapturous enjoyment was undisturbed throughout, until the final chorus, when some fiends in human form came pushing at his knees in their snobbish scramble out. Mr. Punch intends to stamp out these offensive pests, and he was pleased to put his foot down on the dress of one vile snob, to whom he offers no apology for the sounding rent he made. One male snob feebly pleaded that he had to catch a train to take him home in time for "dinner," as if a man had any right or reason to feel hungry, after such a feast of the "rare roast beef of music" as old Handel had been giving him! Better starve, than scramble, snob. Hunger is surely no excuse for selfish rudeness.

At Sydenham every Saturday, by paying half-a-crown you may enjoy a charming Concert, which, a score of years ago, you must have paid a guinea for. "Think of that, Master Brook," as you sit over your claret; and drink success to Mr. Manns, the Crystal caterer of music. Remembering how many pleasant afternoons we owe to him, Mr. Punch, who has not "shwored off" yet, will join you in the toast. Mr. Manns, Sir, here is your good health and all your family's, and may your pleasant Winter Concerts live long-while and prosper!—Punch.

DR. ALOYS SCHMIDT, the pianist and composer, died at Frankfort-on-the-Maine on the 26th ult., aged 78. He was born in 1789 at Erlenbach, on the Maine, and was carefully instructed in music and likewise elementary science by his father, who was himself an organist. In his eleventh year, he went to the then celebrated teacher of composition, Herr André, at Offenbach, and remained in his house five years. He then first settled as a teacher in Frankfort. Some years afterwards, he went, for a short time, to Berlin, and thence to Hanover, where he had been appointed Court-Organist. He appears, however, not to have felt particularly comfortable in that position, for he resigned it in 1829, and returned to Frankfort, which city he never again left. Among his published compositions are Symphonies and Overtures; String Quartets and String Trios; Concertos for Pianoforte; Etudes for Pianoforte; a great many Rondos, Variations, and other small pieces for the Piano, and songs for one or more voices. He wrote, also, the oratorios, Moses and Ruth, and the operas, Das Osterfest zu Paderborn, Die Tochter der Wüste, Valeria, and Der Doppelprozess. He was no genius, but a thoroughly sound musician and a well-educated man. His son, George Aloys, has been Capellmeister in Schwerin since 1856.

Rational Recreation.

To the Editor of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

SIR,—Not very long ago I "assisted," as people say when they want to Frenchify our language, at a very curious exhibition, the locus in quo of which was the large room in St. James's Hall, pronounced by judges more competent than myself to be one of the most spacious in London. On the usual platform stood a piano, an urbane-looking gentleman, marked by the characteristics proper to exhibitors in general, and a black boy of an exceedingly repulsive appearance. The earlier part of the entertainment I had missed, not at all to my regret, and at the moment of my arrival the exhibitor was informing the audience that the black boy, who rejoiced in the appellation of "Blind Tom," was about to give a most extraordinary proof of his genius by executing three tunes simultaneously, one with his right hand, one with his left, and the third with his voice, and that to render the exploit still more wonderful, the three tunes would be in as many different keys. The task was performed with terrible conscientiousness, and made me think of Dr. Johnson's regret that the performance of a certain sonata or fantasia was not quite instead of almost impossible. Nor was the performance more agreeable to the sight than the music was to the ear. Tom professed—I have no doubt with perfect truth—to be both blind and idiotic, and the roll of his sightless eyes, together with the senseless grin of his thick lips, made up as revolting a spectacle as one would wish to avoid. Not caring to look at him too long, I glanced at a little book which I had taken at the door, and which purported to contain the opinion of the English and American press; and then I read the dictum of some transatlantic sage, who explained how the musical genius of "Blind Tom" first came to light, and shrewdly hinted that a being so lavishly endowed by nature with an exceptional gift could not be such an idiot after all. My ability to follow this chain of reasoning was somewhat hampered by an illiberal suspicion that a creature really blessed with a musical instinct would rather keep safely within the grooves of harmony than voluntarily jerk out of them, and take for his model that form of combination which in the days of my youth was called a "Dutch concert," when the cessation of discordant sounds caused me to look once more at the platform. There I beheld "Blind Tom" clapping his hands with all his might, evidently delighted with his own performance, and with the large amount of pleasure which, I am bound to say, he afforded to his audience.

Among the wonders that followed was what the exhibitor considered a proof that Dame Nature, who, by the way, has a great deal to answer for, has bestowed upon her dusky favorite a knowledge of "absolute pitch." The keys on the piano, it seems, had been associated in the boy's mind with more letters of the alphabet than are included in the octave, so that while the lower notes might still be called by the proper name, those higher in the scale were exalted to the dignity of being dubbed X, Y, Z. By this expedient the boy is enabled to show his power of recognizing notes in a manner thoroughly intelligible to that ever popular idol, "the meanest capacity." If, when the exhibitor had struck a key, Tom had merely declared that it was C sharp, forty-nine-fiftieths of the audience would not have known whether he was right or wrong; but when he affirmed that three notes successively struck spelled "H A T," and thus correctly designated an object held up by one of the audience, his proficiency could not be ignored. This part of the entertainment would have been much more interesting if the exhibitor had described the process by which the piano had been tuned to "absolute pitch," so as to satisfy the mysterious instinct awakened within the soul of "Blind Tom."

Now, Sir, allow me to correct an erroneous impression which I am certain I have made on my readers. They, and perhaps you, think that when at the beginning of my letter I spoke of a "very curious exhibition," I referred to the performance of the inspired negro. Nothing of the kind. That blindness is not a fatal bar to musical proficiency is so well established a fact that the ancient minstrel would hardly have been deemed in proper trim if he had had the full use of his eyes. Scarcely less recognized is the fact that mechanical dexterity is perfectly compatible with idiocy. Indeed, when a boy has an abnormal genius for watchmaking, or something of the kind, it is rather probable than otherwise that he will prove to be the "fool of the family." No, Sir; to me the curiosity was not the performance of a blind idiot on and to the piano, but the assemblage of people who, for two good hours carved out of the solid afternoon, gaped on him with admiration and delight: a numerous body, Sir, of well-dressed persons, rather elderly than otherwise, intensely respectable, with not one particle of the loungers in their appearance, but distinguished by an air of business-like solemnity and decorum.

On what principle, I asked myself, could these worthy persons, who, if physiognomy is at all to be trusted, were of anything but a light and frivolous disposition, and whose school bills must have been heavy in the days of their youth—on what principle could they cheerfully devote two hours of precious time to the contemplation of such a performance as was taking place on the platform? The black boy, in the strictly musical portion of his entertainment, showed considerable power of execution—enough, perhaps, to make one regret that his talent was chiefly directed to mere tricks, if one did not reflect that tricks may be more profitable than displays of art; but it was certainly not as a pianist that he drew together the admiring throng. The combination of a black face, an uncouth figure, an idiotic grin, a faculty for a sort of musical conjuring, and a new method of telling the world, with less solemnity than a rapping spirit, that the letters H A T spell "hat," was the cause of attraction and the source of delight.

We hear a good deal about the distinction between amusements suitable for the educated classes and those suited to the ignoble multitude; and in the old days of fairs and shows a mere lusus nature had charms for the merest plebeian only. But what shall we say when we find "Blind Tom's" performance afford two hours' entertainment to a decidedly "genteel" and select assembly! I am not a democrat, but with the fact I have just described fresh in my mind, I cannot refrain from a suspicion that if the amusements of the rich are compared with those of the less opulent, the former will frequently turn out to be the inferior of the two. Certain I am that at the Polytechnic, the patrons of which may fairly represent an intelligent middle-class, "Blind Tom" would only be accepted as a small item in a programme otherwise composed of a copiously illustrated lecture by Professor Pepper, a ghost on a new principle, a grand comic pantomime performed in dissolving views, and half-a-dozen miscellaneous amusements besides.

Yours respectfully,
A PICCADILLY LOUNGER.

OPERA COMIQUE. Of the recent revival of Méhul's "Joseph and his Brothers," the Orchestra correspondent writes:

I should like to know the exact definition of the term "Opera Comique;" for although I am of the French—Frenchy, I admit that I never could understand what it really meant. I am aware that it is generally supposed to indicate that the musical portions of the works are interspersed with dialogue; but, if that is the only signification of the phrase, I humbly ask why the word "comique" should be considered necessary. Herold's "Zampa" is not "comique," Auber's "Haydée" wants only Recitative in place of Dialogue to make it a grand opera; "Le Pré aux Clercs," "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine," "Clari," "Marie," "Richard" and many others, do not derive their chief interest from the "comic" element they may contain. I know that light and amusing works formed the stock repertoire of the Opera Comique in former ages, but now that the "Maitre de Chapelle," the "Visitandine," "Le Postillon," &c., no longer keep entire hold on the stage, and have at least three-fourths of their former places taken up by "lyric dramas," in which every dark crime from burglary to double assassination is freely introduced, perhaps in this go-a-head age we may hope to see a change in the name of the theatre: and then the confiding stranger who, on the strength of the words "Opera Comique," written in letters of brass on that building's stony front, enters the portals under the impression that he is going to have a good laugh, will not suffer the disappointment of having to sit through Méhul's biblical work entitled "Joseph," instead of an amusing and really comic opera.

It is not that I wish you to imagine that the music does not deserve notice. On the contrary: it is perhaps the best work of one of the greatest musicians France ever produced. But it is not an opera. Monsieur Gounod would call it a "Petit Oratorio," and Monsieur Gounod would be right. The love-element so necessary in an opera is discarded, and for a good reason: for the only episode in Joseph's life touching that subject would not answer on the stage; and so the author of the libretto, M. Alexandre Duval, took his story from the time when "Jacob knew that there was corn in Egypt." But I need not trouble you longer on the subject of the book, although its writer was an Académicien, and come at once to the music. "Joseph" was given for the first time in 1807; the principal parts were cast to MM. Ellevion (Joseph), Gavaudan (Simeon), Solié (Jacob) and Mme. Gavaudan (Benjamin). These same parts were filled the other night by MM. Capoul, Ponchard, Bataille, and Mlle. Roze. At the first performance the opera was hardly successful, and it had been a great favorite in Germany, for many years before it was well appreciated here. Méhul had already given several operas. He was born in 1763, and was the son of a poor cook; he stood scarcely any chance of obtaining the education necessary to ensure his progress in the path he had chosen. His only professor was an old blind musician, who was the parish organist of Givers (Ardennes) where Méhul was born. However he worked his way up, and at ten years of age was organist of the Récollets. He then spent some years at the abbey of Laval-dieu, and came to Paris in 1778. After publishing a few instrumental pieces (1781) with doubtful success he gave "Euphrosine et Corradin" in 1790 at the Opera Comique (the duet Gardez-vous de la jalousie is a model of its kind). Then came "Cora" and in 1794, "Stratonice," remarkable for a very fine quartet. I pass over many other operas, merely noticing that one, "La Chasse du Jeune Henri," was completely condemned without fair hearing before the first act was half done. For some time after this Méhul worked at the organization of the Conservatoire, and re-appeared as a dramatic composer, in 1799 only, with "Ariodant," a successful work. In 1801 he changed his style, and gave us "L'Irato," a lighter work, evidently moulded on the operas of Paisiello and Cimarosa. "Joseph," as I mentioned above, was produced in 1807, and was almost his last success, for his other operas, such as "Les Amazones," &c., were heavy, and "La Journée aux Aventures," given only a short time before his death (1817), was the only good thing he composed after it. The musician's share of work in the opera comique (if I must call it so) has been well done. Joseph's admirable air at the beginning, "Vainement Pharaon," the Romance "A peine au sortir de l'enfance," the air for Simeon (the penitent brother), "Je suis puni par le Seigneur," the splendid prayer of the guilty brethren, "Pardonnez nous mon père," the Invocation to the Most High, and the duet for Jacob and Benjamin are each and all of them simply chefs d'œuvre. M. Capoul as Joseph sang all the tender parts of his role with much sweetness, but was perhaps a shade too effeminate. He ought to remember that Joseph was a great man and a law-giver, and not always make him crying after "papa." M. Ponchard played Simeon, the repentant brother, very fairly. We could not hear his singing; not that I complain of it. Bataille was a really fine Jacob, and Mlle. Roze was not at all like Benjamin, unless Benjamin was like a ballet girl, and I have no authority for believing that. Somme toute—Fine music, execution generally fair, success doubtful.

The two musical events which are looked forward to in Paris are the production of the two grand operas by Verdi and Gounod. The Italian and French composers are thus brought into immediate contact—the two schools will be in close collision. Verdi again will try his fortune at the French Imperial Opera House, and Gounod will raise his banner at the Lyrique, where his "Medecin malgré lui" and his Faust have placed his name on the pinnacle of Fame's temple.

Another interesting item for Paris is the preparation for the renewal of Gluck's Alceste, at the Grand Opera, Berlioz having undertaken to superintend the rehearsals.

"Don Carlos" has been set en train at the Opera. The Maestro Verdi has read through the parts with the principal interpreters, who are Mme. Sasse (Elisabeth de Valois), Mme. Gueymard (La Duchesse d'Eboli), M. Morere (Don Carlos), Faure (Le Marquis de Posa), David and Belval (The Grand Inquisitor and a Monk). M. Bagier has the two theatres of Paris and Madrid for the season. His list is not yet out, but I hear that he has signed with Mlle. Lagrue, that Fraschini, Delle Sedie and Agnesi are retained, and Patti.

Auber's charming opera, Haydée has been reprised at the Opera Comique, with Mlle. Dupuy and M. Achard in the principal characters. It was the three hundredth representation of Haydée at this theatre, where it was first produced, and the music sounded as fresh and exquisite as the first night it was heard. Mme. Marie Cabel has made her réentrée in the Amazones, and had a most enthusiastic reception. M. Bagier has nearly completed his engagements for the Theatre Italien. For the Opera at Madrid the troupe is quite made up. It includes Mlle. Adeline Patti, Lagrue, Calderon, Castri, Zeiss, Llanes, Rosa Formi, and Mme. Borghi-Mamo; Signors Pancani, Nicolini, Galvani, and Fraschini, as tenors; Signors Cresci, Verger, and Agnesi, baritones; and Signors Selva, Dobbers, and Vairo, basses. M. Leopold Ketten, formerly accompanist at the Theatre Lyrique, who is said to have a beautiful tenor voice and an excellent method, is also engaged.—At the Theatre-Lyrique a new tenor, M. Laurent, has made his début in the character of the King in Richard Cœur de Lion with legitimate success. On the same evening Mlle. Adelaide Cornelis made her first appearance as Antonio.

LONDON. For a month or two the only music in the great metropolis, of higher grade than "Music Halls," has been that of Alfred Mellon's Promenade Concerts, with his great orchestra, à la Jullien, in Covent Garden. Our facetious friend of the Musical World says of them (we beg pardon for pruning away some of his funny parts, which need a key anywhere out of London, if not there), in his paper of Sept 1:

Since we last spoke there has been a "Night with Weber"—Carl Maria von Weber (better than Gottfried Weber). On this occasion we had two overtures—Enryanthe and Oberon; the Concertstück brilliantly executed by little (no longer little) Marie Krebs (who was recalled); the Invitation to the Waltz, orchestrated by Hector Berlioz; the Adagio for a clarinet concerto (breathed with moonlight mellowness by Mr. Lazarus); and an air from Der Freischütz, with Barret's oboe, prettily sung by Mlle. Liebhart (who was encored). This was the night with Weber. We could spend many such.

There has also been a "Night with Spohr." On this occasion we had the Consecration of Sound (Die Weihe des Hauses). Nevertheless, there are six other symphonies by Spohr. De vier des houzes was followed by Mephistopheles, who, assuming the shape and features of Mr. Patey, gave his own air from Faust, adopting the Italian version—"Va abramando." The heels of Mephistopheles were tripped up by the Mephisto of the fiddle, M. Wieniawski, who, in Mephistophelian fashion, endevilled the so-called (by any one but Spohr) "Dramatic Concerto." To this succeeded that bright little song, "The bird and the maiden"—the song which Mendelssohn loved and wrote about to Spohr. The maiden was Liebhart; the bird was Lazarus. Both bird and maiden seemed to love the song—so well that they could not dwell upon it long enough, and I thought it would never finish. It did finish, for all that, and the audience, deeming it had not been dwelt on long enough, encored it; upon which both bird and maiden re-dwelt upon it for a still longer period.

The whole concluded, pompously, with the half-pompous, half-graceful, half-inflated overture to the Mountain Sprite, an opera of which little but the overture is known.

There has also been a Night with the "Italian Masters," hardly well named, or well vindicated. Cherubini was a master, but his overture to Anacreon is not his best overture. Rossini is a master (a jolly old master!—long life to him!), but his overture to Semiramide is in the same key as the overture to Anacreon. Bellini was a nightingale—not a master. Moreover, the duet for ophicleide and euphonium, so dexterously played by our own Hughes and our own Phassey, although it used to be sung by Tamburini and Lablache (who made still more bruit), is a duet from I Puritani, which contains more genuine melodies. Mercadante is a phœnicopter—not a master. Moreover, his cavatina, "Ah! s'estinto," although Mme. Patey-Whytock is undoubtedly an English contralto, is undoubtedly non-suited to those who are undoubtedly English contraltos, and who, for the most part in its delivery, are non-suited. Donizetti is a cross between a paroquet and a humming-bird—not a master. Nevertheless, the cavatina, "O luce di quest'anima," is one of the most genuine melodies in his Linda, when gushed forth in sky-lark tones like those of Carlotta Patti (melodious sister of a melodious sister).

Rossini is a master, but the "Operatic Selection" from his Tell—in which Messrs. Barret, Hughes, Reynolds and Winterbottom disported themselves, playfully, in solos for oboe, ophicleide, cornet, and bassoon—if Alfred's (or if not Alfred's—which I devoutly hope) is not Rossini's—for which I am devoutly grateful.

There was also on Thursday a "Night with Mozart."

P.S.—Italian Night. Also Domenico Scarlatti was a master, although the Cat's Fugue (in G minor) is by no means a masterly fugue. Nevertheless, little (no longer little) Marie Krebs played it a ravir, and being encored, substituted the Spinnlied from the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn, who though a master was not an Italian, therefore, not among the "Italian masters" (Mr. Mellon pace).

WORCESTER FESTIVAL. The programme may be briefly dismissed. On Tuesday morning, Sept. 11th: "Dettingen Te Deum," a selection (with five numbers of Mr. Coste's Nagman), and the first two parts of Haydn's Creation; Wednesday morning: Elijah, with Mr. Santley as the Prophet; Thursday: Spohr's overture to The Last Judgment, Beethoven's Service (1 Mass) in C, selection from Joshua, and Hymn of Praise; and Friday (of course), The Messiah. Touching (and that distantly) the evening concerts—Tuesday, first part devoted to selection from Weber's Euryanthe; Wednesday, first part, selection from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito; Thursday, audiences played in by Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (the only symphony announced for the concerts), and no other distinguishing (or distinguished) feature in the first part (unless a quartet for four violins can be so-called). "Au resto" common places of pieces that have been done to death any time these ever so many years—can such a programme excite any musical interest?—Mus. World.

Return of Madame Parepa.

FIRST CONCERT.

The Bateman Concerts began in the Boston Music Hall, on Wednesday evening. (Had we the imagination and the power of language of the newspaper critics, we should say a great deal about "grand central sensations," and how the concerts and the season were "inaugurated," the programmes "promulgated," and what not—but we suppose our readers will not demand of us such high flights and will get just as clear an idea of what we mean if we say the concerts began.) This was the first public performance of Mr. Bateman's newly organized concert troupe since their arrival in America. The plan is, we understand, to excite and delight and saturate Boston ears first, for a few weeks, and then to visit Baltimore and Philadelphia, until the new Steinway Hall be ready for them in New York, which of course is the true place for "grand central sensations."

The concert on Wednesday was altogether encouraging in size and character of audience, making the Hall cheerful and brilliant in the midst of gloomiest and vilest weather, and in all the signs of enthusiasm, which was evidently hearty and untiring. The programme was very miscellaneous, as might have been anticipated of a concert troupe combining so many and so various elements. Besides the prima donna herself, there was Rosa, the violinist, and Mills, the pianist, and there was an Italian buffo singer, and an Italian baritone, and there was our old friend Hatton, who had to have something to direct and something to accompany; and, to surround and complete the whole with fair show of artistic dignity (also to "inaugurate," shall we say? with overtures), there was a little orchestra, of a couple of dozen instruments, with Mr. Zerrahn to hold them in hand and guide them sometimes through quite perilous places. The result of which was as we shall see.

To begin with what was of course the main object of interest with the many, Mme. PAREPA's welcome was of the warmest kind; the great audience applauded eagerly and long, delighted to see bodily before them again, and unchanged, one to whom they owed such pleasant memories. And the lady on her part beamed and smiled with equal satisfaction; her greeting in return was gracious, cordial and happy, and expressed a glad home feeling as it were at standing up again to sing before a Boston Music Hall audience. She lifted up her voice with fervor. And it had lost nothing of its power or beauty, nothing of its wonderful facility through all its compass. Indeed it seemed fresher, fuller, sweeter than ever; finished to, if possible, more evenness and delicacy; large, clear, sustained and satisfying in the round cantabile melodies; crisp, natural, elegant and unmistakeable in recitative; and revelling with the old fluency and brilliancy, the ready power of setting this or that note in a brighter light, and all the arts of accent, shading, diminuendo, &c., in the bravura passages.

For each and all there was occasion in her first piece, the Scena and Cavatina from the first act of Il Trovatore, containing the sad little romanza: Tacea la notte, which she sang with great purity and sweetness. One only wished that such an artist could have met such a greeting with some better kind of music. To be sure, the Verdi piece, as we have just said, furnished illustration of all the rare vocal and technical qualities of the singer. If the only purpose was to convince her hearers that she knew how to sing, and came their fully furnished and equipped for song, this piece answered the purpose well. But one naturally looks to a great singer for interpretation, rather say for sensible realization and bringing right home to us, of the highest noblest music. If we have a great actor, we want to see Shakspeare most of all, not always perhaps. And having such a singer as Parepa back again, it seems but meagre fare and mere confectionery to hear nothing but Verdi, Ardit, and a sentimental ballad or two. Better will come, we have no doubt, in succeeding concerts, at all events on Sunday.

She was rapturously recalled after the Trovatore piece, and gave the ballad: "I cannot sing the old songs" with almost more fervor than it deserved; to us it seemed like galvanizing the song with feeling not its own; but it was a hearty sentiment on the part of the singer and meant a genuine response to her audience. Mr. Hatten accompanied it on the piano. Her second piece, another vocal Waltz, by Ardit, called "L'Estasi" (the ecstasies) is but a show piece for vocalization, brilliant, in a superficial sense graceful; as for expression, ecstatic in a quite sensual and voluptuous sense, appealing by no means to what is highest in an audience. Of course it was done to perfection. In the second part Mme. Parepa sang, again from Verdi, a Duo: "Deh non parlare," which had some striking effects, with Signor FORTUNA, the baritone, whose tones have sweetness with not much power or resonance, and indeed a certain thickness; but the style of singing and the air of the man is conscientious and refined. Another ballad, composed for Mme. Parepa by Blumenthal, we did not hear; for by that time the concert had begun to be long.

CARL ROSA was of course sincerely welcomed back. He has musical inspiration. The same, fresh, ingenuous charm of youth, the same modest self-possession won the same sympathy again. His tone was as pure and full, and his art, after renewed earnest studies for which such an artist is ever too glad of an opportunity, more masterly than ever. His first piece, coming right after Figaro's fun, a very Spohr-ish Allegro from a Concerto in G by Spohr, was like a picture not well hung; it was beautifully played, with real artist-like refinement and intelligence, but its sombre character, and the chromatic Spohr-ish modulations, somewhat muddled in a rather crude orchestral accompaniment, failed to make a very vivid impression. In that more common concert piece, the "Souvenir d'Haydn," a piece of less consequence in itself, his skill and power were much more palpable; the great breadth of tone, and firm, clear, even flow of the full-chord rendering of the Austrian Hymn, was very impressive. But there is something in Rosa's playing of whatsoever music that speaks to the soul as well as to the ear.

In a really musical point of view the most interesting item of the concert was the first movement from Schumann's only Concerto (in A minor), for piano, played by Mr. MILLS. Schumann wrote it originally as a Fantasia, just after his marriage with Clara Wieck, in 1841, and rewrote and completed it in the present form in 1845, when it was played for the first time by his wife in Leipzig. It is one of the most genial, original and admirable of Schumann's creations, and one felt unwilling to have it cut short there, without the Intermezzo and Finale; (but these Mr. Mills will have played in a succeeding concert before this goes to press). This first movement, marked Allegro affettuoso ed appassionato, is full of fire,—and delicate, subtle fire; the inspiration is remarkably well sustained, so that you are scarcely conscious of its great length. There are various changes of rhythm and movement, well contrasted thoughts and moods of feeling; a bit now and then much in the tender vein of Mendelssohn; but mostly it is Schumann and no other, Schumann at his best. We believe it has never been played in this city with orchestra before; Mr. Dresel played it twice in his last chamber concerts, having the orchestral parts reduced for a second piano. Mr. Mills has less of the fine poetic instinct in his rendering, less of kindred genius with his author, less unerring judgment in tempo, apparently; but it was admirable pianism; his technique seems faultless; a clear, strong, fluent, brilliant rendering of a work crowded full of thoughts and full of difficulties. We cannot doubt that a good Chickering instrument would have seconded his efforts more effectively than that which he had, with the name "Steinway" in big letters staring you in the face, when your concern was properly with Schumann. The interesting orchestration of the Concerto, just as important as the piano in such a work, and with it making up a living whole, will sound better to us some day, we hope, with a fuller orchestra and after more rehearsal. Mr. Zerrahn did what could be done under the circumstances. In Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," for piano alone, Mr. Mills displayed triumphant execution; the thing was extremely brilliant.

If we must hear Italian opera pieces in the concert room, commend us to that kind of Italian music which has the most genius (geniality) and sparkling, spontaneous life in it, that element in which your Italian, childlike and happy, is so perfectly at home, the buffo element. Above all commend us to Rossini,—always, be it understood, with orchestra, for two thirds of the happy musical heat lightning of his fancy lies there in those delicious figures of accompaniment. This was the element which the two Italian gentlemen chiefly added to the concert. Willingly we part with Levy's cornet exhibitions, and take the merry Figaro and Cenerentola instead. This is musical humor, which is finely imaginative, and which the most artistic taste can relish. Signor FERRANTI is a capital buffo, a right jolly fellow, full of fun and motion, with a rich, telling, unctuous baritone. We have heard very few superior to him. We could only wish that in the concert room he would make it rather more exclusively tter of singing, with less of improvised grotesque stage action and interpolated noises rather animal than human. But a mercurial Italian is instantly possessed and carried away by such things; Rossini and the immortal Barber are too much for him. Largo al factotum has seldom been so effectively sung here; and the Cinderella duet, "Un Segreto," where he takes the part of the Baron, was exquisitely done in spite of too broad farce. As a piece of rapid, dashing, telling vocalization, his third Rossini piece, the Tarentella: "Gia la luna," was the best, and had to be repeated. Sig. FORTUNA sang for a solo the aria "Eri tu," from Verdi's Ballo in Maschera, with taste and feeling, his sweet upward range of voice having almost a tenor quality; and he bore part in the two duets, tastefully again, but more than equally matched in power.

The orchestra opened the two parts of the concert with the overtures to "Egmont" and to Mendelssohn's "Return from Abroad" (Heimkehr aus der Fremde.) Both went fairly for so small a band. The closing piece was the March from Tannhäuser. The task of the instruments—as none of the easiest in accompanying that Cenerentola duet, with the long stretches and sudden interpolations of comical parlando, often quite ad libitum on the part of the singers; it taxed their pilot's utmost vigilance to keep them clear of all the breakers, and we must congratulate Mr. Zerrahn in getting through so safely; for our orchestras cannot have much practice in this sort of thing. Mr. HATTON, who is musical manager of the whole, limited himself to the modest task of playing the piano accompaniment (capital musician that he is!) to the smaller vocal pieces and to the second violin solo. He will have his own turn, we understand, in some of his Protean phases, popular of old, this evening.

On the whole the first Parepa concert of this second season was a marked success. The concerts are followed up at present nightly. A week from Sunday evening, we shall doubtless hear Parepa in some of her nobler strains, while Mills & Rosa will each play a Fugue of Bach, and the latter an Adagio by Mozart (from the Clarinet Quintet.) Shall we have no opportunity to hear Rosa play in Quartet?

ORATORIO we shall have soon. The Handel and Haydn Society come together to-morrow night for practice, and their motto is: "Be not afraid." They will rehearse St. Paul again, intending to perform it publicly either on the 10th or the 11th of November.

Concerning the "Symphony Concerts," the arrangements, further than was stated in our last, are not yet ripe for publication. When will they be "inaugurated?" We only know that they will begin on the 23rd of November, that there will be eight of them, and that the managers mean that they shall be as good as those of last year.

ERNEST PERABO announces that he will take up his residence in Boston on the 1st of October, and be prepared to teach and play in concerts. We shall have no lack of fine pianists. Mr. LEONHARD will probably return from Europe soon. Mr. LANG should be coming up the harbor while we write. Mr. DRESEL, Mr. PARKER, Mr. DAUM, &c., are here. We shall lose PETERSILEA, if the New York notices must be relied on.

Mr. J. K. PAINE, when last heard from, was on the lovely Lake of the Four Cantons, in Switzerland; he will probably winter in Germany and return here early in the Spring. Mr. WM. SCHULTZ has arrived back safe, after a long and stormy passage in the Borussia. Miss ANNIE CARY, the rich-voiced contralto, sailed a few weeks since for Italy, there to pursue her musical studies.

A CRITICAL LEVELLER. The New York Evening Post says (and many newspaper "critics" often say the same sort of things):

The most attractive and popular season of English opera we have ever had was that of Mr. Eichberg, whose "Doctor of Alcantara" is a charming little trifle, full of pleasant melodies, and quite as enjoyable as Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" or "The Barber."

The "Doctor of Alcantara" is indeed "a charming little trifle;" but to think of naming it with Rossini's Barber! Is that a trifle? Mr. Eichberg's modesty must have been put to the blush when he read this; but doubtless his quick sense of the ludicrous and the incongruous soon got the better of it. And then again, think of putting Rossini and Balfe on the same shelf, bidding them make room for other charming little trifles!

We take pleasure in calling attention to the card of Mrs. William Garrett in another column, who, having returned to Boston, is prepared to resume her music lessons. Mrs. Garrett is one of our most successful teachers, and that, being a fine vocalist and performer on the piano, she teaches her pupils understandingly.

MUSIC AMONG THE BLIND. We were present a few weeks since at one of the Saturday afternoon exhibitions of the piano-forte pupils at the Institution at South Boston, under the direction of their devoted and accomplished teacher, Mr. CAMPBELL. These are occasions where all the pupils of the school "assist" (as the French say) either as performers or listeners. And the programmes are so good, the selections so almost exclusively from the very best masters, that it must be an education of the taste, an elevating and refining influence, the listening so often to such music. To be sure, some of the little ones among the seventy may naturally have found it a trial of their patience to sit still through two hours of Sonatas and the like. We must confess, however, that by far the most of them, and some even of the youngest, showed every sign of being deeply interested; enthusiasm spake through every feature but the sightless eyes. All the greater privilege such glorious harmony to them because of that privation!

It was impossible to hear what we heard that day, and generally so well rendered, without feeling a great respect for the earnestness, fidelity and judgment of the teacher, himself blind also, whom they are so fortunate as to keep among them. Many pupils of both sexes showed evidence of patient, zealous practice, musical feeling and ambition, and had cultivated ear, fingers, taste and memory so far, as to play whole Sonatas of Beethoven and others without missing a note. The only fault of the programme was that it was too long; it was all good, nay of the best. Think what we heard!

Mr. Campbell himself opened the concert by playing a piano arrangement (Liszt's we believe) of the Adagio in Beethoven's first Symphony—all very neat, clear, tasteful and effective. Then a young lady groped her way to the instrument, and played a Gavotte in D minor by Bach, followed by the Minuet in Mozart's G minor Symphony, as arranged by Otto Dresel. Beethoven's Sonata Pastorale, in D, came next, creditably rendered, all the movements, by another young lady, in spite of some timidity—a very natural failing in several of the performers; it was easy to see that places where their execution faltered, or where the memory was confused for a moment, or where the fingers ran correctly over the keys, but as it were in dumb show, the sound not audible, were chargeable either to fear or physical weakness, and that the player must be fully mistress of them under fair conditions. Beethoven's Fantasia (Andante) in F, op. 35, was played, if we remember rightly, by a young man. The other pieces were: a Lied ohne Worte of Mendelssohn, the brilliant Presto in the sixth book; the Adagio and Finale from the Beethoven Sonata in E flat, op. 27; an ordinary variation piece on a Swiss air; the Sonata Pathétique entire (with more fire of accent than we could have expected from one blind); the Minuet and Trio from Mozart's E-flat Symphony; and the Beethoven Sonata in E flat, op. 31, No. 3, all four movements.

Now of course it cost some patience to listen to such length of pupil performance, and to hear so many master works recited, rather than interpreted, in a manner by no means masterly. Still it was interesting and indeed exciting to see how much had been achieved under such adverse circumstances, and particularly gratifying to find so earnest a musical spirit pervading a whole school. It seems to be determined that the blind shall feel what Art is.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK. The season has opened with Sunday evening concerts—two sets of them. One, under the management of Mr. L. F. Harrison, has its seat at Irving Hall, with Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, besides various solo talent. Of course they call them "Sacred" Concerts, and of course they did not begin, but, like every thing else now-a-days, were "inaugurated." We haven't heard whether the programmes were "promulgated"—that would have made it perfect. We copy the second programme, Sept. 9, as a specimen of the kind of music given in these concerts:

Symphony in D, No. 2.....Beethoven
1 Adagio. 2 Larghetto.
Song, "The Flower" (first time).....Aht.
Mr. Wm. Castle.
"Zug der Frauen," (Lohengrin).....Wagner.
"Tennyson's Bugle Song".....Goldbeck.
Mr. S. C. Campbell, accompanied by the Composer.
Fantasia, "Midsommer's Night Dream,".....Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Lodolaka,".....Cherubini.
Duet, "I Pescatori".....Gabuzzi.
Mr. Castle and Mr. Campbell.
Andante and Variations.....Mozart.
(From the first Divertimento).
Mr. Theo. Thomas, and Messrs. Hess, Matzka, Hoch, Pfeilschneider, Schmitz, and Lotze,
Song, "Nevermore,".....Bassford.
Intro. and Chorus, "William Tell".....Rossini.

The "sacred" things of the third concert were a whole Beethoven Symphony, Mozart's "Turkish March," Nicolai's overture to "Merry Wives," a fantasia on Tannhäuser, singing from "Wm. Tell" and Schubert's Serenade by Mme. Johannsen, flute and trombone solos, &c. The musical journals eulogize the orchestral and indeed most of the performances (we suppose a newspaper critic would say "renditions").

The other set of "sacred" concerts are at Grover's Olympic Theatre. One recognizes other well-known names in them, besides Grover. They began Sept. 9, as follows:

Overture—"Egmont".....Beethoven.
Prayer from "Le Prophète,".....Meyerbeer.
Mme. Marie Frederici.
Sunday in the Forest.....Mühling.
Chorus for Male Voices, with French Horns and Trombones.
"Ave Maria".....Marschner.
Mr. Franz Illmner.
Salve Maria.....Mercadante.
Mme. De Lussan.
O. Isis and Osiris—Prayer from "Magie Flute".....Mozart.
Mr. Joseph Weinlich and Chorus.
Overture—"Oberon".....Von Weber.
"Stabat Mater".....Rossini.

In the second concert, Mme. Rotter was added to the list of singers. The orchestral conductor is Herr Neuendorf, who last year supplemented Anschütz in the German Opera.—Both these series of Sunday concerts, it would seem, are well attended. And there is a prospect of yet a third series; the Weekly Review says:

It is not improbable that Mr. Eichberg, the favorite composer, who, as he informs us, has lately composed a long and, no doubt, magnificent fantasy for piano, will follow the example of his friends, Messrs.

Grover and Harrison, and will give Sunday concerts. Mr. Eichberg is a very good violinist and would add a great deal to the attraction. Whether his fantasy will be performed at one of these concerts or somewhere else, we are not in condition to state.

The first of a series of concerts in connection with Mr. Mollenhauer's Musical Conservatory (about every third professor sets up his own "Conservatory" in New York) took place recently. The Mollenhauers played, Frederici sang (everlasting "Robert, Robert"), and there were some new artists of whom the Review reports:

The performances were satisfactory enough, with the exception of the piano performances of Mr. Lejeal. This gentleman was substituted for Mr. Boeckelman, and although it may have been very kind of him to have taken the latter gentleman's place at a short notice, he should not have attempted to play Liszt's fantasy on "Rigoletto," a piece played in this city by the most prominent concert players. A musician may be a very good teacher without possessing the qualifications for a virtuoso. In the same concert we listened with pleasure to the singing of Mr. J. Pollack, a young baritone from Dresden and a pupil of Julius Stockhausen, who is eminently qualified for concert singing and certainly will have good success in this country. The voice of the young artist is neither too strong nor of a very large compass, and he does not reach more than E in the high register; but the quality of the voice is exceedingly pleasing and he sings with an extraordinary warmth of feeling and a pleasingly sentimental touch of expression.

For the higher order of orchestral concerts New York will have, as usual, those of the Philharmonic Society, Carl Bergmann conductor, to be held, it is said, in the new Steinway Hall, and the Symphony Soirées of Mr. Thomas, so successful for two years past. Mr. Thomas also means to give more miscellaneous, popular concerts at Irving Hall, and afterwards at Steinway's Hall, the completion of which is also awaited by Mr. Bateman and many other concert-givers. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society is also on the alert, having chosen Thomas as conductor for the season.

For Chamber Music, there will be the classical Quartet Soirées of Messrs. Mason, Moenthal, Matzka, Bergner and Thomas, with prospect of larger subscription than ever before. And there will be several series of Piano concerts, "Recitals," or what not. Carl Wolfsohn will play all the Beethoven Sonatas, as he did in Philadelphia. Robert Goldbeck, too, is named for a series of interpretations, probably in great part of his own music; and Charles Kunkel. It is also announced that our young Carlyle Petersilea will settle in New York; so we should not wonder if there should be still more piano soirées or matinées. Furthermore, it is even said that Hans von Bülow, son-in-law and pupil of Liszt, prime minister of Wagner, &c., is negotiating for a concert tour in this country; while per contra offers from New York have been made to another distinguished pupil of Liszt and man of "the future," another Hans, von Bronsart—with what success we do not hear. Piano, piano! 'Tis the safest sort of concert-giving, oftentimes the best: Chi va sano, va piano. P.S. Wehli, too, with his left hand:

New York's musical stronghold has never been Oratorio. But the Harmonic Society has now the guaranty of one of the truest musicians in the country, Mr. F. L. Ritter, for conductor, and will doubtless set about good things in earnest. Extraordinary promises, both in amount and heterogeneous variety, are reported of the Mendelssohn Union: to-wit, two operas by Wallace ("The Amber Witch" and "Lurline"); Haydn's "Seasons," Mendelssohn's "Paul" and "Elijah," and horribile dictu, Liszt's "Graner Mass"! Aiming at all this game, how much will they bring down?

We have alluded to the mushroom upspringing of Musical Conservatories in Gotham. Besides that of the Mollenhauers, there is one called by the big title of National Conservatory, under the management of Mr. E. G. Locke, the musical director being Mr. George F. Bristow, who teaches theory and composition, while Piano instruction employs the talents of Edw. Hoffmann, Theo. Boettger, Wm. Wolf, C. A. de Szigethy, G. Weingarten, and Mme. Wm. Vincent Wallace; vocal teachers, Sig. Elidora Camps and Mme. E. Loder; others for violin, flute, &c., &c. Then, too, Carl Anschütz has organized an "Anschütz Musical Institute;" teachers as follows: Theory and Composition: Messrs. Anschütz, Buechel and Max Braun; Piano: Davis, Buechel, Braun, Kalliwoda, Grosswirth and Nenendorf; Organ: Max Braun and A. Davis; Violin: Josepe Noll; Vocal: Mme. Johansen, Carl Anschütz and Sig. Marco Duschwitz; Italian Language: Sig. Giorgio Keck. Mr. Schrimpf, formerly of Boston, is enrolled in the Mollenhauer teaching corps. We trust all these Conservatorio conservatives will not be like the political conservatives, only anxious to conserve what is diseased and bad in the body politic, but that, like true conservatives, i.e. radicals, they will go to the root of the matter and try to conserve and preserve what is good and true in Art, preserve the body itself and the soul with it.

With all these concerts, classes and Italian and English Opera to boot, the musical tourney of New York this winter will not lack éclat; our good knight "Lancelot" must be on hand with the Ithuriel spear!

The Berlin musical press advocates the appointment of JOACHIM to some Prussian post, as he has lost his position in Hanover through the political changes. The gain of a man like Joachim, they maintain, would be an important art annexation to Prussia—rectification of the artistic frontier.

JENKINS ON THE WAR PATH.—A very distinguished actress and worthy lady arrived in New York a day or two ago. Her name is Adelaide Ristori, but the New York papers prefer to style her "the great tragedienne." She is also the wife of an Italian Marquis, hence Jenkins at times calls her the Marchioness del Grillo. The lady had a grand reception in New York. It was the grandest since that given to the humble individual who has held every office from that of Alderman up to the President. The next day Jenkins broke out in the columns of the "metropolitan" press, and gave her and her progress up Broadway almost as much space as is daily given to the progress of the humble individual.

It is delightful to read the charming descriptions by Jenkins of "the great tragedienne," as they appear in the several journals. In one case he says: "The crowd testified its interest on the occasion by waiting an hour or more to see Ristori enter her carriage." In another he says she "expressed the greatest enthusiasm at the evidences of activity and enterprise which rose before her; but it was not until the great structures on Broadway met her sight that she fully realized the commercial greatness of our city. Surprise and delight moved her to give expression to her feelings, and, for a long time it was impossible to quiet her sufficiently for conversation." Also: "Her enthusiasm at the novelty of the sight broke forth in frequent exclamations of delight and wonder." Also: "The utmost astonishment was expressed by her at the magnificence of the buildings on Broadway, which she looked at with the most eager curiosity. On arriving at the Fifth Avenue hotel she immediately desired to see something of that structure, and expressed her wonder at the beauty and comfort of the house."

Madame Ristori has with her, according to Jenkins, her husband, her son and daughter, a suite of forty persons, 173 trunks, 40 of which are necessary to contain her own things. She has also, vide Times, "a rather fair complexion, heightened in its interest by the color which flies to her cheeks as she becomes excited with the topics presented to her mind." In the World, Jenkins says her "complexion is deep olive with a tinge of the golden peach." In the Tribune "her complexion is rather light."

The epithets applied to Madame Ristori by Jenkins are splendid. She is "the representative of the grand Tragic Muse." She is "a thorough exponent." She is "the pet of the older civilization of Europe." She is "the greatest of living dramatic celebrities." She is "the cynosure of the dramatic world." But space does not prevent further quotation, and it is unjust to Jenkins to spoil his pictures by showing only little bits at a time. He is making a great deal out of Ristori, and revelling in her charms as he has not revelled since Queen Emma or A. J. visited New York.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Five o'clock in the morning, Song for Guitar. S. Winner. 30
- She sang among the flowers. " " 30
- Flower song. "Faust." " " 30
- O, would I were a bird. " " 30
- Four songs of established reputation, nicely arranged for guitar.
- Hast thou seen the young day blushing? "Irene." Gounod. 40
- Fair the rose of love is blowing. " " 40
- Two songs of about equal merit, and both very good. A trifle difficult. "Irene," or "The Queen of Sheba," is not so well known as the world famous "Faust," by the same composer, but contains many passages of great beauty.
- Where is our Moses? Song. 30
- Bread and butter. Song. A. Weaver. 30
- Songs for the times.
- Tantum Ergo. "Gloria." Quartette. M. Girac. 40
- These "Gloria" quartettes are heartily commended to choirs for practice. Latin words.
- The Light-house. Baritone song. G. F. Duggan. 30
- Good concert song, and commended to musical light-house keepers, who, of all people, are bound to let their "light shine before men."
- Mother, Home and Heaven. Song and Chorus. 30
- The roses are blooming where sweet Nellie sleeps. Song and Chorus. Webster. 35
- Two beautiful ballads, in popular style.

Otto Nicolai.

However much Nicolai strove to devote himself to the more severe school of music, he still could not remain unacquainted with the profane school, which then exercised, as it still exercises, undisputed sway in Italy, especially as he was not a rigorist, in so far as purposely ignoring the latter school went. At that very time, too, Italian music was to a certain degree at the zenith of its efforts, even though of the innumerable amateur maestri, some of whom were to be found in every town, there were only three composers, to whose names even Posterity will not deny its respect: Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti. The first two have rendered immense service to vocal music, and though Donizetti does not possess a definite original stamp of his own, his style of composition is an interesting modification of that of the other two. Nicolai had had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with his operas in Berlin, but the difference of climate was not without its influence upon his opinion of them.* With these facts in our mind we approach a most marked and striking revolution of ideas in Nicolai's career, a revolution which even Kapper in vain endeavors to explain correctly. Yet the explanation is extremely simple. That in Germany Nicolai, with Mozart as the idol of his heart, should look down with patronizing contempt upon operatic matters in Italy is nothing wonderful, considering his critical views, which regarded the intellect as the supreme tribunal. Nevertheless, even then, and from his earliest work, Nicolai excelled in beautiful and flowing melody, and he began to devote attention to this natural gift. From Mozart to Bellini is a good leap, but not so tremendous a one as it perhaps appears at first sight. Just as the leading fundamental characteristics of the former are beauty and grace in every part of the tone-poem, that of the latter is beauty of the vocal portion to which all other resources have to be subordinate. In consequence of this his instrumentation is sparse, never covering the songs; his harmony unpretentiously clear; and his modulation of virgin purity. In Italy, where everything, even Nature herself, appeals to the feelings and not to the understanding, these qualities could not be disregarded by the stern, but still just, German composer, and he saw with amazement the geniality inherent to Bellini's music, and the tragic height to which the Italian master had elevated mere naked song. When, at a later period, Nicolai fell into an imitation of this model, he was, it is true, so far unfortunate, that he could not, and would not, divest himself of his musical knowledge and the resources of the orchestra as Bellini did. The result was that he committed inconsistencies, which did not exert an exactly advantageous influence upon his style, and though they may, in this particular branch of the art, have speedily procured for him a brilliant reputation, it was but transient. To his quickly conceived esteem for Bellini, which soon turned into imitation and life-long respect, he gave—leaving out of consideration his manner of composition soon afterwards apparent—direct expression by a "Trauermarsch für Orchestra auf Bellini's Tod," dating from about the same time as the letter mentioned above (published by Ricordi, Milan): by the Pianoforte Fantasia, Op. 27, on themes from Norma; by Vocal Variations, Op. 26, on La Sonnambula; and by the arrangement of Bellini's romance, "Sorgi, O Padre," for Voice, Piano, and Violoncello (Diabelli, Vienna). He began, also, to write a series of Italian Ariettas and Canzonettas, which were highly successful, and encouraged him to pursue still farther the path he had taken. He saw how easily the Italian composers, such as Mercadante, Ricci, Pacini, and Coppola (a comrade of Bellini's at the Naples Conservatory, and whose opera, La Pazza per Amore, had then made an immense sensation in Rome), won fame and gathered laurels, and, like every artist more or less, being ambitious, he resolved to seek his fortune in the same track, and thought that his future would be all the more brilliant from the fact of his being far superior in musical knowledge to the composers just named.

The only obstacles which he saw in his way were his office and his connection with Bunsen; but he succeeded, on the 1st April, 1837, in being allowed to resign, and as, in consequence of the well-known religious dispute at Cologne, Bunsen was recalled in March, 1838, Nicolai found himself free, and in no way bound to follow his former chief to Munich and England. Having, during the two previous years, made several small trips, which had rendered him sufficiently well acquainted with the north and south of Italy, he now proceeded, by way of Macerata, Bologna, where he became acquainted with Rossini, Modena, Parma, Piacenza, and Milan, meeting everywhere with a warm welcome and every mark of respect, for a short time to Vienna. Here he gave singing lessons, and obtained the title of Singing-Master at the Imperial Hoftheater. He published likewise for Germany, at Diabelli and Mechetti's, several compositions which had already appeared in Italy, and began working hard on the opera of Enrico Secondo, which he had commenced in that country.

Though he felt very comfortable in Vienna, where, with Conradin Kreutzer, and Reuling, he was appointed Capellmeister at the Imperial Hoftheater for 1837-38, he did not think that in this city he should find a sufficiently extensive sphere of action, since opera to which he was desirous of devoting his powers called him to Italy, whither he set out in October, 1838. On his way, he entered into successful negotiations with the managers at Milan, Turin, and Trieste, for supplying them with operas. In Rome, he worked with persevering industry on two subjects; nay, as he was not satisfied with any of the librettos sent him, he even had the intention of compiling one himself. Such pursuits, which enlisted his exertions, his hopes, and his fears, more than they do those of most other composers, did not, however, prevent his passing the winter of 1838-39 most agreeably in the interesting society of Franz Liszt and the Russian Count Wielhorsky. The latter had, by order of his medical men, come to Rome with his eldest son, who was an invalid, and whom he afterwards lost there. The Count had brought with him the score, almost complete, of his opera, Die Tzzyganii (The Gipsies), and he consulted Nicolai about it. In addition to this, Nicolai enjoyed the company and confidence of the worthy friend of his youth, Hermann Kretzschmer, whose studies had in 1837 led him to Rome, whence he started for the East, to meet once again, in 1848, his friend in Berlin, where he himself is still living and working as a highly distinguished painter. The two passed some joyous evenings at the house of a painter, Catel, of Berlin, a son of the well-known operatic composer. They sometimes also spent their evenings at the house of Signora Caggiotti, mother of that excellent artist, now resident in Berlin, Mme. Emma Caggiotti-Richards, Court-painter. In society Nicolai was always most amiable, and devotedly attached to his art. The scramble made by other young German artists then staying in Rome for mere bread and cheese he despised to such a degree that, as Herr Kretzschmer, who himself heard him, has informed us, he very frequently, without caring where he was, inveighed bitterly and insultingly against such poor wretches, a course which naturally made him many enemies. It is true that, at the period in question, it was not yet personal motives, but the desire to see art and its disciples occupy an elevated position, that rendered him the fierce opponent of those whom he named "base souls." Count Wielhorsky, by the way, did not die till 1856, but his opera was never completed.

In this respect Nicolai was more fortunate, for he finished his opera, Enrico Secondo, in 1839, and soon afterwards another, Rosmonda d'Inghilterra, both which were produced at Trieste, but with only partial success. They soon disappeared; and, as of the first nothing at all, and of the second only a bass air was published, we must leave to some intimate friend the task of entering into a detailed account of these works, as well as of filling up many a gap in this part of the composer's life.

Nicolai did not feel disheartened by the small success of his first operas, but had courage enough to write a third, at the order of the manager of the Teatro Regio, Turin. This was Il Templario, received with applause through the length and breadth of Italy, as well as far beyond the limits of that country.

This opera was the great attraction during the Carnival of 1840, and was performed four times afterwards. Nicolai's reputation was now assured, and spread to all the more important theatres in Italy. Of the large theatres, that at Milan was the first, after the success at Turin, to produce the work, doing so in August 1840. The enthusiasm was almost greater than in the first instance. The critics competed with each other in eulogy, and in prophesying a new era for music. After reading such futile demonstrations, we were surprised at an article sent by a correspondent to the Paris Revue et Gazette Musicale. It is dated Milan, 18th August, 1840, and treats the subject in a far more becoming and appropriate style. Here is a translation of the beginning:

"The historical romance, or, rather, the fine poem of Ivanhoe, by Walter Scott, furnished the author, Marini, with a subject for an opera book, to which Nicolai has composed the music for the Theatre Royal, Turin, and which the Scala selected to open the autumn season. We are not about to enter on any special analysis of the young Prussian composer's work, particularly as it is not such as will bear sharp critical examination, though, in saying this, we would not assert that, as a whole, it does not afford evidence of deep inspiration and artistic warmth; but it contains great mistakes, and still more imitations and reminiscences. If we take it all and all, however, we must allow that the composer gives extraordinary promise, with zeal and practice, for the future. The first cavatina for tenor, the duet between tenor and bass, that between bass and soprano, and the sextet of the third act, are, without bearing the stamp of unusual originality, very well worked out and effective. The instrumentation is excellent, though in the Stretto of the first act a perfect jumble of chord-phrases with obligato noise, such as the taste of the day demands."

In Milan, also, Il Templario was performed a great many times, being, by the way, selected as the opera given on the grand gala night, during the stay of the clever Grand-Princess Helena of Russia, in September, 1840.

The next theatre that produced the interesting novelty was the San Carlo at Naples. There, too, the applause was boisterous, and such as had never been known before. It would lead us too far were we to attempt to name, one by one, the numerous Italian theatres that brought out the opera; but we must remark that Nicolai, whom, on account of his Italian-sounding name, every one proudly regarded as a countryman, and therefore, ranked among the eight great Italian operatic composers, namely: Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante, Ricci, Pacini, Coccia, and Coppola, received most unusual marks of honor.

But beyond the limits of Italy, also, Italian singers spread Nicolai's fame. The Kärnthner Theater, Vienna, was the first German theatre to produce Il Templario, with the contralto part of Rebecca altered by the composer to suit Tadolini's magnificent voice. Vienna was but an echo of the Italian theatres. Many of the favorite airs found their way to the barrel-organs, where they vegetated for years. With equal success, Barcelona and Malaga followed in 1841; Pesh, in July, 1842; Granada, in 1843; Berlin, in 1844; and St. Petersburg, in 1846. Nay, Il Templario extended its pilgrimage as far even as Constantinople and New York, weaving for its composer a chaplet of laurel such as no other German composer, except Meyerbeer, had ever culled in Italy.

It can surprise no one that, after such success, Nicolai was absolutely besieged with commissions from theatrical managers. Of the various librettos sent him, he hesitated between one founded on an antique, and another founded on a romantic and chivalrous subject, considering himself competent to do justice to both. As, however, he had already achieved so decided a triumph with a libretto of the Middle Ages, he, for a time, laid on one side Proserpina and composed Odoardo e Gildippe, produced at Genoa in 1840. It met, however, with only such partial success, that it soon disappeared forever from the repertory. As nothing of this opera, also, except a really beautiful Cavatina for Mezzo-Soprano, was ever published, we must refrain from giving an opinion on the work.

In consequence of great bodily and mental fatigue, brought on by travelling, composing, etc., Nicolai now began to feel seriously indisposed. But his rare physical and mental energy enabled him to overcome this, and, the same year, to write another opera, which he had promised to the Scala, the theatre where he had been so extraordinarily successful. This opera, Il Proscrito, in its subsequently amended form, as it now lies before us, is, in every respect an important work, far superior to Il Templario, and, therefore, we shall not fail at the proper time and place to speak of it more in detail, as it afterwards issued, re-modelled, at Vienna, from the young composer's hand. We will for the present merely state that it was successful only with the educated public, who in Nicolai's youthfully fresh and high genius, which was beginning to unite the most profoundly poetical conception with decided musical talent and a thoroughly scientific musical education, perceived the foundation of a better era for music and of a return to simplicity. As we have already hinted, the masses treated the work with coldness, though in the simplicity of its style, in the tender, fervid, and grandiose conception of the poem, and in the characterization of the personages, it might almost have been adopted as a model for Italian opera.

But Nicolai was not deterred by the comparatively small success of Il Proscrito from working at other operas. It was now partly Proserpina, and partly—as the strong and comic personages of Shakespeare's comedies had begun to interest him, and he felt he possessed a sufficient fund of musical humor for a refined comic opera—Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, for which he himself wrote the plan of the libretto, and had it put into verse by an Italian author, which now engrossed all his attention. Both works, however, were destined, perhaps fortunately for their success, never to be concluded in Italy. Nay, the latter work had scarcely got beyond the Introduction, when Nicolai received a flattering invitation to accept the post of first Capellmeister at the Imperial Opera, Vienna. Since Conradin Kreutzer left that capital in 1840, the post had been held only nominally by him, and, for more than a year, great hesitation had been displayed in appointing any one else, for the post was the most important of its kind in Germany. It not only demanded a thoroughly competent conductor and experienced judge of vocal and instrumental music, but, as a German alternated with an Italian operatic season at the Imperial Operahouse, a musician who was acquainted with the two heterogeneous styles, and knew how to value, without partiality, what was good and beautiful in each. Such qualities were then, as they still are, rarities, and, as we have already stated, there was for a considerable time some hesitation, until, principally on the recommendation of Ballochino, poet to the Imperial Opera, who had become acquainted with, and conceived a great esteem for him, at Milan, the choice at length fell upon Nicolai, who, after some trifling objections had been overcome, received the official appointment. It was this very post which, ever since his first short stay in Vienna, had always floated as an ideal before his mind. It did not, therefore, require so very great an effort on his part for him to leave his enthusiastically beloved Italy, to renounce all the laurels he might still gather there, and to hasten to his new home. The stipulated salary, by the way, amounted to 2,000 florins annually; the contract was for three years, with a holiday of two months every year, and the obligation to write the management, during this time, a new German opera.

Having arrived in Vienna in April, 1841, the first thing Nicolai did was to get up his Templario, and conduct the earlier performances, which were perfectly model performances, and tended greatly to increase his reputation. He then went, by the way of Cracow, to Warsaw, where, after a long separation, he again saw and embraced his mother, on whom he settled a permanent monthly pension. After a short stay, he returned to Vienna.

In Vienna itself, at the time of Nicolai's arrival, there was a lively taste for music, founded upon the feeling then just awakening, but, unfortunately, not lasting long, for what was elevated and good, and which must have restored the classic style of a Mozart and a Beethoven all its former importance. Nicolai instantly entered heart and soul into this tendency on the part of the public, and his whole sojourn in Vienna is scarcely aught else than an account of the fruits of these exertions, which Vienna still thankfully acknowledges, even at the present day.

It was on the evening of the 27th August, 1841, that, in the pretty little Summer Theatre at Hietzing, near Vienna, the animated conversation of a stranger concerning the musical questions of the day with his companion attracted the attention of the persons seated near him. He remained at the Soirée, which was given on the occasion, till the grand air from Il Templario was sung by Signora Cerini, and much applauded. Hereupon, not without some sarcastic remarks upon a musical and "declamatory" entertainment, in which nothing was "declaimed," he left the theatre. It was in vain that people asked each other who this certainly important individual was. This was not destined to remain long a secret to any Viennese; soon afterwards, Otto Nicolai, for he was the stranger, grasped the conductor's staff at the Imperial Operahouse near the Kärnthner Thor.

Junius Brutus Booth.*

Of the three great actors who stand together, in this century, above all others in the English school, one may be claimed as an American. Though born in England, May 1, 1796, Junius Brutus Booth chose this country for his home. He came of a Republican stock. His father left England to fight for America in the Revolution; and after his return to London, reverently kept the portrait of Washington in his drawing-room. No visitor was permitted to stand in the presence of the picture with covered head. Thus from childhood Junius Brutus Booth was taught to believe in the Republic; he came to this country at the age of 25, and here his greatest triumphs were won. He deserves to be called the greatest of American tragedians. England has no right to his fame.

Till now no authentic biography of the great actor had been written, but numerous improbable anecdotes and incorrect sketches of his life were circulated in the newspapers and magazines. Half the anecdotes of distinguished men are, doubtless, mere inventions, and many good stories are told of Booth which really belong to the dramatic apocrypha. These memoirs, though not as complete as we expected, correct much misapprehension of his character and form an authentic record of his singular career. That they are written by his daughter gives them deeper interest. Booth had ten children, of whom five still live, Junius, Rosalie, Edwin, Asia, and Joseph; this volume is the work of Asia—Mrs. John S. Clarke—and reveals in no small degree the genius hereditary in the family. To all biographies, in which the history of the subject is related by a relative or friend, this sweeping objection exists, that the maxim "speak only good of the dead" is too faithfully heeded for the interests of truth, and that while most faults are suppressed, all virtues are exaggerated. But this objection cannot be fairly made to these memoirs. They are written with a spirit of reserve, but not of concealment, and the author has beautifully united a feeling of devotion to the father with rare impartiality in judging the tragedian. It is the story of a wild and daring genius, simply and sadly told. The reasons for its publication the introduction states, with a delicacy and candor almost unmatched, when we consider that, of the event to which it alludes, the authoress was permitted neither to be silent, nor to speak freely.

"This volume was originally designed as a token of the profound love and reverence with which the children of a good and noble father ever regarded him in life, and honor his memory in death. At a recent period, the perusal of English publications on the drama having such total disregard of justice, in all relating to my father, made the task I had undertaken in love become a duty. After a tedious research, I had compiled a faithful account, and when very near its completion, it was laid aside.

"A calamity, without precedent, has fallen upon our country! We, of all families, secure in domestic love and retirement, are stricken desolate! The name we would have enwreathed with laurels is dishonored by a son—his well beloved—his bright boy Absalom!

"My task never should have been resumed, but in the heaviest hours of our sorrow, so many tongues were free to calumniate us, privately and professionally, that I am urged to complete my work, in the belief, that while this truthful sketch may tend to interest the friends of my lamented father, it will serve, in all honest minds, to confute the aspirations of evil men."

Junius Brutus Booth is one of many proofs that acting is an independent art, and not a mere combination of oratory with scenic display. For men are born actors as they are born painters, poets, or musicians. Booth had a classical education; he learned printing, and studied law; he was appointed a midshipman in the British navy; he had unquestionably much literary ability, and none of his family had part in the theatrical profession. Yet from an innate love of acting, he resolved to be an actor, and when only 17 years old left his home, and against the wishes of his father made an engagement with a provincial manager. In 1814 his company visited Holland, where Booth endured many of the hardships of a strolling player. But he soon learned to trust that ambition which led him to the stage, and, in 1815, sought without success a London engagement. He then played at Brighton as Richard, Norman, and Sir Edward Mortimer, obtaining the friendship and admiration of many persons, among others Dr. Williams, (Anthony Pasquin,) who seems to have been among the first to recognize his genius. At last he obtained an engagement at Covent Garden, but only to play subordinate characters, and at the end of the season returned in disgust to the provincial theatres. At Brighton, by failing to keep an engagement, Edmund Kean unconsciously befriended a rival of whose existence he was previously ignorant. At short notice Booth was required to play Sir Giles Overreach, in the place of Kean, and surprised the audience with unexpected energy and power. This performance, by the influence of Lord Erskine, Dr. Williams, and other friends, obtained him a trial night at Covent Garden, where he appeared Feb. 12, 1817, as Richard III. His success was so great that Kean, the monarch of the English stage, seems to have been alarmed for his supremacy. Here began that wretched professional jealousy which in the end had much to do with Booth's emigration to America. Kean, taking an advantage of a misunderstanding about terms, * Passages, Incidents, and Anecdotes in the life of Junius Brutus Booth, (the elder). By his daughter.

between Booth and Mr. Harris, the manager of the Covent Garden Theatre, immediately called upon the debutant, carried him to Drury Lane Theatre, and induced him at once to sign an engagement. Eight days after his appearance as Richard, Booth played Iago to Kean's Othello, at Drury Lane, to an immense and enthusiastic audience. London papers of the day compared this circumstance to the friendly rivalry of Garrick and Quin. But this joint triumph was soon to end. Booth was soon informed that he was not to play any of Kean's parts, such as Richard and Sir Giles—parts which he had given special study. In addition to this, he was required to support Kean in secondary roles. He at once withdrew from an engagement which he considered Kean had broken and returned to Covent Garden.

This caused great excitement, and those were the days when the London public cared more for the theatre than they did for Parliament; when men like Garrick and Kean excited as lively interest as Chatham or Pitt; when dramatic writing was a profession, not a business; when actors were hissed and plays were damned, and the storms of theatrical rivalry did not rage in the green-rooms alone. Booth's reappearance at Covent Garden was the occasion of a fierce and brutal riot, and a newspaper war between the partisans of the rival tragedians. Booth's genius finally triumphed over opposition; he continued to play Richard and Sir Giles, alternately, and also appeared as Iago, Posthumus and Sir Edward Mortimer. Impartial minds, who took no part in the strife, acknowledged his abilities, and his Iago was especially admired by William Godwin, the author of "Caleb Williams," who addressed him a letter of advice, predicting his fame. We have read much in regard to this celebrated difficulty between Kean and Booth, much that is not quoted in these memorials, and there is no doubt that Booth's errors were but the mistakes of a very young man. The fault was Kean's, who can hardly be acquitted of an intention to crush a dangerous rival. "Mr. Kean," says the biography before us, "the acknowledged king of tragedy, did not intend to allow a continuation of this rivalry. He had previously seen the power of his adversary, and merely proffered him a taste of adulation and success before attempting his down-fall. It is needless to explain that in the signing of that fatal memorandum, Mr. Kean had covert design. He knew the contents in their literal and technical design, and Mr. Booth did not." It is with pleasure, however, that we read that the mere mention of Kean's name, in later years, never failed to draw from Booth "genuine praise and unselfish admiration;" that in 1820 the two great actors again played together, at Drury Lane, and that years after, after Booth had won American reputation, they met in England and reconciled their ancient misunderstanding. Booth remained in England till 1821, and, before sailing for this country, appeared as Leor, one of his grandest performances. Hazlitt, whose intense enthusiasm for Kean was only limited by his critical habits of thought, appears to have reluctantly conceded to Booth supremacy in this character.

In 1821, at the Richmond Va., Theatre, Booth began his American career, which, lasting more than thirty years, justly entitles him to the fame of an American actor. In New York, he made his first appearance at the Park Theatre, October 5, 1821, as Richard. During his engagement he played Brutus, Leor, Othello and Hamlet, and at once took a position at the head of his profession. He travelled through the country from Boston to New Orleans, and gained a national reputation before the age of twenty-six. He twice visited England. We need not repeat the events of his professional life in this country; enough that all his triumphs ended November 30, 1852, when, returning to his home from an engagement at New Orleans, he died on a Mississippi steamboat, alone among strangers. His monument, erected by Edwin Booth, now stands in the Baltimore cemetery.

The three great actors of the age are Kean, Booth, and Cooke. Who is ever wearied of the old story of their conquests of the stage? There is a particular personal interest felt in the great actor, because it is in his person that his genius and his work is embodied. The author stands behind his book, the painter behind his picture, but the actor presents himself. Fortunately we know much of those who trod the modern stage, and can estimate them fairly. Kean, Booth and Cooke were men singularly alike. Each had an intensely nervous temperament, and an imagination, which sometimes overmastered reason. Pope's hackneyed verse: "Great wits to madness nearly are allied," has confirmation in their strange aberrations. Their actions often seemed to be more than eccentric and kindled by insanity. The power which they possessed, far beyond other men, of identifying themselves with heroes and kings, and villains, could not be always kept within the glittering boundary of the footlights; it cast its glamor over real life, and covered the world with strange hues, like a landscape seen through a many colored casement. Thus, the dying Kean, arrayed in war-paint, wampum-belts and panther skins, played the part of an Indian chief, solely for his own delight. Cooke, with a coarser nature, pawned himself for a bottle of brandy, and was ticketed and stowed away upon a shelf to be redeemed. Booth's adventures of the kind were numerous. He did many things which in another man would have aroused derision, but in him had electrical effect. While playing Brutus, in the tragedy of John Howard Payne, in the most thrilling scene where the Roman condemns his son to death, Booth was deeply affected, and tears streamed from his eyes. He was interrupted by a drunken man in the gallery, when, without losing the character, he fixed his eyes upon the offender, and exclaimed, "Beware, I am the headman—I am the executioner." On the lips of Forrest or Macready, such words would have caused a roar of laughter; but in the case of Booth this added to the profound impression of the tragedy—they became a part of it. For such a mind there was little distinction between the stage and the street. We do not believe that either Booth, or Kean, or Cooke, had any organic insanity; but there was frequently little difference between the excesses of their imagination and the freaks of the madman. When Booth, sailing to Charleston, S.C., sprang into the sea, with the intention of suicide, it was not because of any sufficient reason, but simply from an overmastering imagination, which had long been brooding over the death of the actor Conway.

Intellectually, Booth was undoubtedly the greatest of the tragedians. He had the advantage of a good education, and was a hard student throughout his life. As a linguist, his accomplishments were remarkable; he spoke eight or ten languages, and in New Orleans, at the French Theatre, appeared successfully in the tragedies of Racine. Kean was desirous of a reputation for scholarship, but his acting was far better than the Latin he affected. Neither Kean nor Cooke would have been successful in any but a theatrical career; but Booth's abilities might certainly have gained him eminence in literature. He wrote well, had great conversational powers, and was not only an actor but a theologian. "All forms of religion and all temples of devotion were sacred to him, and in passing churches he never failed to bare his head reverently. He worshipped at many shrines; he admired the Koran, and in that volume many beautiful passages are underscored; days sacred to color, ore and metals were religiously observed by him. In the synagogues he was known as a Jew, because he conversed with the rabbis and learned doctors, and joined their worship in the Hebrew tongue. He read the Talmud, and strictly observed many of its laws. Several fathers of the Roman Catholic Church recount pleasant hours spent with him in theological discourse, and aver that he was of their persuasion, by his knowledge of the mysteries of their faith." Yet no religion was too humble, and of all the places of worship he frequented, that which he most loved, says his daughter, "was a floating church, or 'Sailor's Bethel.' The congregation was of the humblest degree, and the ministers not at all edifying. I remember kneeling through a lengthy impromptu prayer, which contained no spirit of piety to my childish ears, and looking around wearily at my father, I beheld his face so earnestly inspired with devotion that I felt rebuked, and it became pleasant to attend to that which was devoid of interest before."

We are willing to believe that this reverence for religion, which had such opposite modes of expression, was yet deeply rooted, and that it was shown in daily acts of philanthropy. There was a rare beauty in the nature of this singular man: his tenderness for even the brutes recalls that of the lady in Shelley's "Sensitive Plant." "A golden thread of human sympathy with all creatures whom God had made ran through the darkening moods of his genius," says the Rev. Mr. Freeman Clark, describing the solemnity with which he gave Christian burial to a few dead wild pigeons, an eccentric protest against what he firmly believed to be wanton murder. In 1822, he purchased a farm in Harford County, Maryland, his home when not fulfilling theatrical engagements. Here he consistently enforced his humane creed: the use of flesh for food was prohibited. "Animal life on the farm," says his daughter, "was sacred, from the dainty partridge to the black snake and wild boar of the wood. The servants, if actually wanting meat, were allowed money to purchase it from the neighbors; but the immediate family religiously observed the law of abstinence. Another thing forbidden was the felling of trees. Every tree was held sacred from the axe as if a Dryad or woodland nymph inhabited its trunk. Fallen trees and brush served for firewood, while animal and vegetable life flourished in rare luxuriance." The following letter, which Booth wrote in 1833 to his father, is a characteristic expression of his opinions.

"Dear Father: The weather was so bad that the managers closed the house on Wednesday evening. I had to play on Thursday in lieu of it, and again to-night. As Joe will want 'Fanny' to finish the ploughing I send her home. Let the gentleman who bears this have 'Peacock' to ride back to Baltimore. Let Joe sow the timothy in the meadow. Tell Junius not to go opossum hunting or setting rabbit-traps, but to let the poor devils live. Cruelty is the offspring of idleness of mind and beastly ignorance, and in children should be repressed and not encouraged, as is too often the case by unthinking beings who surround them. A thief who takes property from another has it in his power, should he repent, to make a restoration; but the robber of life never can give back what he has wantonly and sacrilegiously taken from beings perhaps innocent, and equally capable of enjoying pleasure or suffering torture with himself. The ideas of Pythagoras I have adopted; and as respects our accountability to animals hereafter, nothing that man can preach can make me believe to the contrary. 'Every death its own avenger breeds.' Enough of this. I think there is some parsnip-seed hanging in a paper by the looking-glass in the parlor. Let Joe sow some in manure, in small trenches in the garden—say three or four rows."

Booth was a great actor—we think the age has produced none greater, and certainly even Edmund Kean was in some respects his inferior. But Kean had an advantage which Booth lacked—critics and eulogists, who not only had the ability but the inclination to do justice to his powers. Such men as Byron and Hazlitt have taken care of his fame. Booth left London, then the theatrical metropolis of the world, before his genius was matured, and thus deprived himself of criticism which might have been a part of the literature of the age. England never forgot nor forgave his desertion of the English stage. Mrs. Clarke is perfectly correct in saying that recent English publications have done injustice to his fame. He came to a country where the importance of the stage had then less recognition from literature. True, Carpenter had published the "Mirror of Taste" in Philadelphia, a periodical chiefly devoted to the theatre, but his criticisms were but second rate, and though there were certainly men capable of writing intelligently of the drama, we do not remember a single article upon Booth's acting that was worthy of it. Newspaper-praise he had in abundance, but it lacked discrimination and description. This deficiency has been unfortunate for his fame, which rests too much upon tradition and recollections of old playgoers; yet what evidence we have is enough to place him among the few great tragedians who have lived since Betterton. Those who remember him well say that no other actor resembled him. He had a wonderful individuality. In his great moments there was something awful in his passion—"he impressed me," wrote a gentleman who saw him in his proudest days, "almost as something supernatural, as a being from another world. No living actor equals the sublimity and the beauty of his passion." His portraits, his letters, even his faults confirm the originality of his genius—genius which, though not fully recorded, fortunately still lives in his son. It is, perhaps, from Edwin Booth that this generation can form its finest idea of his father. But though he has inherited the grace, the gentleness, the beauty, and the electrical swiftness, he still lacks that towering and tempestuous passion, that supernatural energy, which in the elder Booth re-inspired even the tragedy of Shakspeare.

New Organ in Trinity Church, New Haven.

(From the New Haven Palladium, Sept. 8.)

Old Trinity has witnessed many solemn services within her hallowed walls, but none more truly sacred than on Friday night, when the two thousand pipes of her magnificent organ fulfilled the Divine injunction "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord!"

The organ case is simple and massive, showing a front of gothic arches, built of black walnut and chestnut woods combined, and displaying the front pipes, which are delicately colored and picked out with gold. These pipes are real and speak, not as is often the case mere shams which should never be found in a church. The arches of the case are supported and divided by solid buttresses, so that the whole appearance of the instrument is massive and ornamental.

The Pedale ranges from C to D, a compass of twenty-seven notes, and is wonderfully powerful in tone, while at the same time there is a rich softness even in the lowest notes which sustains and holds up the superstructure of the three organs, the Great, the Swell and the Choir, which make up the mighty whole.

One of the most difficult problems of organ building is the voicing of the reed stops, and in this particular the Messrs. Hook have been singularly fortunate. Several professional organists, well acquainted with the great organs both here and in Europe, who were present at the opening, unanimously agreed that the reed pipes could not be surpassed in beauty and purity of tone. The diapasons extending through the whole organ bind the most distant tones together and fill up the intervals so that the ear is perfectly satisfied with the full harmony. Some of the stops are of such singular and rare beauty of tone that they deserve particular mention. The Viol da Gamba and the Violone imitate most exactly the effect of a stringed instrument. One can almost hear the peculiar tone produced by drawing the bow across the strings. The Geigen-Principal, a new stop, is much admired. The Clarinet is a perfect imitation of that beautiful instrument, and the Flauto D'Amour is really a flute, only more exquisitely pure than we are often favored with hearing its original. No one who was present will ever forget the beauty of the Doppel Flöte as exhibited by Mr. Willcox in his solo. The execution belonged to the player, but the full, sweet, yet delicate tone of this stop, belongs to the builder.

One of the triumphs of mechanical skill which the Messrs. Hook have displayed in this instrument can only be correctly appreciated by a close examination. The Pneumatic Lever is so arranged as to work the whole organ and thus enable the player to bring out its full power with perfect ease. In many, indeed in most great organs, the pressure required to be brought upon a note is equal to ten pounds, and of course in holding down a chord or series of notes, the fatigue is much increased; beside which, the pipe does not immediately respond to the player's finger, and thus the whole performance is heavy and dilatory. Through the whole of Trinity organ runs a net-work of valves and pistons like the nerves of the human body, communicating with the player as he sits at the key-board, and enabling him, by the slightest pressure, to convey his will to every part of the great instrument. Nothing is more extraordinary than the promptitude with which every pipe, from the vastest to the smallest, responds to the finger. In some organs so slowly do the larger bass pipes give out the tone, that their use has been entirely laid aside; they have been silent for years, thus robbing the instrument of more than half its force.

Of the performance of Friday night we have left ourselves but scant space to speak. Mr. Willcox, who has devoted much of his time to assisting in getting up the organ, displayed its beauties with a loving hand. His reputation is too widely known to need our commendation. Few who heard him will ever forget, what was in our opinion the gem of the evening, The Communion by Batiste. It bore us away from the Elm City back to an old cathedral in a distant land, and again we knelt upon the marble pavement before the great altar, while saints looked down upon us from the blazoned windows, as the holy strain sobbed through the groined arches. Dr. Wm. Anderson played the magnificent overture to William Tell with great power of execution, and displayed a highly cultivated taste in his management of the stops. It is only just to say that our New Haven player fairly held his own beside the Boston master, who, we know, has the highest opinion of his younger brother in art.

Justice demands a few words in mention of the workers in the enterprise. The Messrs. Hook have labored in no sordid spirit. They have not forgotten that they are artists, and that this organ is to bear their name for long years. Mr. F. H. Hastings, a member of their firm, has labored with the most devoted zeal from the first commencement of the work in November '65 till its completion. This gentleman, who has superintended the erection of the instrument, and to whose taste the design of the case is due, is an enthusiast in his art, as all true artists are. Nor should we forget Messrs. Henry P. Holland and Mark H. Plaisted, the intelligent and skilled mechanics who have worked faithfully during the last month, and to whom much of the success is due. The Messrs. Hook have secured the services of Mr. Sturm, who came from Germany with the great Boston organ, and he has had much to do with the planning of their latest work. There is probably no firm in the world,—certainly none in America,—possessing more advantages for doing ample justice to their patrons than this old and honored New England house. With an energy and enterprise which is truly American, they combine the patient study of the European organ-builders, and a care in selecting what is really valuable in the shape of novelty and rejecting what is meretricious, peculiarly their own.

Cherubini and his "Wassertraeger."

Cherubini was first known on the lyric stage in Paris by the scores of Mélée and Lodisiska, in which people admire the richness of the harmony at the same time as the profound science and dramatic expression. But, observes the Art Musical, these learned productions were composed to books which did not contain what was required at that period: good opportunities for vocal display. Thus, even while applauding the music, every one remained cold, and did not experience the same attraction as for the works of Marsollier and Dalayrac, of Hoffmann and of Méhul. The fact is that, between these men associated in so many brilliant successes, there existed the sympathy of talent and experience; the author of the book counted for half in the piece which obtained the suffrages of the public; and, lastly, this same public demanded in a lyric work as much from the author as from the composer—it liked to pass from a piece of music distinguished for its truthfulness of expression to well contrived scenes, to clever dialogue, and to interesting situations. Cherubini, who till then had not had a book permitting him to indulge in songs of a popular kind, applied to all the literary men for such a one. A young author, Bouilly, who had already furnished the Theatre Feydeau with Le onore, music by Garcaux, was lucky enough to satisfy the desire of the eminent composer. The idea of the book was full of interest. It turned upon an admirable trait of devotion on the part of a Water-carrier towards a person of distinction, who, shut up in the Auvergnat's cask, escaped as by a miracle. It was upon this subject that the young author wrote a piece entitled Les deux Journées, which he eagerly confided to Cherubini. The latter, fancying he saw in it every opportunity for affording full scope to his rich and fertile imagination, set to work assiduously on the composition of one of the finest scores in the modern repertory.

Mme. Scio, so remarkable for the beauty of her voice, her warmth of feeling, and her distinguished appearance, was then shining at the Opera Comique. By her side, at the same period, was an artist full of spirit and talent, the inimitable Juliet, cultivating his art by instinct, and who, from the saucy pans of a restaurateur, had made his way to the lyric stage, where he obtained so great a vogue for the Club des bonnes Gens, and more especially for the Visitandines. These two famous singers, supported by other distinguished artists, offered Cherubini and his young colleague great chances of success. Affairs were then, moreover, eminently favorable to the fine arts. General Bonaparte, having returned from Egypt, had just effected the revolution of the 18th Brumaire. Intestine divisions and the continual shock of parties had been dissipated as though by enchantment. Paris soon resumed its activity, and its influence in Europe. Literature recovered its dignity, and art its empire. Every one gave himself up without fear to his habits and tastes. It was in this state of things that Cherubini put the finishing touch to Les deux Journées. The management of the Theatre-Feydeau was actively employed in the production of the work. The composer, however, and his colleague were not free from anxiety as to its fate, though the artists smiled at their timidity. Juliet and Mme. Scio assured them by the admirable talent they displayed at the rehearsals, and never ceased telling them that their Water-Carrier would make the round of France.

The first performance of Les deux Journées, took place before a great audience. The overture met with universal approbation. The first act was pronounced well planned and uninterruptedly interesting. The finale, that admirable septet, cited as one of the master-pieces of the French school, produced the most lively enthusiasm. The curtain had just fallen upon this act, when a large number of pupils of the Conservatory scaled the orchestra, and surrounded the composer. But, while replying to their warm congratulations and to the cordial grasps of their hands, he was thinking of something which seriously disquieted him. He was entirely absorbed by the scene of the cask. The fate of the piece was bound up with that, and, on several occasions, he had seen the public forget the enthusiasm created by a first act, and display great severity towards the following acts. He reckoned, however, and with great justice, on Juliet's spirit and powers. Every measure had been taken in order that the scene of the cask, containing an illustrious Proscrit, might produce all the effect expected from it. But a mere nothing might annihilate the composer's hopes. It was necessary that the interest and the comic element of the scene should strike the public at the very minute, the very second, indicated. It was necessary to avoid the vigilance of a sentry whose steps were counted. In a word, Count Armand had not more than a minute in which to escape. Everything combined to render this decisive instant favorable for the piece. With the natural frankness peculiar to the worthy Auvergnat, Juliet first drew from the cask a pailful of real water, and then suddenly opened the cask, whence the Noble on whose head a price has been set, escaped. The delicious joy experienced by the admirable son of the people, the wonderful facial expression of the actor, the vibrating accents of his voice, and, above all, the indescribable effect of the orchestra, produced among the entire audience one of those sudden phases of emotion impossible to be withstood. The cask scene was the occasion of a somewhat strange incident.

At the third performance of Les deux Journées, the theatre was crowded by a great number of the lower classes, among whom some Water-Carriers had found their way, and filled the second and the third gallery. The piece was even more effective than ever, and the bravos from the broad vigorous chests of the poorer visitors, resounded all over the house. The next morning, at about ten o'clock, twelve Water-Carriers, in their working costume, with their straps on their backs, waited upon Cherubini. The orator of the band carried an enormous nosegay, which he offered the composer, saying, at the same time, in the jargon peculiar to the Water-Carriers from Auvergne, and which it is impossible to render in a translation:

"Beg pardon, sir, if we intrude, but when the heart speaks it cannot be resisted."

"What do you desire, my worthy friends?" asked Cherubini.

"To thank you, in the name of all the water-carriers, for the honor you have done us in your beautiful piece at the theatre, where, by Heaven! you have shown us in such a light—that it made us cry like so many children, and that is the truth."

"I painted you as you are, my good friends," replied Cherubini.

"Well, it's very pleasing, and so I have come to beg that you will accept these flowers as a mark of our gratitude, and give us the permission to supply your house with water for a whole year—for nothing, of course. I have agreed with all my comrades. Each will take his week. That will be jolly."

"I am profoundly touched by your offer," said the composer, "which flatters as much as it honors me. But you must allow me to accept only these beautiful flowers, which I would not change for a crown."

"Oh! don't refuse us, d—n it all! It would give us too much pain. You are a good fellow; don't refuse."

"Your time and your labor," answered Cherubini, "are too necessary for the maintenance of your families for me to consent to profit by your fatigue and your exertions. Let us say no more about it, my good friends. If my piece has caused your hearts to beat, believe me that your offer has had no less an effect upon mine, and that it will never be effaced from my memory. As for the flowers, I will deck my wife and my daughter with them, promising you to preserve one that will remind me all my life of this delightful interview."

With these words, Cherubini sent for several bottles of his best old wine, and he and the Water-Carriers proposed to each other the most expressive and sincere toasts, accompanied by expressions of mutual devotion and esteem.

As he said, Cherubini carefully preserved one of the flowers of this magnificent nosegay, and had it placed in a glass globe. Every time he looked at it, it reminded him of the happiest moments in his dramatic career.

Music Abroad.

Worcester Festival.

The 143d Festival of the Three Choirs opened on Tuesday morning, Sept. 11, in Worcester Cathedral, and, strange to say, with a formal clerical defence of church music! We copy from the Orchestra's report:

The chant service was Dr. Wesley's; the anthem, Mr. Goss's "Praise the Lord, O my soul." The Rev. J. W. Leigh of Stoneleigh preached an eloquent and able sermon in defence of church music. When the vicar quoted among texts the sixth verse of Chronicles I. chap. 25, it was the general feeling of his hearers that a sufficiently powerful refutation of the objections of Lord Dudley, Dr. Begg, and other haters of church music might be found in the Divine authority of this passage:—"And all these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries, and harps, for the service of the house of God, according to the King's order to Asaph, Jeduthun, and Heman."

By noon a brilliant attendance had gathered in the Cathedral. The stewards were indefatigable in securing accommodation, for which the demand was brisk. The high-priced seats in the nave and the reserved seats in the aisles were filled, and the transepts well attended. Mr. Costa's plan of planting the first and second violins in the front rank of the orchestra was adhered to, so that the principal subjects of the compositions could be distinctly heard, while the other instruments were performing their allotted parts. The band embraced the leading names of the profession—Sainton, Blagrove, Harper, Carrodus, Webb, Lazarus, Pratten, and many more.

A glance at the programme of the first day, and the various artists who supported it is the best criticism. The first part was as follows:—"Dettingen Te Deum," Handel; Solo (Mme. Patey-Whytock and Chorus), "We praise Thee, O God;" Quartet, "The glorious company," Chorus, "The Holy Church;" Solo (Mr. Lewis Thomas and Chorus), "Thou art the King of Glory" (Trumpet Obligato, Mr. Harper); Solo (Mr. Cummings), "When Thou tookest upon Thee;" Chorus, "When thou hadst overcome;" Trio (Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas), "Thou sittest at the right hand;" Chorus, "We therefore pray Thee;" Chorus, "Make them to be numbered;" Solo (Mr. Lewis Thomas), "Vouchsafe, O Lord;" Solo (Mme. Patey-Whytock and Chorus), "O Lord, in Thee;" Anthem (Psalm 55), "Hear my Prayer" (Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Chorus), Mendelssohn; Trio, "Haste to Samaria," "Naaman" (Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Cummings), Costa, Recit., "'Tis as Gehazi said," "Naaman" (Mr. Santley), Costa; Invocation, "Hear me, Almighty God," "Naaman" (Mr. Santley), Costa; Recit. and Air, "I dreamt I was in Heaven," "Naaman" (Mme. Sainton-Dolby), Costa; Quartet, "Honor and glory," "Naaman" (Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley), Costa; Solo, "As from the power of sacred lays" (Mlle. Tietjens and Chorus), Handel; Chorus, "The dead shall live" Handel.

The splendid setting of the Te Deum, composed after the victory of Dettingen, 1743, and the finest ever written to the so-called Ambrosian hymn, was fittingly sung. The effect of the choruses was sublime: and it is so much the sublimity of Handel that we wish we could wholly absolve him of borrowing from Purcell's previous setting. The solemnity of compositions of this kind is undoubtedly heightened by the effect of their being heard in a cathedral; but in the particular Te Deum in question there are passages which suffer from the very same cause: the echoes of the building destroy the precision of the notes. The solo part of Mendelssohn's anthem was allotted to Mme. Sherrington, to whom it is eminently suited. It is to be regretted that room was not found for a larger portion of Mr. Costa's "Naaman" than that given. The excerpt was most favorably received by the audience, who were specially delighted with the canon "Honor and glory," in which the magnificent notes of Mme. Tietjens were heard to advantage. Mr. Santley was impressive in the "Hear me, Almighty God;" and Mme. Sainton-Dolby in the following recitative and air, the most popular number of the oratorio, sang well, although the infant character of the supposititious singer was hardly symbolized in the real singer's voice. "Ne pas vieillir" is an endeavor which artists think easy. The second part of the day-performances—lunch intervening—was made up of a selection from Haydn's "Creation." But for the intervention named the succession of Haydn to Handel might have been unfortunate for the former. Its light and airy character, however, was acceptable in the afternoon; and Mr. Sims Reeves's return to the service of the Three Choirs found general favor. The choruses of these festivals are well accustomed to the "Creation;" with this advantage, therefore, and the support the oratorio derived from a cast comprising Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Reeves, our readers may readily imagine that it was worthily performed.

The concert in the evening given in the College Hall was excellently attended and went very satisfactorily. Its interesting portion was a selection from Weber's opera of "Euryanthe," a work well-known for its beauty of melody, but tabooed from the stage by the trashy nature of the libretto. The selection was well made: it comprised the popular overture, executed with great spirit,—a number of fresh, happy choruses, the Huntsmen's especially—the air "Flowers of the valley," sung by Mlle. Tietjens to perfection—and the cavatina "Soft air" for Mr. Sims Reeves. We must not omit to notice Mr. Cummings's singing of his cavatina. Mr. Santley subsequently gave the "Eri tu" from "Un Ballo in Maschera," which he rendered with manly force, drawing a strong contrast with the sickly manner in which that air is given by Italian artists. His new interpretation compelled an encore. The second part of the programme was concocted with the following names:—Anber, Wober, Rossini, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Cimarosa, Handel, and CLARABEL! We need hardly add to whom the last addition was due, or that it was "Maggie's Secret," or that it was redemanded. The capital quintet "Im Im" from "Il Flauto," with Mr. Santley as Papageno, went admirably; the famous "Haste thee, nymph," from "L'Allegro," was given by Mr. Lewis Thomas in such jolly style that the whole audience had hard work to refrain from joining in. The great feature of the concert was the song from "Oberon," "I'll weep for thee," which is exactly suited for Mr. Sims Reeves, and which called forth thunders of applause. The well-known trio "Matrimonio Segreto," with Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mlle. Tietjens, and Mme. Sainton, seemed greatly to please the hearers. Mr. Done played the people out with the March from "Athalie" at the close of a long, and on the whole well-sustained concert.

Wednesday.—It is a sine qua non, the festivals of the three choirs should each include a performance of "Elijah" and the "Messiah," on the principle that people are never tired of listening, either in music or philosophy, to what they know already. The popularity of the "Elijah," which was the morning performance of to-day, has gone on steadily increasing since its production in forty-six, under the composer's leadership. Every little village choir knows it; every attendant of these festivals can map out the passages before they occur, as familiarly as if it were the Book of Common Prayer. The attraction of these musical doings, in fact, at Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, is the absence of startling novelty. What is brought forward may be very good, but it is very trite. And herein the primal benefit of the Festival of the Three Choirs seems to be lessening every year. They no longer afford a large musical public in the country an exceptional opportunity of hearing something new. That advantage can be more readily obtained by running up to London, where trained societies such as our Sacred Harmonic, kept up to the mark by constant practice, are in a better position both to perform the known and produce the new than the country choirs which only act in concert once a year.

The performance of Mendelssohn's work this year left little to be desired. Mr. Done, the conductor, rather lagged in his time throughout the first part, but improved in his pace after luncheon. The work was divided between Mmes. Tietjens, Sherrington, Patey-Whytock, Sainton, Pullen, and Messrs. Sims Reeves, Santley, Cummings, Lewis Thomas and Smith, who supported it in pretty equal shares. On Mr. Santley, however, fell the whole burden of Elijah; and it is no small triumph that he sustained it with unabated zeal. His reading was splendid. Mr. Reeves sang the Obadiah with his well-known excellence. Tietjens again surpassed herself. Mme. Patey-Whytock, a thoroughly conscientious artist, was not always audible: her voice is too deficient in power. Mr. Cummings added to his laurels by a thoroughly artistic rendering of the music allotted to him. The choruses were full of good intentions, the trebles in particular being excellent in quality. The stringed, wood, and brass instruments acquitted themselves to everybody's satisfaction. All through Wednesday the rain descended in torrents, and promised no abatement.

Thursday.—Those who attended the concert of last night were greatly disappointed at the absence of our illustrious tenor, whose hoarseness, but slightly apparent in the morning, had increased so as to incapacitate him from appearing. The programme was not so good as that of the previous concert, but the various performers acquitted themselves well, particularly Messrs. Santley and Cummings, and Mmes. Lemmens-Sherrington and Sainton-Dolby.

This morning the miscellaneous selection drew a large assemblage in the Cathedral. Spohr's "Last Judgment," Beethoven's Mass in C, a selection from Handel's "Josiah" and Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," were the food provided for the unappeasable appetites of the audience who always attend on the Miscellaneous day. As might be expected from such a lengthy programme, the effect of the whole was dull and unsatisfactory, though the executants (principals, chorus and orchestra) all exerted themselves to the utmost. It is needless further to expatiate on the performance or the performers.

The concert on Thursday night was perhaps the best of those given, as the names which graced the programme would show. Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Donizetti, Haydn, Gounod, Schubert, Hullah, Mozart and Verdi were adulterated in a slighter degree than is usual on those occasions. A quartet of Maurer's for four violins was given in excellent style by Messrs. Sainton, Blagrove, Carrodus and H. Holmes. Mr. Sims Reeves was again unable to appear. The encores were awarded to Sullivan's "Sigh no more, ladies," sung by Mr. Cummings, and a ballad, "The portrait," composed and sung by Mme.

Lemmens-Sherrington. It need hardly be added that the songs which obtained this favor were the least noteworthy on the programme.

On Friday the "Messiah," an oratorio always better performed at Worcester than at the sister cities—was given. The chorus was in excellent order; the soloists—those who had undertaken the previous oratorios—did their best; the "Hallelujah" went especially well. Mr. Sims Reeves arrived in full force, sang carefully, and delighted his hearers fully. The bishop and dean were present, and the audience showed in numbers and selection.

PARIS.—The Swedish singer, Mlle. Nilsson, is still singing Martha, while the papers are anxiously discussing reports of her intended marriage to a rich English banker. M. Arthur Pougin has written her biography, from which the following passages are taken:

"Christine Nilsson was born in the province of (Sweden) in 18—. Her parents, honest peasants, paid but little attention to the precocious taste for music the child possessed, and certainly never thought of making an artist of her. She was barely seven years of age when a rich lady of the province, struck by her charming appearance and gentleness and the sweet tone of her voice, offered to adopt her and provide for her future prospects. Her parents however refused the kind lady's proposal and the child remained at home. Some years later Christine, accompanied by a younger brother, started off to visit the fair at a neighboring village. She had a violin with her, and report says that she learned how to play it alone, and without the slightest instruction. On arriving at the principal place she began to sing and accompany herself to the delight of the standers-by. Among these was the proprietor of a travelling theatre, who was so struck by the girl's grace and talent that he offered to engage her on the spot, promising her twenty six dollars (about £4 10s.) a month if she would accept. Christine had never heard of such a sum of money in her life, and was hesitating whether she should say yes or not, when a notable of the village interfered and took her back to her parents, and proposed to attend to her musical education. This time the father and mother consented, and she was sent by her protector to Gothenburgh, and placed under the care of the Baroness L—, formerly an artist of renown, and who was so pleased with her young protégée's latent talent, that she herself gave her instructions in singing. A year later she was sent to Stockholm, and lived in the family of Frederic Bernald, a violoncellist and highly esteemed composer, ex-court Kapellmeister, and whose three daughters are well known and esteemed in their own country and in Germany as cantatrices of the first order. Thanks to Bernald's lessons, Christine was soon fit to appear in public: and her first début took place in a grand concert, at which the royal family was present, when she obtained the most favorable reception both as singer and violinist. It was then determined to send her to Paris.

Here Mlle. Nilsson was placed under the care of M. Wartel, an ex-tenor of the Grand Opéra, and the professor of Mlle. Trebelli, and about two years ago she made her first appearance at the Lyrique as Violetta in the French edition of "La Traviata." We all remember with what favor she was received, and each succeeding part, "Il Flauto," "Martha," "Donna Elvira" ("Don Juan") has raised her in public estimation. Her biographer goes on to speak of her amiable qualities and says "she never forgot her country, her family, nor her friends. She was always looking forward to the time when she would be able to return among them, and last year she spent her congé at Malmö, to the delight of all who had known her. On her arrival she was literally covered with flowers. But a short time back her family was almost in want, but now her parents inhabit a charming residence which the happy girl has bought for them.

An unlucky performance of "Faust" took place last week at the Lyrique. Three debuts were announced, M. Jaulain (Faust), Cazaux (Mephistopheles) and Mlle. Cornélis (Siebel). The last alone put in an appearance, and M. Monjaux and M. Brion, who appeared, were very roughly received. Two days later M. Cazaux was much applauded, and Faust took his revenge. M. Carvalho promises a rich season. Without counting "Romeo," we are to have "Der Freyschutz," "Lohengrin" (probably,) and no less than four operas, three of which are by new comers: "Deborah" (3. a.) Duvivier; "Cardillac," (3. a.) Dautresme; "Sardanapale," (4. a.) Joncières; "Les Bluets," Jules Cohen.

"Joseph," a revival of Flotow's charming "Zilda" with M<sup>me</sup>. Cabel, and "La Colombe," are the chief attractions at the Opéra-Comique. The new concert hall will be ready at the end of October. There will be three concerts a week under the direction of Pasdeloup. Oratorios, including "Eli," "Israel," "The Messiah," "Nauman," will be produced.

A new musical instrument of striking power and sweetness, and at the same time extremely simple, has been recently exhibited at Paris, where it called forth great admiration. It resembles a piano with upright strings, except that the latter are replaced by tuning-forks, which, to strengthen the sound, are arranged between two small tubes, one above and the other below them. The tuning forks are sounded by hammers, and are brought to silence at the proper time by means of dampers. The sounds thus produced, which resemble those of the harmonium, without being quite so soft, are extremely pure and penetrating.

Germany.

How will the political reconstruction of Northern Germany affect the cause of Music in that most musical of countries? Will Prussia, in swallowing up all those little kingdoms and dukedoms, destroy the many Court theatres, opera-houses, Kapelle (orchestras) and Conservatoires, which under court patronage have been for centuries the vital centres of artistic influence and culture? Will the love of music in the people buy henceforth its own supplies, of equal excellence and plenty, forgetting all dependence upon aristocratic subsidy? Of course, if we believe in the divine humanity of Art, we cannot doubt that it is yet in the destiny of peoples and republics to find out a better way in Art as well as politics, than that of kings. Perhaps it is for our own great republic in this new world to solve that problem first. The London Orchestra, looking only at the immediate future, observes:

Hitherto every German capital had its Royal Opera, kept up by a royal grant. The King of Hanover allowed the Hanoverian opera-house 105,000 thalers (£15,750,) not counting the many presents, orders, and the like encouragement to artists. Today, Hanover is a mere province. The Duke of Nassau's grant to the Wiesbaden theatre was 70,000 florins. The Elector of Hesse gave a similar sum to the royal establishment at Cassel. Both Nassau and Hesse Cassel are henceforth only integral portions of Prussia, and Prussia's sole Hofopernhaus is in Berlin. Conservatories may not suffer to the same extent as the theatres: the Prussian system recognizes them, as the establishment at Cologne testifies, and their influence will probably extend as before to the benefit of musical purposes in Germany. But the practical schools of music—the theatres themselves—are to all appearances lost to the Rhine Provinces. It is improbable that the Prussian government will renew the various grants. Hanover, Weisbaden and Cassel will sink into provincial towns with an essentially provincial theatre a-piece. The artistic resources of the country will be concentrated at Berlin. With a single Court there will be a single Court Theatre; and the managers of the country establishments will be reduced to the grade occupied by their peers in England and France. Deprived of their State grants and their local aristocracy, they must depend for support on the devices of provincial managership—short seasons, an intermittent flash of brilliancy, a starring tenor and prima donna engaged now and then amid a troop of mediocrities, chorus and orchestra reduced to the least common multiple, incapable artists for the secondary parts, and an inexpensive mise-en-scene limited by the barren resources of the exchequer.

The Germans are a musical nation, and the subtraction of their art enjoyments will go hard with them. But what else can be done? The receipts of the opera, per se, do not cover the expenses; a grant has always been essential. The present dilemma is to choose between a large grant and no more opera on the old scale. We fear that the government of Berlin will choose the least expensive alternative; and this is a dread which is making itself felt on the Rhine also, where the artistic world is beginning to cry out lustily. Amid the numerous tasks imposed on King William, not the least arduous will be that of reconciling the musical needs of his new subjects with his system of centralization, and with the requirements of his exchequer.

BERLIN. A local journal says, the theatres of the recently annexed States are sending us their first artists. Lately, it was Niemann, from Hanover; now we have Frederica Grün, the spoiled child of the public of Cassel.—Roger finished his engagement at Kroll's theatre with a very successful representation of the part of Fernando in the Favorita, and Mlle. Loewe was equally remarkable as Leonora.—An Italian troupe opened the Victoria theatre on the 27th of August with Il Trovatore.—Mlle. Lucca has made her rentrée in the Africaine.—On the 26th of August, the Royal Opera gave the Prophète, with Wachtel tenor, and Mmes. Börner and von Edelsberg; on the 28th the Wasserträger, and on the 31st Die weisse Dame with Wachtel. Mr. Charles Adams (formerly of Boston) is engaged at the Royal Opera house, but will pass his vacation, from Christmas till Easter, in London.
